It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 28th March, 1892.

BEHRING SEA SEAL FISHERY.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, before the correspondence appeared which has been made public this morning I had given the noble Marquess, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, notice of my intention to ask him what was the nature and extent of the modifications of the modus vivendi of last Session for regulating the Behring Sea Seal Fishery, now proposed by Her Majesty's Government to the Government of the United States, and whether he can give your Lordships any further information upon the subject without prejudice to the public interest? Probably the correspondence published this morning answers, as fully as the noble Marquess can, the first part of the question; but I would still ask him whether there is any further information beyond that which has appeared which he can give your Lordships without prejudice to the public interest?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, the publication which has been laid upon the Table, and which appeared in the newspapers this morning, contains all the correspondence right to within 24 hours of the date when it appeared, and I have absolutely no information later than that period. I feel that there may seem to be some curtness if I do not answer the noble Lord at length; but I think he will appreciate my view that it is better to let that correspondence speak for itself, and that I should not hazard any commentaries either upon our own productions or upon those of the United States. I do not see that any advantage could arise at this stage from a discussion of the matter. My Lords,

I have perhaps deviated from the usual course in making an entire disclosure of the correspondence that has passed, before the negotiation with which it was concerned was concluded; but it became evident that much of it was becoming public property on the other side of the water, and I thought that under those circumstances it was only fair, and tending to promote a due appreciation of the questions at issue, that we should place the whole of it before the Houses of Parliament and before the English public. I really have nothing further to state; but if there is anything that the noble Lord does not understand, or which I can explain to him, I shall be exceedingly glad to do so.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, of course after what the noble Marquess has said; unless it were to ask for information upon some point which appeared obscure, I certainly should not think it desirable to put any question with a view of eliciting any further statement. At present no such question occurs to me; but I have only had time to glance somewhat cursorily at the correspondence as yet, and if anything occurs to me I will trouble the noble Marquess with a further question.

MALTA MILITIA REGIMENT.

QUESTIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I wish to call the attention of Her Majesty's Government to a statement which, if correct, will seriously affect the present position, and probably the future efficiency, of the Royal Maltese Militia. It is stated on good authority, and it has not I believe been contradicted, that the pay of the officers of the Maltese Militia has recently been considerably reduced. I wish to ask the noble Lord who represents the War Office in this House whether that is the case, and to ask him to what extent that has taken place, and also whether the reason can without inconvenience be stated? My Lords, what seems to increase the weight of the blow which this regiment appears to have received is that this reduction was made some time after the formation of the regiment, without informing those whom it will most seriously affect. I venture therefore to hope that Her Majesty's Government will state what amount of pay to these officers was agreed upon when the regiment was formed, and what reduction was afterwards made in that pay, and whether it was done without informing the officers. I do not wish to press anything upon Her Majesty's Government which might be inconvenient at this moment to be stated; but I do think that it concerns very much the welfare of this corps that some explanation should be given to them why this reduction was made. It may be in the recollection of your Lordships that not long ago this regiment was inspected by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief in Malta, and that great commendation was given with regard to the soldier-like bearing of the men and also the efficiency which they had shown. I think therefore, my Lords, it is only due to this corps that some explanation should be given, and some reason stated to them why Her Majesty's Government have thought fit to reduce this pay, and that without their assent and without their knowing the reason why it has been done. I beg therefore to ask the noble Lord who represents the War Office in this House whether any information can be given to your Lordships which will throw light upon the subject.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (EARL BROWNLOW): My Lords, I must preface my reply to the noble Earl by explaining to your Lordships' House that the service rendered by the Royal Malta Militia differs in many respects from the services rendered by any other regiment in Her Majesty's Service. Their services cannot be compared with those of the Militia, because they have never yet been called out for permanent training; their services are more similar to those rendered by the Volunteers. But when one comes to the question of pay it is obvious that, as the Volunteers serve the country for nothing, it is impossible to make any comparison in that respect. I will inform your Lordships what the state of the case is. When it was first proposed to raise the Royal Malta Militia it was supposed that their service would be in every way similar to that of a Militia regiment in this country:

that they would be called out for a short period of training, and that during that time they would, as a matter of course, receive the full pay and allowances received by Militia regiments. It appears, however, that it was impossible to make an arrangement for this, and the arrangement that was at last come to was that they should give 78 half day's work, and that for those 78 half days the officers should receive half pay. Subsequently a very strong appeal was made by the officers of the regiment that they should be allowed for a time to draw full pay. The reason given was that there were large initial expenses in raising the regiment connected with uniform, band, and so on, and that as the regiment was raised from the beginning the officers would have to give a great deal more time than the half time proposed when the regiment was first raised. The Secretary of State, after due consideration, made this concession for the year, and allowed the officers to draw full pay. Another appeal was made at the end of the first year, when the Secretary of State was again begged to extend the time for another year and allow these officers to receive full pay. That concession was allowed for another year; but at that time it was on the distinct understanding that at the end of that period the 78 half days should be given for half pay. My Lords, I think that these concessions on the part of the Secretary of State were certainly amply justified by the conduct of the officers themselves. They applied themselves with great zeal and energy to making their regiment as efficient as they could, and, as the noble Earl has already said, when they were paraded for inspection before His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, His Royal Highness was able to express his unqualified satisfaction at the efficiency of the regiment and the soldierlike appearance of the men upon parade. Again another appeal was made, and the Secretary of State took the whole matter very carefully into his consideration. The proposal then made was that the regiment should form a camp for ten days, during which time the officers were to receive not only full pay, but messing allowance, and that the number of days should be reduced from 78 to 56. Apparently this has never been carried out. I do not know quite what the local difficulties may be in the Island, but there seem to be difficulties in the way, and the regiment has never yet been called out for permanent training. If they were, no doubt the arrangement would be easy to carry out; but the difficulties, whatever they are, lie in Malta. Under these circumstances there has been no other alternative but to revert to the original arrangement of the 78 half days for half pay, and that is how the matter stands now. Therefore, so far from there being any reduction in the pay of the officers, all that has now been done is really to revert to the original arrangement made at the beginning. I hope the noble Earl will be satisfied with that answer.

EARL DE LA WARR: Did I correctly understand that the terms were 78 days' training for 78 days' pay?

EARL BROWNLOW: Seventy-eight half days. I may mention that the time for drill on those days has been fixed by His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief at three hours, which cannot be called a full day.

QUESTIONS.

FLINTSHIRE MAGISTRATES.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the attention of the Government has been drawn to a recent Correspondence between the Rhyl Liberal Club and the Lord Lieutenant of the County of Flint on the subject of the appointment of Magistrates in Flintshire; whether he is aware that very great dissatisfaction exists at the small number of Liberals who are placed on the Bench—namely, some ten only out of a total of 90 Magistrates; whether he is aware that there is only one Protestant Nonconformist on the Bench, while fully two-thirds of the population of the county are Nonconformists, and whether he is aware that there are a considerable number of Nonconformists resident in the county who are qualified, legally and otherwise, for appointment as Magistrates; whether he is aware that only a very few of the Magistrates can speak Welsh, and that the need of an interpreter is often required, and whether the Government will use the needful pressure to induce the Lord Lieutenant to take steps that all Political Parties shall be fully represented on the Bench in proportion to their numbers, and thus remove a cause of bitterness which exists on the subject throughout the county?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have received a Copy of the Correspondence. The Lord Lieutenant of Flintshire informs me that he is unable to ascertain the proportion between Conservative and Liberal appointments to the Bench made by him, as his appointments have never been influenced by political considerations. He believes that few of the Magistrates speak Welsh; but that in a large portion of Flintshire no Welsh is spoken, and that in the Welsh-speaking districts interpreters are always to be obtained, and in no case has there been a failure of justice owing to want of knowledge of Welsh on the Bench. In the Rhyl district the Lord Lieutenant has recently appointed three Magistrates, two of whom are Welsh-speaking gentlemen. It is no part of my duty to interfere with the discretion of the Lord Lieutenant in selecting suitable persons to be placed on the Commission of the Peace.

MR. S. SMITH: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question as to whether there is only one Protestant Nonconformist on the Bench?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no information as to the religion of any of the Magistrates.

THE PROBATION OF FIRST OFFENDERS ACT, 1887.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will issue an official Circular to Magistrates, Recorders, and Chairmen of Quarter Sessions, inviting their further consideration of the provisions of "The Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887," especially in view of the statement made by Her Majesty's Commissioners of Prisons for England and Wales in their last Report that, in at least some districts, the local prison Governors are "not aware of the Act having been applied at all," and in view also of the figures in the latest "Judicial Statistics," showing that more than half of all the persons proceeded against summarily in the year were of "previous good character," whilst another large proportion had "nothing known against them?"

MR. MATTHEWS: I propose to issue a Circular calling attention to Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, and to the Probation of First Offenders Act.

UNCLASSED TEACHERS IN IRISH NATIONAL SCHOOLS.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many unclassified teachers have been appointed to national schools in Ireland during the years 1888, 1889, 1890, and 1891 respectively; and under what circumstances can the manager of a school appoint an unclassified teacher of whose qualifications he is satisfied?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Commissioners of National Education report that in the years named the numbers of unclassified teachers appointed have been as follows:—1888, 48; 1889, 23; 1890, 18; 1891, 18. Several of these teachers had previously been monitors. Appointments of this nature are considered by the Commissioners where a person possessing the qualifications of a classified teacher cannot be found to fill an occurring vacancy, but conditional on his immediately passing a preliminary entrance examination for provisional classification in the third class. For his continued recognition he is required to pass the general examination next happening.

OFFICIALS EMPLOYED ON THE INDIAN CENSUS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India how many Europeans, Eurasians, and Indians were officially employed in connection with the taking of the recent Census in India?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Secretary of State has no information on the subject.

MR. MAC NEILL: May I ask can the Secretary of State procure information on the subject?

*MR. CURZON: We are expecting later on a detailed Report upon the Census; but if the information desired by the hon. Member is not contained therein, I do not think there will be any advantage in asking for it.

THE "CHARGE TAKER" AT THE GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will cause inquiry to be made into the way the recently appointed "charge taker," Mr. A. Taplin, in the General Post Office, Dublin, was selected for the position, and whether due regard was had to the claims, on the grounds of service and fitness for the position, of other employés; whether this officer has charge of the male and female domestic servants of the department; and whether he can state the grounds for the dismissal of six of the female servants since Taplin took charge, the religion of the servants dismissed, and of those who were appointed to their places?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Altogether four candidates applied for the situation, and Mr. Taplin was selected by the Postmaster General as being by far the best qualified for the duties to be performed. The charwomen of the department are under his control. There are no male domestic servants. The charwomen are not established servants, nor are all of them regularly employed, some of them being paid by the job. Eight (not six) of these persons have left since Mr. Taplin became charge taker. Of these eight, two left in consequence of age; one left in consequence of illness; one resigned; and four were dismissed for drunkenness and general misconduct. Neither of those who have left nor of those who have succeeded them is the religion known; nor is it the practice of the department to inquire.

THE GENERAL POST OFFICE, DUBLIN.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the grounds upon which a candidate named E. C. Conlan, who twice presented himself for preliminary examination for the office of sorting clerk in the General Post Office, Dublin, in 1892, was each time rejected?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The grounds were, not being tall enough and not being sufficiently educated.

WEST INDIAN SUGAR.

MR. WATT (Glasgow, Camlachie): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Secretary of State will take into consideration, with regard to any permanent reductions in duties proposed upon articles imported into the West Indian Colonies from the United States, the fact that although the United States, under the M'Kinley Tariff, have agreed to admit West Indian sugars duty free, they have granted a bonus equivalent to the former scale of duties to home producers; and whether alterations in the existing Customs tariffs of the Colonies will necessitate higher duties on all articles exported from the United Kingdom to these Colonies?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de Worms, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In entering into the arrangement with the United States Government, under which the duties imposed in certain West Indian Colonies on various articles imported chiefly, though not exclusively, from the United States have been reduced, Her Majesty's Government took into consideration the fact that a bounty is granted in the United States to home producers of sugar. Alterations in the existing Customs tariffs of the Colonies will not necessitate higher duties on all articles exported from the United Kingdom to these Colonies.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when Papers on the subject will be laid on the Table?

BARON H. DE WORMS: They are in preparation.

SUPPLY OF REGIMENTAL STORES.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he will inquire if regiments stationed in Ireland are largely supplied with groceries and other dry goods, obtainable in Ireland, from the Army and Navy Stores, London; whether any, and, if so, how many, of the officers of regiments stationed in Ireland are shareholders and have other financial interests in the Army and Navy Stores; whether it has come to his knowledge that any officers so interested in the Army and Navy Stores have used their influence in their regiments to procure orders for Army supply from that establishment to the injury of Irish traders, who are taxed to support the British Army; and what action he proposes to take in the matter?

*THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE WAR OFFICE (Mr. Brodrick, Surrey, Guildford): This matter was very carefully considered in 1890. I can only repeat what has been said by the Secretary of State. No complaints have been received on the subject. The canteens supplying groceries to the troops are managed by the regimental committees, who act independently of the War Office, and are free to obtain their supplies from whatever source they think fit.

DEBTS OF VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

MR. ISAACS (Newington, Walworth): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if his attention has been called to an unreported case of "Herbert & Co. v. Silver," judgment in which was given by the Hon. Mr. Justice Day on the 19th January last at Guildhall Sittings of the Queen's Bench Division, and in which the learned Judge directed the jury that each member of the Finance Committee of a Volunteer Regiment was personally liable for debts of the regiment; and, if so, whether he is prepared to issue a Regulation under the powers contained in "The Volunteer Act, 1863," Section 16, by which the liability of the members of the Finance Committee should be limited to the amount of the public funds at the disposal of the commanding officer, in whom all the property of the regiment is vested by Section 25 of the said Act, or otherwise, to obviate the possibility, under the authority of the said case, of individual members of the Finance Committee being personally sued for regimental debts?

*MR. BRODRICK: It is not the duty of the Finance Committee of a Volunteer corps to give orders on behalf of the regiment; if it does so, it renders itself liable for the expense of such orders. Regulations now under consideration will make it quite clear where the responsibility for orders, given on behalf of the regiment, rests.

THE COST OF UNIFORMS OF HIGHLAND REGIMENTS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what is the entire cost entailed on the Estimates by dressing Highland regiments in their national costume?

*MR. BRODRICK: The clothing of the Scottish regiments of the Line and of the Militia costs about £15,000 a year more than the clothing of the same number of ordinary Infantry regiments.

TELEGRAPH OFFICE, LITTLE DOWN- HAM, CAMBRIDGESHIRE.

MR. BRAND (Cambridge, Wisbech): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will take into consideration the claims of Little Downham, in Cambridgeshire, for a postal telegraph office, in so much as this parish has a population of 2,000 people, and has no telegraph office or second delivery of letters?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The hon. Member has, I find, been informed that the office could only be established under a certain guarantee.

DISMISSAL OF THE BALLYSCALLY NATIONAL SCHOOL TEACHER.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what were the circumstances attending the dismissal of Mr. A. Gallagher, national school teacher, Ballyscally, County Tyrone; and when the Commissioners of Education propose to make public their decision on the Inspector's Report made in November last?

*MR. JACKSON: The Commissioners of National Education report that the teacher mentioned was dismissed by the manager of the school on 31st December, 1891. In communicating the dismissal to the Board, the manager stated that he had determined the service of the teacher in consequence of repeated acts of insubordination, together with other displeasing features of his conduct. Certain complaints had been previously made by the manager against the teacher. The Commissioners had them inquired into by their Inspector, and, having considered his Report, decided that the case did not demand further action on their part. They duly notified their decision to the manager on 17th December.

THE WEARING OF THE SHAMROCK.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the Sergeant Major of the Carlow Militia is correctly reported, when ordering the men to remove their shamrocks from their caps on St. Patrick's Day, to have told them "to throw away those tufts of grass;" and, if so, whether he will be reprimanded for making use of this observation?

*MR. BRODRICK: As the hon. Baronet is aware from recent discussions, no soldier is allowed to wear any decoration on parade, except with the permission of his commanding officer. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Stanhope) has, I think, satisfied the House that he has no desire to run counter to the national sentiment in this matter, but as the order, under the circumstances, was perfectly proper, he has not felt it necessary to inquire as to the exact terms in which it was given.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the hon. Gentleman say how this statement can be reconciled with the fact that men of the Welsh Fusiliers are allowed to wear the leek on parade on St. David's Day?

*MR. BRODRICK: I think my answer covers that point. With the permission of the commanding officer this or any other emblem may be worn. It is not alleged that in the present instance such permission was sought, and the officer or non-commissioned officer would order the removal of the emblem badge, or whatever it was, without regard to what it was.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether it is a custom with the Northumberland Fusiliers, when parading on St. George's Day (23rd April), for all officers and men by order to wear two roses, red and white, in their busbies; and whether English, Irish, Scotch, and Welsh soldiers in that regiment are obliged, under pain of punishment for disobedience, to conform to this custom; if so, whether he will cause an order to be made that the wearing of shamrock on St. Patrick's Day shall be discretionary in the Army?

*MR. BRODRICK: The Commander-in-Chief is not cognisant of the custom referred to in the question. There is no necessity to issue an order as to the wearing of the shamrock on St. Patrick's Day, as such matters are within the discretion of commanding officers.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Seeing how unfairly the discretion is used, is it not desirable that some instructions should be issued? May I also ask, Could not the information be obtained?

*MR. BRODRICK: I think the hon. Member is incorrect in saying that the discretion has been unfairly used. It is not alleged that any application has been made to a commanding officer for leave to wear the shamrock and refused. As regards the custom mentioned in the question, it is not within the knowledge of the War Office, and as it does not come within the regulations for discipline it has not been thought necessary to make inquiry.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to a report from the Press Association that a stoker at the Seamen's Barracks, Devonport, was ordered 14 days' imprisonment for wearing the shamrock on St. Patrick's Day last; whether he can give the name of the man imprisoned, and of the officer who gave the sentence, and the general circumstances of this case; and, if the Press report is true, whether he will order the release of this man pending an investigation of the facts of the case, and until the House is afforded an opportunity of considering the matter?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I am informed that Frederick Dwyer, stoker, while on parade at Divisions, was ordered by the lieutenant on duty to take some green decoration out of his cap, and that he refused to obey the order. This was reported to Commander Neville, who thereupon punished the man with 14 days, number 10^a, for wilful disobedience in refusing to obey orders. Commander Neville subsequently reduced this sentence to seven days, number 10^a. This is one of the ordinary summary punishments authorised by the Regulations in such cases. Grog is stopped, smoking is forbidden, and the offender is practically confined to barracks, but he is not imprisoned. Considering that disobedience to orders is a grave offence against discipline, I do not think the punishment inflicted was severe, nor do I propose to interfere in the matter.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to give notice that on the first opportunity I will press this matter upon the attention of the House.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I would ask the noble Lord if there is any other instance on record of anyone in the National Service having been punished for wearing a national decoration?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I cannot answer that question, but I may say that no decorations of any kind are permitted to be worn by men in Her Majesty's uniform.

MR. SEXTON: I would ask the noble Lord whether there is any objection to the Admiralty issuing a General Order or indication that the Admiralty does not desire that Irishmen in the Service should be required to remove green decorations on St. Patrick's Day.

LORD G. HAMILTON: Whatever Regulation applies to Irishmen must apply to all other nationalities.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I would ask the noble Lord whether as an Irishman he has ever worn the shamrock himself on St. Patrick's Day?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I would like to ask the noble Lord whether, seeing the near approach of Primrose Day, he will give orders that primroses are not to be worn by soldiers or sailors on that day?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

LABOURERS' COTTAGES, ROSCREA UNION.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether representations from ratepayers of the Borris in Ossory and Moneenalassa electoral divisions of the Roscrea Union for the erection of labourers' cottages were lodged as far back as December, 1888; whether any of these cottages have yet been built; whether the Guardians have even yet obtained possession of the plots of land for their erection; whether the Board of Works required a sum of £30 to be lodged before the Government arbitrator was allowed to proceed with the valuation of three half-acre plots; and whether any of this money has been returned to the Roscrea Board, or any account furnished of its disbursement?

*MR. JACKSON: The proposal to provide labourers' cottages in the case mentioned was first submitted to the Local Government Board in December, 1889, and was duly sanctioned under a Provisional Order. The information before me does not show whether the Guardians have yet obtained possession of the land. The Board of Works did obtain the deposit mentioned. They have not yet accounted with the Guardians, as they are awaiting the furnishing by the Arbitrator of his bill of costs.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will the Board of Works continue to exact the heavy deposit of £10 in each case, seeing that very often the purchase money does not exceed that?

MR. JACKSON: That is rather a question for the Secretary to the Treasury.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: The right hon. Gentleman may recollect that when he filled the office of Secretary to the Treasury he offered to look into this matter.

MR. JACKSON: I did make inquiry when I was in Dublin, when, if I remember aright, the question was the provision of labourers' cottages in a Union in the South of Ireland. The suggestion made was whether a local valuer could not be employed instead of sending down an officer from Dublin. I made inquiries, and I was then told that it was very difficult to arrange that, because in many of these cases it was very difficult to find a local valuer not in some way connected with the matter. The object, of course, is by inquiry to obtain an independent opinion. I did make the suggestion to the Board of Works that they should try and limit the amount of the deposit to what would be a fair amount of the charge.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman see that the unexpended balance is returned to the Guardians?

MR. JACKSON: That is rather a question for the Treasury.

LOANDA TRADE REPORT.

MR. NEVILLE (Liverpool, Exchange): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the British Consul at Loanda, who receives £700 a year, has made any later Report on the trade of Loanda than that for 1886-7; and if he will explain why regular information is not forwarded to the Foreign Office?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): Reports from Loanda were received and issued by the Foreign Office in 1888 and in 1889. In 1890 the Consul at Loanda, Mr. Annesley, was engaged in special duties in the Oil Rivers district (owing to the illness and subsequent death of Consul Hewett). In 1891 Consul Annesley resigned in consequence of ill-health. Acting Consul Brock was instructed on the 2nd of January last to send home a Report on the trade of Loanda, and he is now engaged in preparing it.

ULVERSTON POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. NEVILLE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the Postmastership at Ulverston, worth £215 per annum, was recently given to a lady who had previously acted as sorting clerk at a salary of 30s. a week; whether there were many applicants for the post of higher position and longer service; whether such rapid promotion is usual in the Service; and whether in this instance outside influence was brought to bear in respect of the appointment?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The answer to the first paragraph of the question is, Yes. It was given to Miss Margaret Hornsby, the daughter of the late Postmaster, who in one capacity or another had assisted her father in the office during a period of 18 years. The answer to the second paragraph is, Yes, and to the third, No. To the last paragraph I answer, Yes, in this sense—that the locality presented a very influential memorial, and recommended her appointment as Postmistress in succession to her father.

THE PETTY SESSIONS BENCH, RAMELTON, COUNTY DONEGAL.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that on the Petty Sessions Bench at Ramelton, County Donegal, a town with 1,700 inhabitants, of whom fully half are Roman Catholics, there are six Magistrates, and of these five are members of the Irish Episcopal Church and one a Presbyterian; and whether he will consider the propriety of taking steps to secure that members of the Roman Catholic faith should form part of a Court in which justice is administered to so large a Roman Catholic population?

*MR. JACKSON: I am an unwilling assistant of the hon. Gentleman in his self-imposed task of taking a religious census of the officials of Ireland; but the Secretary to the Lord Chancellor of Ireland reports that there are seven Magistrates attending the Petty Sessions mentioned. The religious denominations of six of these Magistrates is, it is believed, as stated in the question. There is no information on this point as regards the seventh, nor is there information as to the relative proportion of the several religious denominations in the district, though I am informed that the statistics of the hon. Member are inaccurate. The Lord Lieutenant of the county is always ready to consider the names of any properly qualified Roman Catholics submitted to him, and the Lord Chancellor to give effect to such recommendations when made.

MR. MAC NEILL: There is a vacancy on the Petty Sessions Bench. Will the right hon. Gentleman undertake that if a Roman Catholic gentleman is recommended and found qualified he shall be appointed?

*MR. JACKSON: It is quite out of my power to give any such undertaking; but I am sure if the hon. Member will recommend to the Lord Lieutenant of the county or the Lord Chancellor a suitable person, that recommendation will be most carefully considered.

MR. MAC NEILL: I do not intend that the Lord Lieutenant or the Lord Chancellor should dispense patronage to me.

MILITARY CANDIDATES—WOOLWICH AND SANDHURST.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the Queen's Regulations require a candidate who presents himself for admission to the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich, or the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, to obtain a certificate of moral and satisfactory conduct from his tutor; and whether these certificates are ever dispensed with by the Authorities at the Horse Guards; and, if so, how many of such dispensations have been granted in each of the last three years, and on what grounds?

*MR. BRODRICK: The Regulations require certificates as to moral character for the last four years in the case of candidates for the Royal Military College and the Royal Military Academy. This rule is so rigidly adhered to that there has been only one exception during the last three years, and in that case the certificate was only dispensed with under the most special circumstances and after the fullest inquiry.

PAY OF OFFICERS COMMANDING DEPOT CENTRES.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what is the total cost of the pay and allowances of the officers commanding depot centres?

*MR. BRODRICK: The cost of employing these officers, instead of giving them the retired pay to which they are entitled and receiving no service in return for it, is £10,950.

COLONEL NOLAN: That is not the information I want. My question is, what is the total cost?

*MR. BRODRICK: I can supply that information, but I thought the hon. and gallant Gentleman wished to know the extra cost.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will repeat the question to-morrow.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture when the promised new Order will be issued with respect to districts infected with the foot-and-mouth disease, to meet, as far as is practicable and safe, the convenience of farmers by permitting beasts to be sent to the Metropolitan Market under proper restrictions?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Beasts can be sent now to the Metropolitan Market from every district in England and Wales, except the Counties of Sussex, Kent, Surrey, Cheshire, portions of Essex and Westmoreland, and part of Lancashire—which I have been compelled to close this morning—and from the districts other than those which are scheduled in Scotland. I hope the new Order to which the hon. Member refers will be issued during the course of the present week.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA IN THE SKIPTON DIVISION.

MR. MORRISON (York, W.R., Skipton): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture what is the date of the last outbreak of pleuro-pneumonia in the Skipton Petty Sessional Division, and the probable time when the restrictions on the movement of stock out of that district will be abrogated?

MR. CHAPLIN: The last two outbreaks of pleuro-pneumonia nearest to the town of Skipton were, one near Grassington, on 8th September, 1891, and the other near Bingley, on 31st November, 1891. Another outbreak at Willesden, near Bingley, occurred on 19th January last. The district, as the hon. Member is aware, is a cow-breeding one, and, when free, animals are distributed from it widely over the West Riding and Lancashire. It is, moreover, a district that imports considerable numbers of store cattle from Ireland, an importation which is not without danger. I am afraid that for the present the restrictions on the movement of stock out of the district must continue in force.

THE CONVICTS DALY AND EGAN— SUPERINTENDENT BLACK.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a paragraph which appeared in the London correspondence of the Manchester Evening Mail on 4th March, 1892, in which it is stated that a certain ex-Inspector of police in the provinces absconded; whether the police officer referred to is the Inspector who was the chief witness for the Crown in the prosecution of James Egan and John Daly for treason-felony, and who was in charge of the police who arrested both of them; whether this Inspector has absconded, and whether any charges affecting this Inspector's official career have come to the knowledge of the authorities; whether he is aware that a public testimonial to the Inspector, headed by the Mayor of Birmingham, and another promoted by the police of that city, were abandoned at the request of Mr. Farndale, Chief Constable of Police, acting on behalf of the authorities, and in consequence of the allegations in question having come to their knowledge; and whether, as John Daly and James Egan were convicted largely on the evidence of this Inspector, an investigation will be instituted by the authorities into his official career?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have not seen the newspaper paragraph mentioned in the question, but I learn that its effect is correctly stated. I understand that the officer referred to is ex-Detective Superintendent Black, of the Birmingham police, who was a witness at the trial of Egan and Daly. He was not the officer in charge of the police who arrested Egan and Daly. Mr. Black writes to me from Birmingham that he has not absconded, and his statement is confirmed in an official Report which I have received from the Chief Constable. Mr. Black also informs me that it is his intention, in consequence of these allegations, to place the matter in the hands of a solicitor, with a view to vindicate his character. It is the fact that a meeting was held by a number of the inhabitants of the City of Birmingham, but not headed by the Mayor, with the object of raising funds for a testimonial to Mr. Black, and that subscriptions were invited in the local newspapers. I am informed that Mr. Black put an end to the project himself by publishing a letter in which he respectfully declined the testimonial. This letter led also to the abandonment of a movement on the part of the police to collect subscriptions from the general body of the Force. The Chief Constable was not spoken to on this subject, and did not request that the subscriptions should be abandoned. I do not admit that Daly and Egan were convicted largely on the evidence of this officer. I am not aware that the Watch Committee of Birmingham intend to institute an investigation into his official career.

MR. J. E. REDMOND: The information I have is of such a character that I must ask the right hon. Gentleman another question in reference to this matter. I desire to ask him whether allegations have been made against this police officer of having been engaged for years in a criminal conspiracy; whether the authorities, as soon as these allegations came to their knowledge, went or sent to the testimonial committee and intimated that the testimonial proceedings should be stopped; whether the letter which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded to as having been written by Mr. Black, asking that the testimonial proceedings should be stopped, was written at the instance of the police authorities; and, if these facts are so, whether, in view of the important part played by this police officer in the trial and conviction of Daly and Egan, the right hon. Gentleman will consider the propriety of instituting a judicial investigation into the circumstances?

Mr. Matthews

MR. MATTHEWS: The officer to whom the hon. Member refers is not under my control, but under that of the Watch Committee, and I have no power to order a judicial investigation into his conduct. With regard to the defamatory statements the hon. Member has thought it right to put in the shape of a question, they are, so far as my information goes, inaccurate.

THE LAGOS TREATIES.

MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether Her Majesty's Government are aware that the Treaty recently signed at Lagos by Mr. S. T. Carter, on behalf of this country and certain Jebus, was invalid in consequence of its not having been executed with the authority of the King and head chiefs of the Jebu people after consultation at a national council duly summoned with the necessary formalities required by native custom; whether the Treaties said to be concluded by the Egbas are similarly defective; and whether, before sanctioning any offensive operations against these independent kingdoms, the Secretary of State would cause careful inquiry to be made as to the circumstances under which these informal documents are considered binding upon Jebuan and Egban subjects by the Lagos Government?

BARON H. DE WORMS: A deputation sent to Lagos by the King of Jebu for the purpose of expressing the wishes of his people stated that they represented the whole of the Jebu nation, and that they had full authority to treat with the Lagos Government. The two Lagos Jebus who witnessed the agreement attested that the messengers "In the name of the Awujale and people of Jebu, and on their behalf, agreed to all the terms of the agreement, and undertook to carry them out, and declared that they were authorised to do so. The representatives further signified their acceptance of the terms by taking the country oath on kolas and water."

The only Treaty with the Egbas is the one of 5th January, 1852. It was concluded by authorised persons, and there is no reason to suppose it is not valid.

MR. SUMMERS: Was this Treaty with the Jebus confirmed by the chiefs?

BARON H. DE WORMS: It was made by the King.

MR. SUMMERS: And subsequently repudiated.

BARON H. DE WORMS: There is no evidence of that.

PUZZLE COMPETITIONS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to advertisements in Comic Cuts and other papers, stating that £200 will be given away in cash prizes to those sending most correct solutions to certain puzzles, and inviting competitors to send solutions together with 13 stamps; whether information has reached him that, owing to the extreme ease of guessing these puzzles, vast numbers of persons, chiefly youths and children, are induced to send postal orders, receiving in return either nothing at all or merely nominal sums; and whether he will take steps to determine whether the law is being infringed by the operations in question?

MR. MATTHEWS: No, Sir; I have not seen the advertisements referred to; but I have called the attention of the Treasury Solicitor to the allegations made in the question.

CASSELL'S "NATIONAL LIBRARY" AND SCHOOL LIBRARIES.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to an offer made by Messrs. Cassell, publishers, to supply their "National Library" of 200 volumes at half price (£1 7s.), provided the library is vested in responsible persons, and he place one in which no bookseller resides; and whether, in view of the great advantage the possession of a lending library would be to the inhabitants of villages where no such provision now exists, and seeing that such a proposal is in accordance with paragraph 52 of the Revised Instructions to Her Majesty's Inspectors of Schools, lately issued by the Education Department, he will authorise and recommend school managers in rural districts where library exists to include in the school accounts a moderate sum sufficient for the purchase of Messrs. Cassell's or some similar library?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): I understand that Messrs. Cassell have made such an offer as the hon. Member describes, and I am not aware of any reason why managers of schools should not avail themselves of it for the formation of a lending library, and charge the cost to the school fund.

MESSRS. RANSOME AND THE ADMIRALTY CONTRACT.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can now state whether Messrs. Ransome, of Battersea, who are carrying out, under a sub-contract with Messrs. Thornycroft, of Chiswick, a portion of an Admiralty contract, are paying their workmen less than the trade rate of wages in contravention of the Resolution of this House of 13th February, 1891?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): From the inquiries I have made I am satisfied that Messrs. Ransome have fully complied with the terms of the Resolution in question.

TELEGRAPHISTS' HOLIDAYS.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, when a Bank Holiday falls during a telegraphist's annual leave, the usual practice is as follows: "If the day on which an officer should in ordinary course begin his annual leave happens to be a public holiday in the department, the officer's leave is reckoned to begin on the following day; if the day on which an officer's annual leave expires happens to be a public holiday in the Department, the officer is not required to resume duty till the day after the public holiday;" whether this course is adopted at all Provincial and London district offices, but not at the Central Telegraph Office; and whether he will recommend that the same privilege be extended to the clerks of the Central Telegraph Office, who at the present time have not participated in this extension of leave?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The rule is as stated in the question. The Controller of the Central Telegraph Office was so informed on the 1st December last, and the rule will be in operation during the current and future years.

EDUCATION CODE FOR EVENING SCHOOLS.

MR. S. SMITH: I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education, with reference to evening schools and the New Code, whether, having regard to the fact that the articles of the Code which relate to evening schools are scattered under various headings, making it difficult to ascertain precisely the conditions requisite for obtaining a Government grant, and the further fact that many School Boards and other educational authorities in small towns and rural districts are unaware of their powers and responsibilities in respect to such schools, and of the facilities provided in the Code, he will issue, in connection with the Code, 1892, a special statement or summary of those clauses which relate to evening schools, showing the exact conditions under which a Government grant may be obtained, together with a table setting forth the subjects that may be taught, and the grants that may be earned, in evening schools?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I am aware of the advantages to be derived from the course suggested, and the Department have for some time had in contemplation the issue of a separate Code for evening schools, but the details of the scheme are not yet complete.

LICENCES AT SHOREDITCH.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that the Licensing Magistrates of the Tower Hamlets Division, on Monday, 14th March, renewed the licence of a public house known as the "Norfolk Arms," in Bateman's Row, Shoreditch, after sworn evidence had been given that the house was the habitual resort of thieves, and that there were already 24 other public houses or beer shops within a radius of 200 yards, and after a majority of the inhabitants of the immediate neighbourhood had presented a memorial praying the Magistrates not to renew the licence; and whether he can state why the Magistrates, after such evidence and memorial, renewed the licence?

MR. MATTHEWS: In regard to the renewal of the licence of a public house known as the "Norfolk Arms," Shoreditch, I am informed by the Magistrates' clerk that a general statement was made before the Bench that this house was "frequented by thieves," but that the evidence failed to establish that statement. The Magistrates do not consider that the fact that licensed houses, more or less numerous, exist in the neighbourhood is to be treated by itself, and in the absence of other reasons, as a reason for taking away the licence of any particular house. The Magistrates are unable to say whether the memorial referred to was signed by a majority of the inhabitants, but point out that under the Licensing Act the only evidence they can receive in opposition to the renewal of a licence must be on oath.

TURKEY AND ARMENIA.

MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Turkish Commander of the 4th Army Corps, whose headquarters are at Erzeroum, has been compelling the Armenians to supply the horses necessary for the formation of the Kurdish Cavalry regiment, that the owners have received no compensation for the confiscated animals, and that acts of cruelty have been perpetrated at Kortanlan, Hogthean, and other places on those persons who refuse to give up their property; whether any protest has been made by the British Consul in Armenia; whether the acts enumerated are in contravention of Article 61 of the Berlin Treaty; and when the promised Papers relating to Armenia will be published?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No information in support of the allegations contained in the first paragraph has been received. Her Majesty's Vice Consul at Van has reported that the Kurds have come forward with great readiness to enlist, that their horses have been branded, and that although it was alleged that they had borrowed and stolen the horses of others he was not able to confirm the report. There has, consequently, been no ground for representations on the part of Her Majesty's Embassy. The acts alleged in the first paragraph might be considered to be in contravention of Article 61 of the Treaty of Berlin. Papers will be distributed this week.

DISTRESS AT INNISBOFFIN.

MR. FOLEY (Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that great distress prevails at present in the Island of Innisboffin, that 20 or 30 families there are in actual want; and if, in view of this lamentable condition of affairs, he will urge the Congested Districts Board to undertake the completion of the pier in the east end of the Island which was begun last year?

*MR. JACKSON: I have not yet been able to get the information to enable me to reply to this question, and therefore must ask the hon. Member to repeat the question.

THE POOR RATE COLLECTOR AT INNISBOFFIN.

MR. FOLEY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the local police sergeant acts as the Poor Rate collector in the Island of Innisboffin, and that, in some instances where the process of the law was invoked in this island to recover Poor Rates, warrants have been issued against persons who hold clear receipts for the rates now demanded; and whether a constable is authorised to perform the duties of rate collector?

*MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is not the case that the local police sergeant has been engaged as a collector of Poor Rates in Innisboffin, nor do the Constabulary act as Poor Rate collectors. But warrants were addressed to the sergeant by the Magistrate of Petty Sessions for the recovery of rates, and two of these warrants were not executed because the defendants produced receipts for the money paid.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.): I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman as he cannot answer the preceding question when he can answer this one?

*MR. JACKSON: The answer to that is very simple. Two different departments have to supply the information. I have got it from one and not from the other.

DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is able to state the number of superintendents of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, how many of them are Protestants, and how many Roman Catholics; whether any Protestants have become Roman Catholics, and afterwards have been promoted; whether a Protestant Inspector who, while on leave of absence, attended a meeting in London, was called upon to account for this; whether members of the Force are permitted to become members of the Gaelic Athletic Association, wearing its uniform, and acting as stewards; and if he will say what is the number of the Dublin Metropolitan Police, and how many of them are Protestants?

*MR. JACKSON: The Commissioner of Police reports there are seven superintendents in the Dublin Metropolitan Police, and they are all Roman Catholics. There is no record or trace of an occurrence of the nature mentioned in the second paragraph. The Inspector referred to in the third paragraph had spoken at a public meeting and was publicly reported. It was pointed out to him that he should not have brought himself thus prominently before the public without previously obtaining the views of his superiors. The reply to the inquiry in the fourth paragraph is in the negative. The Commissioner adds that the question of religion does not form any factor in the promotions in the Force. I would venture to deprecate these questions as regards the religion of men in the Public Service as being not conducive to public interests.

MR. JOHNSTON: May I be permitted to say I merely asked this question to show that the Protestants in Ireland are not getting everything their own way.

ILLEGITIMACY IN SCOTLAND.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that 8 per cent. of the children born in Scotland are illegitimate; whether he is aware that the present law inflicts serious hardships on illegitimate children in all classes of society; and whether he will consider in what way the law may be amended, so as to remove the legal disabilities of children born out of wedlock, and to bring home to parents as fully as may be the responsibilities of parentage?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the statement made in the first part of the question. Without expressing any opinion on the assertion that the present law inflicts hardship on illegitimate children, I shall be glad to consider any practical suggestions the hon. Member may make for its amendment.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I would ask the Lord Advocate whether he will be good enough to inquire into the law as bearing upon illegitimate children in reference to their parents claiming damages from employers where the children have been injured? Several cases of this kind have occurred in the mining districts.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I am not aware of any such cases as the hon. Member refers to, but if he will give me details I will make inquiry into the matter.

POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that an application, made by a branch of the Steam Engine Makers' Society, at New Brompton, to deposit the funds of the branch in the Post Office Savings Bank, was met by the reply, on the part of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt, that the branch could not deposit its funds without limit, on the grounds "that, in their opinion, your Society does not come within the class of cases contemplated by the Statute"; whether he is aware that it has been the practice of the Society named for a great number of years to deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank the funds of all their branches, and that by some 70 to 80 branches the funds are so deposited at this time without any question; whether he can inform the House upon what grounds an exception is made as regards this particular branch; and whether it is the intention of the National Debt Commissioners to withdraw the privileges long enjoyed by the Trade Unions of the United Kingdom of depositing their funds in the Post Office Savings Banks, or of so limiting the amount as to render the privilege of but little benefit to such societies?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I would ask the hon. Member to postpone this question until to-morrow.

IRISH NATIONAL GALLERY.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Armstrong, of the Fine Arts Club, has been appointed to the directorship of the Irish National Gallery in succession to the late Mr. Doyle; and whether no Irishman could be found equally competent for the position?

*MR. JACKSON: The Board of Governors of the National Gallery have reported the election of Mr. Armstrong as Director. The appointment is not under the control of the Government, nor am I aware of whether there were other candidates; but I have no doubt the Governors, in making the appointment, endeavoured to secure the services of the gentleman who, in their opinion, would be best qualified to fill the office.

EMIGRATION FROM THE HIGHLANDS OF SCOTLAND.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he has had any further communication from the Government of British Columbia relative to the proposed scheme of emigration to that country from the Highlands of Scotland; whether the Government of British Columbia has accepted the offer of £150,000 for that purpose made by Her Majesty's Government; whether he will lay the Correspondence referred upon the Table of the House; and whether Her Majesty's Government will advance a like or any sum for the purpose of settling the people of the Highlands in the unpeopled parts of their native land?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have not received any further communication from the Government of British Columbia with reference to the proposed emigration scheme from the Highlands of Scotland. The offer of a loan of £150,000 made by Her Majesty's Government has not yet been accepted by the Government of British Columbia, but the hon. Member has probably seen telegrams in the public Press stating that the Legislature of that colony has the matter under consideration. It will be desirable to wait for the conclusion of the negotiations before laying the Correspondence on the Table of the House. With regard to the last paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I am not aware that any practical proposal has been made in the direction which he indicates.

THE SOLOMON ISLANDS.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to a telegram, dated New York, 30th October, 1891, and published in the Times of the following day, in which it is stated that—

"Her Majesty's cruiser Royalist has been cruising among the Solomon Islands and inflicting punishment on the natives for outrages committed on British subjects there. . . . Chief Tono refused to give up the criminals, and accordingly Captain Davis, commanding the Royalist, landed with a party of 25 bluejackets and attacked Tono's village, which was set fire to and destroyed; Tono was killed"; and whether the Admiralty have now received any information on the subject; and, if so, whether he will cause inquiry to be made as to the alleged cruise among the Solomon Islands and the operations there?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I understand that the Royalist was at the Solomon Islands about the beginning of August last, but the Admiralty have received no report of her having inflicted any punishment on natives for outrages. If any action of the kind occurred the particulars will be communicated by the Commander-in-Chief in due course.

DR. CAMERON: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he means to say that the statement made in the Times is unfounded?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I do not go so far as that. As communication is slow with the station referred to, it may be the case that something has occurred of which we have not received full information.

DR. CAMERON: I beg to give notice that I will repeat this question.

LOUISBURG PIER.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether any, and, if so, what, steps will be taken to make Louisburg Pier, County Mayo, of some practical use to the inhabitants of the locality?

*THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I am informed that this pier is vested in the county, and it is, therefore, not for the Treasury to take action.

BALLINCOLLIG POWDER MILLS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the gunpowder barrels used at Ballincollig (County Cork) Powder Mills are all imported from English Government factories; and whether he is aware that such importation has thrown out of work a large number of the Ballincollig coopers? And I would further ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that this question intimately affects ten families, including 108 persons?

*MR. BRODRICK: Powder barrels have up to this time been issued from Government stores to the Ballincollig Mills, as in the case of all contract powder received from mills in England and Scotland. No change has been made which could cause the throwing out of work of coopers at Ballincollig. I may perhaps add that, judging from certain samples which have been forwarded from Ballincollig, there will be no objection to give the Company an opportunity, if they obtain further contracts for powder, to quote a price for barrels as well.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I would ask the hon. Gentleman if he is aware that that promise was made two years ago, and I would ask him how it comes to pass that it has not been carried into effect, but has remained in abeyance for upwards of two years?

*MR. BRODRICK: I was not aware that such a promise had been made; but samples have been obtained, and the hon. Gentleman may rest assured that the promise will be carried out.

THE ALLOTMENTS ACT, 1887.

MR. COBB: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether a loan contracted by a Rural Sanitary Authority for the purchase, under "The Allotments Act, 1887," of land for allotments for any particular parish, is ultimately repayable, first as to principal, and secondly as to interest, out of the rates of the whole rural sanitary area, or out of the rates of the parish only for which the allotments have been provided, in the event of there being a deficiency after applying all receipts in respect of the allotments which are properly applicable towards the repayment of such loan and interest; and whether the security for the repayment of such loan to the lender is upon the rates of the whole rural sanitary area?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): The principal of a loan contracted by a Rural Sanitary Authority for the purchase under the Allotments Act, 1887, of land for allotments for any particular parish and the interest in respect of the loan during its continuance are payable out of the rates of the parish for which the allotments have been provided. The security for the repayment would be the rates of the parish, and not the rates of the whole rural sanitary district.

THE SANITARY COMMISSIONERS OF GIBRALTAR.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state what is the annual expenditure of the Board of Sanitary Commissioners of the City and County of Gibraltar, and from what sources and in what proportions is the income derived; and what is the rateable value of property, and what is the proportionate representation of the ratepayers on the Board as constituted under the Sanitary Order Amendment Order (Gibraltar), 1891, and how are the members elected?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The expenditure of the Sanitary Commissioners in 1890 was £28,031. Their income is derived from rates levied, sale of water, fees for use of baths; and the receipts from rates in 1890 were £10,649, and the receipts from the sale of water average over £10,000 a year. Private ratepayers contribute rather less than two-fifths of the receipts from water, and two-thirds of the receipts from rates. The total rateable value is about £144,000. The private ratepayers are represented on a Board of nine—by four members nominated by the Governor, one from the list of the Grand Jury, one from the list of special jurors, and two from the list of the common jurors.

THE "SUBMARINE SENTRY."

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been drawn to the "Submarine Sentry," recently described in the principal papers and reported upon by special representatives of some of them, as a means of giving warning to ships of the proximity of shallow waters, and so of saving life and property at sea; and, if so, whether his examination has enabled him to decide whether it might afford a means of averting the calamity and loss occasioned by the occasional stranding of Her Majesty's ships, or to what other result has his inquiry led?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The "Submarine Sentry" has been experimented upon in some of Her Majesty's surveying ships, and seems to promise to be useful in searching for dangers; but it is not considered, in its present form, a necessary or desirable adjunct to Her Majesty's ships for the purposes of navigation.

THE INTERNATIONAL GEODETIC BUREAU OF VIENNA.

MR. KIMBER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has, during the past two years, been advised by either of Her Majesty's Astronomers Royal that it would be highly advantageous, in the interests of commerce and navigation as well as science, that Great Britain should join the other European nations in the International Geodetic Bureau of Vienna, the object of which is the collection and collation of data, from the surveys of all nations, as to the mass of the earth, its form and dimensions, tides, levels, &c., and costs the small sum of £100 per annum; and on what grounds, if any, the Government have not so joined?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have received no communication from the Astronomer Royal on this subject during the past two years. As to the reasons why Her Majesty's Government did not join the International Geodetic Bureau, I would refer the hon. Member to the answer given by the Chancellor of the Exchequer on the 21st March this year.

THE CASE OF DR. GALLAGHER.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Dr. Gallagher, at present confined in Portland Prison, suffers from insanity; whether he is aware that a brother of Dr. Gallagher is at present a dangerous lunatic in America, and that insanity is hereditary in the family, and whether, under the circumstances, he will allow an independent medical man to examine Dr. Gallagher, or will he consider the advisability of releasing him on condition that he returns to his family in America?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received a Report, dated yesterday, from the medical officer of Portland Prison, who informs me that he finds no indications of mental unsoundness in Gallagher; that he is perfectly rational; and that he has never, while in prison, shown signs of mental degeneration. I see no reasons for allowing an independent medical examination, and I cannot advise the release of the prisoner. I have no information as to the second paragraph of the question.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: As I got my information from a fellow-prisoner, who told me Dr. Gallagher was suffering from melancholia or some form of insanity, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will make further inquiries? Is it not a fact that the right hon. Gentleman did allow other doctors than the medical officers of the prison to see Dr. Gallagher?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must ask the hon. Member to observe that my information on this subject does not come from common talk amongst persons in the gaol, but from a careful and most deliberate Report made by the medical officer of the prison.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was not common talk that led to an inquiry as to the weak state of health of O'Donovan Rossa, and whether his infirmity was not denied on the authority of the medical officers at the time, just the same as in this case?

MR. J. E. REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell us how many of those prisoners have become insane since their conviction some years ago?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have answered that question, or a similar one, several times.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not the fact that Dr. Gallagher was reported by the Visiting Committee to have been suffering from insanity three years ago?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am not aware of any such report; but if the hon. Member will put the question on the Paper, I will inquire.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: If I drew attention to the mental state of an English prisoner, whom I allege to be insane, would the right hon. Gentleman get his information from the same source as that to which he applies in the case of Dr. Gallagher? In one case it was found out afterwards that the prisoner was mentally wrong as had been stated, and he was ordered to be removed to the Asylum. I ask the right hon. Gentleman how he can now rely on the Report of the medical officer of the prison in view of cases that have occurred before?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I wish to ask the Home Secretary, with reference to Question 64, whether as it is notorious in America that there is insanity in the family of Dr. Gallagher, he will follow the precedent he has followed in other cases, and allow an independent medical inquiry if the expenses are paid by the parties interested?

MR. MATTHEWS: I should prefer not to give a definite answer to that question without notice. At present it strikes me that the circumstances are quite different to those in the case in which I allowed an independent medical examination. In that case there was undoubted illness of a grave character, and it was to calm the distress and anxiety of the friends of the prisoner that I allowed an independent medical man to see him. Here I see no ground for investigation by anyone.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: It is exactly to calm the distress of the friends of the unfortunate man in America that we are asking for an independent medical inquiry into the case.

MR. MATTHEWS: The hon. Member omits the most important circumstance, that in the other case there was ground for alarm, but in this there is absolutely none.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in a case of insanity which has recently been brought under his notice, the official medical officer said there was no insanity, but that it afterwards turned out that there was? Was not the second examination in consequence of a question put in this House; and, for that reason, does he not think it desirable that some independent medical man should examine the prisoner, and the expense be borne by the authorities?

MR. MATTHEWS: I cannot follow the reasoning of the hon. Gentleman. Will he put a question down on the Paper?

FAIR RENT APPEALS.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what number of fair rent appeals lodged on or before 1st June, 1891, remained undisposed of at or near the date when the Land Purchase Act of 1891 was passed; and what number of the same appeals now remain undisposed of approximately, according to the latest information?

*MR. JACKSON: The Irish Land Commissioners report that the total number of fair rent appeals up to 1st June, 1891, and which remained undisposed of at the passing of the Purchase Act of 1891 was 14,950. Of these 1,840 were subsequently disposed of, leaving outstanding on the 29th February of the present year 3,110.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE BANDON UNION.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any, and, if so, what, steps are being taken for the erection of labourers' cottages in the Bandon Union under what is locally termed the new scheme; whether he is aware that on the last occasion of the meeting of the Board, it was stated the scheme has been dropped for six months; and if he will state how often and for what periods this business has been adjourned, and if any steps will be taken to provide the labourers in this Union with the houses and allotments proved necessary?

*MR. JACKSON: Under the original scheme submitted by the Bandon Board of Guardians 125 labourers cottages have been provided in that Union. Representations were subsequently made to the Guardians for the erection of additional labourers cottages. The question has been postponed from time to time by the Guardians, and at their meeting last week they appear to have adjourned the matter for a further period of six months.

DR. TANNER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he has borne in mind the fact that this has been so repeatedly adjourned.

*MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member is under a misapprehension with reference to my power with the Board of Guardians.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that as Chief of the Local Government Board he has power in this matter, and is he also aware that this is a thoroughly Conservative

Board of Guardians, a real old Tory Board?

*MR. JACKSON: No, Sir, I have no power to interfere unless some representations are made to me by the Local Government Board. I was not aware of the composition of this Board of Guardians from a political point of view, but I am very glad to hear that it is as the hon. Gentleman has stated.

THE SALE OF SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS TO NATIVE RACES.

MR. SUMMERS (for Sir WILFRID LAWSON, Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to a conference between British merchants interested in the African trade and Members of Parliament, which was held at the House of Commons on the 11th March, at which it was stated, on behalf of the merchants, that "they could not do without sending a certain amount of spirits out with the cotton goods;" and whether he will take whatever steps are in his power to prevent the policy endorsed unanimously by a Resolution of this House (April, 1888), condemning the sale of spirituous liquors to Native races, being set at naught?

BARON H. DE WORMS: My attention has been drawn to the Report referred to. I can assure the hon. Baronet that there is no intention of departing from the pledge I gave on behalf of the Government in April, 1888, to which he refers, and which was again confirmed by the Secretary of State in another place in 1889. So long as other countries have contiguous possessions through which spirits can be imported it is impossible for us to suppress the traffic. We already levy in our Colonies duties on spirits greatly in excess of those imposed in the neighbouring French and German Colonies, and also higher than the tariff laid down in the Act of the Brussels Conference.

MR. JUSTICE NORTH'S COURT.

MR. LEWIS FRY (Bristol, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he is aware that the case of "Eliot and others v. the Mayor and Corporation of Bristol," set down for hearing in Mr. Justice North's Court in July, 1891, is still unheard, and that only about one-third of the cases then set down before it for hearing have been disposed of; and will he explain why the case, which has for some time been marked as fit for transfer to the Queen's Bench Division, has not been so transferred?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir RICHARD WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): In answer to the question of the hon. Member I have to say that from information furnished to me it appears that at the date when the action referred to was set down for trial there were 53 actions standing before it in the list, and that 28 of these still remain to be tried. The delay has been due to the fact that some exceptionally heavy causes, one of which lasted no less than 20 days, have had to be disposed of. The marking of a case as fit for transfer does not imply more than that if the state of business in the Queen's Bench Division permits the action will be transferred for trial to that division. The unavoidable absence through illness of three Chancery Judges, and the consequent necessity for trying ordinary Chancery causes by a Judge of the Queen's Bench Division, rendered it undesirable to transfer causes to the Queen's Bench Division at the present time, but I may add that it was open to the plaintiff, had he so desired, to have commenced his action in the Queen's Bench Division, in which case the trial would probably have taken place at an earlier date.

THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether he intends to recommend the Government to apply to Parliament for a further sum of money for the purposes of the Commissioners of the British and Irish section of the Chicago Exhibition; and whether he has taken any steps with the Commissioners to have a separate grouping of Irish exhibits, under distinctively Irish management or sub-management, with a separate sum set apart for the purposes of Irish exhibitors?

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether the Government will agree to an increase of the funds available for the organisation of a representative exhibition of Irish industries at the Chicago Exhibition; and, if so, to what amount; and whether in consideration of the strong feeling in Ireland in favour of a separate Irish section at the World's Fair the Government will favourably consider the proposal?

SIR R. WEBSTER: In reply to the questions of the hon. Member for Tipperary and the hon. Baronet the Member for Dublin, the Royal Commission for the Chicago Exhibition have presented a memorial to Her Majesty's Government asking for a substantial increase of the amount to be granted in connection with the British section. The Commission have carefully considered the question of a separate Irish section and separate management for Irish exhibits, and they are in communication with leading gentlemen from Ireland upon the subject. At present, however, the feeling of Irish exhibitors appears to be that it would not be desirable to have the Irish exhibits separately grouped, and that it would be distinctly unfavourable to the exhibitors for that course to be adopted. The matter is, however, receiving careful consideration.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I would like to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman how soon he will be able to give us the information he has promised, and I would also like to know whether it is intended to add to the Commission any representatives of Irish industries?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: The matter really cannot be determined until all the exhibits have come in. It is quite possible there may be some things which it will be desirable to localise and others which may be otherwise dealt with, but there can be no final determination in this matter in the meantime. As to the other question I have received no notice of it, but in reference to adding to the Commission gentlemen representing Irish industries, that matter will be carefully considered on the re-election of the Council in May.

ELECTION EXPENSES.

MR. BRAND (Cambridge, Wisbech): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in consideration of the proximity of the General Election, expenses incurred by Parliamentary candidates at the present moment come within the meaning of the "Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883," and should be included in the Return made to the returning officer, in accordance with Section 33 of the said Act?

SIR R. WEBSTER: The question of the hon. Member implies that the date at which the expenses are incurred is the only important consideration. This is not the fact, as, according to the "Corrupt and Illegal Practices Prevention Act, 1883," if expense is incurred "on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of an election" such expense must be included in the maximum amount allowed. The question is in every case one of fact as to whether the expenses fall within the description to which I have referred—namely, of expenses "relating to the conduct or management of an election." I am afraid that no other general answer can be given.

MR. COBB: I would ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether a sitting Member is responsible for these expenses?

SIR R. WEBSTER: There is no difference in the case of a sitting Member and a candidate.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL AND THE ANNUITY SYSTEM.

MR. J. STUART: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what are the grounds on which Her Majesty's Treasury has declined to sanction a loan of £5,000 by the London County Council to the Free Library Commissioners of Shoreditch repayable on the annuity principle, in view of the fact that the approval of the Local Government Board was obtained to the loan on an estimated expenditure for repayment calculated on the annuity principle, and that the same method of repayment was also proposed by the London County Council?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Treasury has not declined to sanction a loan of £5,000 by the London County Council to the Free Library Commissioners of Shoreditch. It was proposed that the loan should be repaid in certain terms of years under the annuity system, and the Treasury sanctioned the proposed terms provided that repayment were made upon the instalment system in place of the annuity system. This course was taken in accordance with the principles laid down in the Treasury letter of 24th February to the London County Council as those which should be adopted pending a settlement of the general question. One of the considerations which the Treasury took into account was the opinion of those members of the London County Council who, I think the House will agree, may rightly be regarded as the highest financial authorities among its members. I understand that the sanction of the Local Government Board was given merely to the raising of the money and not to the particular method of repayment.

THE CARRIAGE OF IRISH MAILS.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will consider the advisability of using the Cavan, Leitrim, and Roscommon Light Railway for the carriage of mails, which are now delayed for nearly a day at each end of the line and then conveyed by car; what was the sum demanded by the Railway Company and what was the sum offered by the Post Office for the conveyance of mails over the 50 miles of the company's line when the question was previously considered; and what is the present cost of the conveyance of mails from Belturbet and Dromod respectively to the various stations on the company's line?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Post Office desired to employ the railway in question for certain day mails, but failed to come to terms. The Post Office offered full parcel rates to the company, which would amount to about £21 a year. The company asked £90. The company could only relieve the present service to a limited extent. The present cost of conveying the mails to the district is £309 a year.

THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether there is any objection to keeping the British Museum open to the public in the afternoon till the same hour as the Branch Museum at South Kensington is kept open?

*SIR J. GORST: I am advised by the trustees of the British Museum that the desired extension of hours could not be carried out without increase of expense; and in view of the great cost of the evening opening, which, to judge by the attendance, does not seem to be as fully appreciated by the public as might have been hoped, they are not disposed to recommend further outlay.

MARINE BOILERS.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will enlarge the scope of the instructions to the Committee of eminent engineers which he has appointed to examine and report on the construction of boilers for the Navy, in the following directions, namely, to conduct on land a series of trials with a boiler worked with forced draught, and constructed so as to be similar and equal as to design, materials, and workmanship to the best boilers now used in the Navy, with the view of ascertaining the efficiency and maximum power of endurance of the same; to conduct on land a similar series of trials with a boiler or boilers embodying all the improvements that may be recommended by the Special Committee, in order that these may be tested under the greatest possible stress to which a boiler can be subjected at full racing speed; and to exhaust, by practical tests on land, all other questions that have arisen out of the shortcomings of the present boilers when worked with forced draught; and whether he is aware that similar exhaustive trials to those here suggested were made to establish the best design and construction of the so-called "Lancashire" boilers, before their present high efficiency and durability were obtained?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I am obliged to the hon. Member for his suggestion to put marine boilers to the same practical test which, in his own experience, he found to be of value in testing the Lancashire boilers. The proposals in question, with others, will be referred to the Committee for consideration, and any experiments they recommend will, as far as practicable, be carried out.

THE CASE OF MICHAEL CRONIN.

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to the case against Michael Cronin, indicted at the Cork Assizes on the 21st instant on the charge of having stolen four head of cattle, the property of the Earl of Kenmare, in which the accused defended himself on the ground that it was an act of reprisal on the Earl of Kenmare for having made three distrains of his father's cattle; and was the case tried under the Criminal Law and Procedure Act, and what was the result of the trial; and, if so, why was it not tried under the ordinary law?

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): I am informed that the suggestion contained in the first paragraph of the question was put forward on behalf of Cronin. The accused, however, pleaded guilty to the charge of larceny, and was sentenced to three months' imprisonment, and was bound over to be of good behaviour for three years. Two seizures were made in respect of four years' arrears of rent. The venue was changed to the City of Cork, but the case was investigated by the Magistrates, and subsequently dealt with at the Assizes under the ordinary law.

KINSALE PIER LOAN.

MR. FLYNN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, in connection with the construction of Kinsale Pier, what was the amount of the original sum advanced by the Board of Works; if he can state at what rate was the amount to be repaid, naming principal and interest; what rate of interest was charged on the loan; and how much has been paid by the Kinsale Town and Harbour Commissioners?

*SIR J. GORST: The sum advanced was £11,352 15s. 1d.; £630 of this principal sum was repaid, leaving a balance of £10,722 15s. 1d. This sum, with £337, arrears of interest at five per cent., constitutes the total of £11,059 15s. 1d. to be repaid under the award. There has been no repayment of principal made under the award; but £700 has been paid in respect of arrears of interest.

MR. FLYNN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give me a copy of his answer, as I was not able to take down the figures?

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD MEDICAL INSPECTORS.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Medical Inspectors of the Board in Wales are unable to speak the Welsh language; and whether, in future appointments of such Inspectors, he will select persons, otherwise well qualified, who will be conversant with the language?

MR. RITCHIE: It is only for the purpose of vaccination inspections that districts are assigned to the Medical Inspectors of the Local Government Board, and officers who act in Wales take English counties as well. As regards the general duties of the Inspectors, it is the practice to select for each inquiry the Inspector who appears to be best fitted for the duty, having regard to the engagements of the other members of the staff. At the same time I may say that in the event of my having to fill up an office where the duties of the officer would chiefly be in Wales, and I had before me two candidates who, apart from the question of the Welsh language, were in all other respects equally well qualified for the position, I should be willing to give the preference to the candidate with a knowledge of the Welsh language.

CONVICTIONS OF CLERGYMEN.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many clergymen of the Church of England have been convicted of treason or felony, or convicted on indictment of a misdemeanour, and sentenced to death or penal servitude or to imprisonment with hard labour during the last seven years; and whether, before the Second Reading of the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill is moved, he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return for such period of seven years showing all such convictions, with particulars of the offences and sentences?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am unable to answer the first paragraph. The Return asked for would involve a lengthy and expensive investigation, and the information is not necessary for the consideration of the Bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It would be convenient for Treasury reasons that the Royal Assent should be given to the Consolidated Fund Bill to-morrow. I therefore move, "That this House do meet To-morrow, at a quarter after Ten of the clock," it being, of course, understood that it will be for the purpose of receiving the Royal Assent, and that no other business will be transacted.

Motion agreed to.

Resolved, That this House do meet To-morrow at a quarter after Ten of the clock a.m.—(MR. A. J. Balfour.)

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman what Supply is intended to be taken to-morrow, and what are the arrangements for taking the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If we are fortunate enough to get the Speaker out of the Chair to-morrow afternoon, we should proceed with the Civil Service Estimates in Committee. The arrangement with regard to Thursday, which I sketched to the House last week, still holds good, and will be for the general convenience of Scotch Members.

Later, the right hon. Gentleman said: I ought, perhaps, to state that I answered the question of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Newcastle on the assumption that we finish the Second Reading of the Indian Councils Bill to-night, of which I have no doubt.

ROYALTIES ON GOLD MINES.

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer a question, of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether is a fact that the royalty on the Morgan Mine has been reduced from one-thirtieth to one-hundredth; that the Government have withdrawn the Sheriff's officers from Mr. Pritchard Morgan's property, and have consented to allow the question of payment of costs to remain in abeyance pending the issue of the Report of the Royal Commission, and whether he has any information as to the alleged dismissal of men from Welsh gold mines?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have, as the result of communications which have passed between myself and the directors of the Morgan Mine, agreed that the royalty charged upon the product of the mine shall be at the rate of 100th until the Commission on Mining Royalties has reported. The ore which has recently been won at the Morgan Mine is of a low grade, and under the sliding scale which has been offered to the directors of the mine, but not accepted by them, would have been charged with royalty at the rate of 100th. I have made this concession, not because the sliding scale which was offered is inequitable, but to secure a modus vivendi until the whole question can be considered in the light of the Report of the Royal Commission. I have, at the request of several Members of the House, consented to postpone the execution upon Mr. Pritchard Morgan's goods; and, in order that this postponement might take place, he has signed a binding agreement undertaking to allow the Sheriff to re-enter under the same writs. I have agreed that this postponement shall be made, not until the Report of the Mining Royalties Commission is received, but to allow time in which the hon. Member may be persuaded to allow better counsels to prevail with him with reference to such payment. I understand that the workmen who have recently been dismissed from the Morgan Mine were not in Mr. Pritchard Morgan's employment, and their dismissal had, as I have been assured by a director, no connection with the steps taken by the Government to recover costs from Mr. Pritchard Morgan.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: May I ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury will be willing to extend to the gold mining industry in Ireland the same terms as those which have been granted to Wales?

MR. GOSCHEN: Under the sliding scale, if there is any mine in Ireland where the hundredth part will secure the working of the mine, I shall be glad to grant the same terms.

SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he will state that it is not intended to take the Small Holdings Bill to-night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I can say that we do not propose to take it before next Monday, and to take it from next Monday as continuously as the business will allow. It is convenient to hon. Members that they should have a little time to put down Amendments.

IRISH LOCAL GOVERNMENT BILL.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to move the Second Reading of the Irish Local Government Bill before Easter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That must depend on the progress of the Committee on the Small Holdings Bill; if we make as much progress as I hope for, we shall take it before Easter.

CLERGY DISCIPLINE BILL.

MR. F. S. POWELL (Wigan): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he intends to proceed with the Clergy Discipline Bill this evening?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope so, if we should finish the Indian Councils Bill in sufficient time to make it worth while to bring it on.

ORDNANCE FACTORIES BILL.

MR. J. MORLEY: When will the right hon. Gentleman go on with the Ordnance Factories Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I may put it down for to-morrow, as the Debate is nearly exhausted.

EVICCTIONS AT GWEEDORE.

MR. MAC NEILL: May I inform the Chief Secretary for Ireland that I have to-day received a telegram from one of the parish priests at Gweedore, and ask him whether it is true that a relieving officer has received notice of the imminent eviction of sixteen families on the estate of Mrs. Orr; and whether, having regard to the fact which I have brought to the notice of the House that the cause of the eviction is merely the question of costs between landlord and tenant, he will not allow the Forces of the Crown to be employed?

*MR. JACKSON: I have no information with reference to this case except that which the hon. Gentleman has just given to me. Of course, I can make no promise as to what protection will be afforded if it be applied for.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman allow me to put documents before him which will show the terrible harshness in the case?

*MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Gentleman desires to put any information before me, of course I will examine it.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

INDIAN COUNCILS ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL—[Lords]—(No. 182.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): I am glad, Sir, at this early period of the Session, to be able to introduce to the notice of the House a Bill which, if carried into law, will, I believe, be fraught with advantage to the interests of our fellow-subjects in India. It is sometimes said, Sir, that this House bestows but a scant and reluctant concern upon the interests of the millions of India. And yet I am not sure that this alleged indifference of the many, if it be true, which I do not altogether accept, is not more than compensated for by the vigilant and uncompromising attention of the few, whilst I have heard it stated on high authority that the greater interference of this House in the government of India might not be a source of unmixed benefit to that country. However that may be, Sir, I hope that this Bill will be one that may approve itself to both sections of opinion in this House—both to those hon. Members who may not have direct and personal experience of India, and to that smaller section who, either from long residence there or from official experience, are emphatically entitled to speak on Indian questions, and whose interference in our debates is always welcome. And perhaps I may be permitted to take this opportunity of expressing the regret which I am sure has been felt on both sides of the House at the disappearance from among their number of the omnivorous intellect of the late hon. Gentleman the Member for Kirkcaldy (Sir George Campbell). The object of this Bill which it is my duty to explain to the House is to widen the basis and to expand the functions of government in India; to give further opportunities than at present exist to the non-official and native elements in Indian society to take part in the work of government, and in this way to lend official recognition to that remarkable development both of political interest and political capacity which has been visible among the higher classes of Indian society since the Government of India was taken over by the Crown in 1858. In form this Bill is one to amend the India Councils Act of 1861. Legislative powers of some sort or other, but powers of somewhat confused character and conflicting validity, have existed in India for a very long time. They existed under the rule of the old East India Company, dating from the times of the Tudor and Stuart sovereigns; but the modern legislative system, under which the Government of India exists, owes its origin to the Viceroyalty of Lord Canning, and the Secretaryship of State of Sir Charles Wood, afterwards Lord Halifax, who in 1861, carried through the House the India Councils Act of that year. I may, perhaps, in starting, be permitted to remind the House briefly of the provisions of that Act, as they are the basis on which we are now attempting to proceed. The Act of 1861 constituted three Legislative Councils in India—the Supreme Legislative Council of the Viceroy and the Provincial Legislative Councils of Madras and Bombay. The Supreme Legislative Council of the Viceroy, or, as it is called in the terms of the Act, the Council “for the purpose of making laws and regulations only,” consists of the Governor General and his Executive Council, with a minimum of six and a maximum of twelve additional Members who are nominated by the Governor General, and of whom at least one-half must be non-official, whether drawn from the European or the native element. The Legislative Councils of Madras and Bombay are also recruited by a minimum of four and a maximum of eight additional Members who are nominated by the Provincial Governor, and of whom at least one-half must be non-official. Since the passing of that Act, Sir, Legislative Councils have been called into existence for Bengal and the North-West Provinces. In Bengal the Council consists of the Lieutenant Governor and twelve nominated Members, and the Council of the North-West Provinces consists of the Lieutenant Governor and nine Councillors, of whom, in each case, one-third must be non-official. Such is the constitution of the legislative machinery which has existed during the past 30 years. This system has undoubtedly worked well. It has justified itself and the anticipations of its promoters. Operating to a very large extent through the agency of special committees composed of experienced persons, it has proved to be an efficient instrument for the evolution of laws. The publicity which has attended every stage of its proceedings has had a good effect. A number of native gentlemen of intelligence, capacity, and public spirit have been persuaded to come forward and lend their services to the functions of Government, and undoubtedly the standard of merit in these Legislative Councils has stood high. Indeed, I would venture to say that few better legislative machines, with regard to their efficacy for the particular object for which they were constructed, are anywhere in existence, nor can better legislation produced by such bodies be found in any other country. At the same time, these Councils have been subject to restrictions and limitations which were intentionally, and I think wisely, imposed upon them in the first place. The House must recognise that they are in no sense of the term Parliamentary bodies. They are deliberative bodies with a comparatively narrow scope, inasmuch as they only assemble for the discussion of the immediate legislation which lies before them, and are not permitted to travel outside that very circumscribed radius. I will take the instance of financial discussion. In these Councils no financial discussion is possible unless there is a proposal for a new tax, and then it can only be in connection with the immediate legislative proposal before the Council for the time being. Under these circumstances it has been felt that there has been wanting to the Government an opportunity of explaining its policy and of replying to hostile criticism and attack, such as a less restricted system of discussion would provide; and that at the same time there was wanting an opportunity to the non-official element, to those who may legitimately call themselves the guardians of the public interest, of asking for information, stating their grievances, and becoming acquainted with the policy of the Government. These feelings have been expressed in many memorials which have been addressed over a large number of years to the Government of India by important public bodies and associations in India. They have been further testified to by successive Viceroys. Lord Dufferin, in a speech which he delivered at Calcutta in February, 1887, the occasion being the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee, spoke of the desirability of reconstituting the Supreme Legislative Council of the Viceroy on a broader basis, and of enlarging its functions. And in the November of the following year he sent home a despatch, extracts from which have been published in a Parliamentary Paper, in which he recommended in the first place a yearly financial discussion in the Supreme Legislative Council of the Budget of the year. And, Sir, inasmuch as his words are of very great importance, and will, of course, carry deserved weight in this House, I hope the House will pardon me if I read some portions of it. Lord Dufferin said:—

"I do not mean that Votes should be taken in regard to the various items of the Budget, or that the heads of expenditure should be submitted in detail for the examination of the Council, but simply that an opportunity should be given for a full, free, and thorough criticism and examination of the financial policy of the Government. Some such change as this would, I think, be as beneficial to the Indian administration as it would be in accordance with the wishes of the European and native mercantile world of India. I present the Government is exposed to a kind of misapprehension and misrepresentation in regard to its figures and the state of their results. Were the matter to be into thoroughly and exhaustively on the occasion I suggest by independent critics, however anxious to detect a flaw and the Government wrong, would be master their subject and cognisant of the intricacies of Indian administration, the result would be more advantageous to the financial reputation of the Indian Government, as well as conducive to improve her financial system than the perfunctory Debates of the House of Commons, and the imperfect criticism of Indian finance by some English newspaper.

In the same despatch Lord Dufferin expressed the opinion that questions should be asked in the Supreme Legislative Council, subject to certain restrictions, upon matters of domestic interest distinguished from matters of Imperial interest. At the end of 1888, Lord Dufferin left India, and was succeeded by the eminent statesman who now holds that office. Quite early in the Viceroyalty, in a speech delivered to the Legislative Council in March 1889, Lord Lansdowne signified his approbation of the annual discussion of the Budget in the manner suggested, and also of the right of addressing questions to the Government on matters of public interest. Both these proposals were accepted by the Secretary of State in a Despatch dated August, 1889, not merely as referring to the Supreme Legislative Council of the Viceroy but also in reference to the Provincial Councils. In the same Despatch my noble Friend also signified his desire for an enlargement of the representation of public opinion in India by an addition to the number of members on these Councils by means of an extension of the present system of nomination, and, inasmuch as these changes were found to be impossible without fresh legislation, he also included a draft Bill upon which he invited the opinions of the Government of India and of the several Provincial Governments. These views and other suggestions were received from India, and they were found on the whole to be eminently favourable to the contemplated measure. From these germs sprang the Indian Councils Bill which it is now my privilege to introduce to the notice of this House. Now, a few words as to the Parliamentary history of this measure. It has been in no ordinary degree a victim to the vicissitudes of Parliamentary existence. Its career up to this point has been one of mingled success and disappointment. It was introduced for the first time in the House of Lords by the Secretary of State in 1890, and a very important discussion—if I may venture humbly to express the opinion, the model of what such a discussion should be—took place on the Second Reading of the Bill. In Committee a number of important and valuable Amendments were introduced in it by noble Lords who have had experience in the Government of India, and it passed through that House. It came down in the same Session to the House of Commons but did not succeed in getting beyond a First Reading. In the ensuing year, 1891, it was again introduced into this House and again it fell a victim to that fate which hon. Members, according to their political feelings, will be disposed to ascribe to the hardships of fortune or to the immoderate interest displayed by their opponents in other topics of Parliamentary interest. So much for 1891. This year the present Bill, in its amended form of 1890, has again been introduced into the House of Lords, and subject to some speeches implying strong approval from a number of noble Lords it has passed without alteration through its various stages, and thus it comes about that it is now my duty to bring it before the House of Commons. This delay which I have been describing has naturally been the source of considerable disappointment in India, where there has been a good deal of murmuring at the tardy arrival of this long-promised reform, and at the apparent willingness of this House to postpone the consideration of a non-controversial Constitutional change for India to the perennial and unprofitable discussion of changes of a highly controversial character for other parts of the Empire nearer home, which, from the Indian point of view are infinitesimally small and unimportant. I think this disappointment has been a perfectly legitimate feeling, and it undoubtedly has been felt by the noble Lord the present

Viceroy of India, who, having inaugurated his term of office by signifying his hearty approval of this Bill, is naturally looking forward to being able to carry it into execution before the termination of his period of office. This anxiety has been shared in this House, if I may judge from the numerous questions addressed to my right hon. Friend who preceded me in the office I now hold. These feelings of disappointment and interest are, moreover, I believe shared by those who hold more extreme views, and who, while they regard this Bill as in some respects an inadequate measure, are desirous that it should pass into law. In July of last year the British Committee of the Indian National Congress, who may be supposed to be the representatives of extreme views in India, wrote a letter to the Secretary of State in which occurs the following passage—

“They express the deep regret with which they view the withdrawal by Her Majesty’s Minister of the Indian Councils Amendment Bill, and respectfully bring to your notice that bitter disappointment will be caused throughout India by the abandonment for yet another year of any action in a matter of such paramount importance to our Indian fellow citizens.”

In the present year Lord Kimberley, who has himself been Secretary of State for India, has elsewhere expressed himself in the same sense in a paragraph which I propose to read. He says—

“I echo most sincerely the hope that this measure will be pressed by Her Majesty’s Government and will pass into law. It is really a misfortune that a measure of this kind should be hung up Session after Session. However important to us may be our domestic legislation, let us not forget that we have an immense responsibility in the Government of that great Empire in India, and that it is not well for us to palter long with questions of this kind. And I am more desirous that this measure should be dealt with, because I have observed, with great pleasure, that in India the tone has much moderated, and that very sensible views have been expressed at meetings held in India, and there is now reasonable promise that there will be an agreement as to a tentative and commencing measure on this subject. We must not look for it all at once, but if we can make a beginning, I believe we shall lay the foundation for what may be a real benefit, and a real security to our Indian Empire.”

I hope I may draw from the extracts I have read to the House, and from the expressions of opinion to which I have alluded, the inference that this Bill will be welcomed on both sides of this House, and subject to the expression of opinion by those who hold more advanced views, will as rapidly as possible be passed into law. So much in explanation of the history of the measure and the circumstances under which it falls to my lot to introduce it to this House. Now briefly turning to the Bill itself I will give an outline of the manner in which it is proposed to carry out the recommendations of successive Viceroys and of the present Secretary of State. The changes which it is proposed to introduce by this Bill are broadly speaking three in number. The first is the concession of the privilege of financial criticism both in the Supreme and Provincial Councils; the second the privilege of interpellation or the right of asking questions; and the third an addition to the number of Members in both classes of Councils. First, as regards the financial discussion. I have already pointed out to the House that under the existing law this is only possible when the Finance Minister proposes a new tax. At other times the Budget in India is circulated in the form of a pamphlet and no discussion can take place upon it at all, and as an illustration of the practical way in which this works, I may mention that during the 30 years since the Councils Act of 1861 there have been 16 occasions on which new legislation has been called for and on which discussion has taken place, and there have been 14 on which there has been no discussion at all. In this Bill power will be given for a regular annual discussion of the Budget both in the Supreme and Provincial Councils. It is not contemplated, as the extracts I have read from the Despatch of Lord Dufferin will show, to vote the Budget in India item by item in the manner in which we do it in this House, and to subject it to all the obstacles and delays which Party ingenuity or loquacity can suggest. That is not contemplated, but it is proposed to give opportunities to Members of the Councils to indulge in a full, free and fair criticism of the financial policy of the Government, and I think all Parties will gain by such a discussion. The Government will gain, because they will have an opportunity of explaining their financial policy, of removing misapprehension, of answering calumny and attack; and they will also profit by the criticism delivered in a public position, and with a due sense of responsibility, by the most competent Representatives of non-official India. The native community will gain, because they will have the opportunity of reviewing the financial situation independently of the mere accident of legislation being required for any particular year, and also because criticism of the financial policy of the Government, which now finds its vent in anonymous and even scurrilous articles in the newspapers, will be uttered by responsible persons in a public position. Lastly, the interests of finance themselves will gain by this increased publicity, and by the stimulus of a vigorous and instructive scrutiny; and the application of the external aid that I have described cannot have any other result than the promotion of sound and economical administration in India. It is now 20 years since Lord Mayo, that wise and enlightened Viceroy, first proposed the submission of Provincial Budgets to the Provincial Councils. At that time he was overruled by the Government at home, which, I believe, was one of the Governments of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. However that may be, I hope both sides of the House will now co-operate in introducing this change, which speaks for itself, and requires no further defence from me. The second change introduced by the Bill is the concession of the right of interpellation, or of asking questions. That is a system with which we are tolerably familiar, and which is sometimes severely attacked in this House. It is not for me to say whether the right is or is not abused, but I have observed that those who denounce the system most savagely when they are its victims, view it with a benevolent regard when they are in a position to become its masters. It is proposed to give to Members of both classes of Councils, the Supreme and Provincial Councils, this right of asking questions on matters of public interest. But both this privilege and the one to which I have previously alluded will be subject, under the terms of the Act, to such conditions and restrictions as may be prescribed in rules made by the Governor General or the Provincial Governors. In answer to the hon. Gentleman who cheers somewhat ironically, I may observe that we are not altogether unfamiliar with such rules and restrictions in this House, and if they are needed here, where we have, perhaps, the most perfect and highly elaborated system of Parliamentary Government that has ever been known, how much more will they be needed in India, where Parliamentary institutions cannot be said to exist. The merits of this proposal are self-evident. It is desirable in the first place in the interest of the Government, which is at the present moment without the means of making known its policy, or of answering criticism or animadversions, or of silencing calumny, and which has frequently suffered from protracted misapprehension, which it has been powerless to remove; and it is also desirable in the interests of the public, who, in the absence of correct official information, are apt to be misled, and to entertain erroneous ideas, but who, within the limits dictated by the judgment of the responsible authorities, will henceforward have opportunities of making themselves acquainted with the real facts. I hope this liberty may provide a wise and necessary outlet in India for feelings which are now apt to smoulder below the surface because there are no public means for their expression, but which might often be allayed a little if timely information were given from the right quarter. The third proposal is to add to the number of Members on these Supreme and Provincial Councils, and I will state the numbers to which, under this Bill, the Members will be increased. The Supreme Legislative Council consists at present, in addition to its ex officio Members, who number seven, of a minimum of six and a maximum of twelve nominated Members, of whom half must be non-official. The Bill proposes to raise the minimum to ten and the maximum to 16. The Madras and Bombay Councils now consist, independently of their four ex officio Members, of a minimum of four and a maximum of eight nominated members, of whom half are non-official. In the Bill the minimum is raised to eight and the maximum to 20. The Council of Bengal consists at present of twelve nominated Members, of whom one third are non-official, and we propose to raise the number to 20. In the North-West Provinces the number is nine, of which one-third are also non-official, and under the Bill the number will be raised to 15. The object of these additions is very easily stated, and will be as easily understood by this House. It is, by extending the area of selection in each case, to add to the strength and representative character of the Councils. The late Mr. Bradlaugh, who at different times introduced two Bills dealing with the reform of the India Councils into this House, proposed in those measures to swell the numbers on these Councils to quite impracticable and unmanageable proportions. Under his first Bill their totals would have amounted to more than 260, and under the second to more than 230. It is within the knowledge of everyone who is acquainted with India that the number of persons who are competent and willing to take part in the functions of these Councils is nothing like adequate to supply the extravagant expectations of those Bills.

MR. SCHWANN: Do the figures just quoted refer to the Councils separately or are they clubbed together?

*MR. CURZON: I was speaking of the five Councils I have mentioned and the totals for those five Councils. As I was saying, you could not get the number of persons; but still, the number is sufficient to justify a not inconsiderable addition to the present totals. Every year the number of native gentlemen in India who are both qualified and willing to take part in the work of Government is increasing, and every year the advantage of their co-operation increases in the same ratio. More especially in the case of the Provincial Councils it has been found that more effective means are needed of reinforcing native and non-official opinion. The Government believe that this moderate addition which they propose to the numbers will have the effect which I contemplate, and at the same time that it will be compatible with efficiency. This House does not need to be told by me that the efficiency of a deliberative body is not necessarily commensurate with its numerical strength. We have instances in this country of public bodies prevented from working well in consequence of the large number of their members. Overlarge bodies do not necessarily work well. They do not promote economical administration, but are apt to diffuse their force in vague and rapid talk. And if this be true of deliberative bodies in England it is still more true of deliberative bodies in a country like India. I hold in fact that it would be better that competent men should be left outside than that incompetent men should be included. Now we will look at the question of how these additional Members are to be appointed. I notice that the hon. Member for North Manchester (Mr. Schwann) has placed on the Paper an Amendment declaring that no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle will prove satisfactory. But in reply I should like to point out that our Bill does not exclude some such principle, be the method election, or selection or delegation or whatever be the particular phrase that you desire to employ. I would with the permission of the House read the very important Sub-section of Clause 1, which deals with that question:—

"The Governor General in Council may from time to time with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council make such regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations (that is the nomination of additional Members), or any of them, shall be made by the Governor General, Governors and Lieutenant Governors respectively, and shall prescribe the manner in which such regulations should be carried into effect."

I should say that this clause was introduced into the Bill as an Amendment by Lord Northbrook in the House of Lords, and was gladly accepted by the Secretary of State with the avowed object of giving considerable latitude in this respect. Let me call the attention of the hon. Member to the fact that Lord Kimberley has thus expressed himself elsewhere on this Clause:—

"I am bound to say that I can express my own satisfaction because I regard this as to a certain extent an admission of the elective principle."

Mr. Curzon

On another occasion he said:—

"I myself believe that under this clause it will be possible for the Governor General to make arrangements by which certain persons may be presented to him, having been chosen by election if the Governor General should find that such a system can properly be established."

MR. MAC LEAN (Oldham): Does the Government accept this view of Lord Kimberley?

*MR. CURZON: Undoubtedly the opinions expressed by Lord Kimberley are those which are also shared by the Secretary of State. Under this Act it would be in the power of the Viceroy to invite Representative Bodies in India to elect or select or delegate representatives of themselves and of their opinions to be nominated to those Houses, and thus by slow degrees, by tentative measures, and in a matter like this measures can not be otherwise than tentative, we may perhaps approximate in some way to the ideal which the hon. Member for North Manchester has in view. With respect to the character of such Bodies and Associations as those to which I have alluded, I may mention, only as indicating what may be possible, such Bodies as the well-known Association of the Zemindars of Bengal, the Chambers of Commerce of India, the Municipalities of the Great Cities, the Universities, the British India Association, and perhaps even more important than any, the various great religious denominations in that country. I believe that the House will hold that this method of dealing with the question is a wise method, since it leaves the initiative to those who are necessarily best acquainted with the matter and does not lay down any hard-and-fast rule by which they may find themselves unfortunately bound. I cannot myself conceive anything more unfortunate than that this House should draw up and send out to India a cast-iron elective scheme within the four walls of which the Government would find itself confined, and which, if it proved at some future period inadequate or unsuitable, it would be impossible to alter without coming back to this House and experiencing all the obstacles and delays of Parliamentary procedure in this country. But I am well aware that these proposals may not altogether suit those hon. Members on the other side, whose ideas of political progress have been formed in the breathless atmosphere of life in the West, and who are perhaps unable to accommodate their pace to the slower movement of life in the East. The hon. Member (Mr. Schwann), for instance, is anxious to have the elective principle more clearly defined and more systematically enforced, and he has placed an Amendment on the Paper, in which he asks the House to signify its opinion that no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle, will be satisfactory to the Indian people, or will be compatible with the good government of India. I venture to say, Sir, that this Amendment is vitiated by a two-fold fallacy, for while, in the first place, the hon. Member affects to speak on behalf of the Indian people, he at the same time entirely ignores the primary conditions of Indian life. When the hon. Member assumes in this House to be the mouthpiece of the people of India, I must emphatically decline to accept his credentials in that capacity. No system of representation that has ever been devised, no system of representation that the ingenuity of the hon. Member can suggest, no system of representation that would stand the test of 24 hours' operation, would, in the most infinitesimal degree, represent the people of India. Who are the people of India? The people of India are the voiceless millions who can neither read nor write their own tongues, who have no knowledge whatever of English, who are not perhaps universally aware of the fact that the English are in their country as rulers. The people of India are the ryots and the peasants, whose life is not one of political aspiration, but of mute penury and toil. The plans and policy of the Congress Party in India would leave this vast amorphous residuum absolutely untouched. I do not desire to speak in any other than terms of respect of the Congress Party of India. That Party contains a number of intelligent, liberal-minded, and public-spirited men, who undoubtedly represent that portion of the Indian people which has profited by the educational advantages placed at their doors, and which is more or less imbued with European ideas;

but as to their relationship to the people of India, the constituency which the Congress Party represent cannot be described as otherwise than a minute and almost microscopic minority of the total population of India. At the present time the population of British India is 221,000,000; and of that number it has been calculated that not more than from 3 to 4 per cent. can read or write any one of their native tongues; considerably less than 1 per cent—about one-fourth or one-third—can read or write English. In the Province of Bengal alone, where the population exceeds 72,000,000, it has been calculated that the maximum constituency created by Mr. Bradlaugh's Bill would have only numbered a total of 870,000. It appears to me that you can as little judge of the feelings and aspirations of the people of India from the plans and proposals of the Congress Party as you can judge of the physical configuration of a country which is wrapped up in the mists of early morning, but a few of whose topmost peaks have been touched by the rising sun. To propose an elaborate system of representation for a people in this stage of development would appear to me to be, in the highest degree, premature and unwise. To describe such a system as representation of the people of India would be little better than a farce. The Government assume the responsibility of stating that, in their opinion, the time has not come when representative institutions, as we understand the term, can be extended to India. The idea of representation is alien to the Indian mind. We have only arrived at it by slow degrees ourselves, through centuries of conflict and storm. Nay, it may be said that it is only within the last 25 years that we have in this country entered into anything like its full fruition. No doubt we are apt to regard popular representation as the highest expression of political equality and political freedom; but it does not necessarily so present itself to those who have no instinctive sense of what political equality is. How can you predicate political equality of a community that is sundered into irreconcilable camps—("No!")—into irreconcilable camps by differences of caste, of religion, of custom, which hold men fast-bound during their life-time, and the rigour of which is not abated even beyond the grave? I notice that the hon. Member has altered the terms of the Amendment as it was originally placed upon the Paper. At first he spoke of the elective principle as defined at the meetings of the Indian National Congress. But those words are now omitted. I think that that is a prudent omission. For the truth is that the Indian Congress is not of one mind, and does not speak with one voice on this matter. In 1890 we had a Bill containing an elaborate system of electoral colleges and proportional representation, and overgrown Councils, presented to this House; but in the following year this Bill was incontinently withdrawn, and has never been heard of since. And in that year Mr. Bradlaugh—of whose Parliamentary ability no one could have any doubt—introduced another Bill entirely different, in which he showed such extreme diffidence in himself and in the Indian National Congress, and such confidence in the Indian Government, that, although it contained expressed provisions for a system of election, the means by which that system was to be carried out were left entirely to the discretion of the latter. These ambiguous, fluctuating, and hesitating proposals illustrate the premature and experimental character of every reform hitherto advocated. But while these considerations render it, I believe, impossible so to re-model the Legislative Councils of India as to give them the character of Representative Chambers, I should be the last to deny the importance of the opinions and the criticism of gentlemen representing the advanced phases of Indian society. At present the sole vent that is available for that body of opinion is in the native Press, and in organised meetings such as the Indian National Congress. Everybody on both sides of the House agrees that this knowledge and activity might be better utilised than it is at present; and the Government believe that the sub-section of Clause 1 will provide the means by which representatives of the most important sections of native society may be appointed to the Councils, and may have an opportunity of explaining their views with a fuller sense of responsibility than they at present enjoy. If the Government are able at present to go no further it arises from no want of sympathy with the inhabitants of India, but from a sense of the colossal responsibility that rests upon them, and of the dangers that would accrue from any rash or imprudent step. This Bill is not, perhaps, a great, or heroic measure; but, at the same time, it does mark a decisive step, and a step in advance. As such it has been welcomed by every living Viceroy of India. It was foreshadowed by Lord Dufferin; it is earnestly asked for by Lord Lansdowne; and it has received the emphatic approval of Lord Northbrook, no less than the approbation of Lord Ripon. I hope that these facts, and the explanation which I have given, may commend this Bill to the sympathy of the House, that it may be regarded as a useful measure, and may be exempt from the ordinary Parliamentary obstacles and delays. There are two main objects which this House is entitled to require in any new legislation for India. Firstly, that it should add to, and in no sense impair, the efficiency of Government; and, secondly, that it should also promote the interests of the governed. It is because I believe this measure will further both those ends, that I commend it to the sympathetic attention of the House, and will conclude by moving that the Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Mr. Curzon.)

*(5.40.) MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to move as an Amendment:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle will prove satisfactory to the Indian people, or compatible with the good government of India.”

I beg to assure the House that I move this Amendment in no Party spirit. I think that in the presence of 285,000,000 of our fellow-subjects in the East it would be wrong of anyone to touch on a subject so nearly allied with their interests in anything but the most judicial and impartial spirit. At the same time I feel it incumbent upon me to move this Resolution, because I believe the Bill itself will not answer in any way the expectations, the desires, and the aspirations of the Indian people. We have heard the history of this Bill for the last three or four years. It seems to have been wilfully strangled by its present parents. I repeat that I hope it will not be accepted by this House, as it certainly will not be accepted by the Indian people as anything like even an instalment of what they desire, of what they require, and of what is necessary for their happiness. The fact is that the Bill contains, it seems to me, but a very slight trace of the elective principle. The hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill says that Clause 4, which is the only one which can be credited in any way with an admission of the principle, is one which will limit the number of representative Members to a number of gentlemen nominated as heretofore by the Viceroy. Now, Sir, I think the Indian people have a right to receive from this House a more determined expression of their opinion, and that representation which is merely nomination by the highest officials of India is not sufficient, and is inadequate at the present moment. The hon. Gentleman has referred to the year 1861 and to the proposals which were made by the Government of India at that day and which exist at present. Well, but 30 years have elapsed since that date, and what was quite adequate for India at that time is entirely inadequate for the India of to-day. The fact is, India, as the hon. Gentleman said, has slumbered long. We all remember the words of the late Mr. John Bright uttered in the Manchester Town Hall many years ago, when he said that India in face of the English people was dumb. But the Indian people have since that time found a voice, and may be considered, to a large extent, a nation. I am quite willing to admit, as the hon. Gentleman has said, that India consists of a number of races, with different creeds, different customs, and differing even in colour. At the same time, we must not forget that the English nation consists of more than one race, and that it is almost impossible to find any nation with absolute purity of race and of origin. The Indian people, I maintain, have to a very large extent now attained to a clear idea of nationality, and I think this has taken place through the instrumentality of the English language, of commerce, of education, of a free Press, and of the right of free meeting. The hon. Gentleman has spoken of India as if it was entirely sunk in ignorance at the present day. I should like the House to remember that there are five Universities at the present moment in India. At the present moment at Oxford there are at least 20 Indian students; at Cambridge there are 20 Indian students. At the Universities of Edinburgh and London there are a large number of Indian gentlemen who are preparing to return to India, after receiving a thorough English education; and when they go back again they will find a large number of men who have already passed through the English Colleges, and who are perfectly able to understand the value of political privileges and views through our Western ideas. At one time the Punjaabee could not understand the Madrassee, nor the Bengalee speak with the Mahrattée. Now a large number of men of these various races of the Indian people are able to confer with one another, to exchange their ideas, and to act together for political purposes. The very condition of things which I have pointed out as existing to-day was foreseen by some of our statesmen of former times. Lord Macaulay, in a memorable speech, says—

“It may be that the public mind of India may expand under our system until it has outgrown that system; that by good government we may educate our subjects into a capacity for better government; that, having become instructed in European knowledge, they may, in some future age, demand European institutions. Whether such a day will ever come I know not; but never will I attempt to avert or to retard it. Whenever it comes it will be the proudest day in English history. To have found a great people sunk in the lowest depths of slavery and superstition, to have so ruled them as to have made them desirous and capable of all the privileges of citizens, would, indeed, be a title to glory all our own.”

Well, I have said that India has a national voice, and that voice, to a large extent, is the Indian National Congress. The hon. Gentleman who introduced this Bill has said that India consists of a great number of races who are hostile to one another; but is it not strange that in the Indian National Congress you will find Representatives of all the races of India, acting together for political ends with the greatest harmony, with the greatest loyalty to the Crown, and with great advantage, I submit, to the questions which interest the Indian people. You will find amongst the Members of the National Congress Hindoos, Mussulmans, Parsees, Christians, Jains, Sikhs, &c., &c., and other races. Some of them travel thousands of miles, journeying very often three or four days and nights, in order to be present at this National Congress. They often risk even the exclusion from caste, because, in some cases, the crossing of the sea in a ship is sufficient to exclude from caste, in order to be present. Then, the growth of the Congress is phenomenal. In the year 1885 the Congress met in Bombay, and the number of delegates present was 72; in 1886, it met in Calcutta, and the number of delegates was 400; in 1887, it met in Madras, when the number of delegates present had swollen to 607; in 1888, it met in Allahabad, and the number present then was 1,500; in 1889, it met in Bombay, and the number present was 1,590; and, in the year 1890, it met in Calcutta, and then the number of delegates present was 677 (the proportion of delegates to the number of the population having been reduced, because it was found very difficult to offer hospitality to the number of delegates willing to come from the extreme portions of India in order to take part in the Congress) but besides the delegates there were several thousands of spectators present as audience on each occasion. The hon. Gentleman has said that there is a great want in India of men able and willing to take a thorough interest in Indian politics. It seems to me that if you have got such a large number of men as 1,590 delegates to travel across the country under such disabilities and inconveniences as exist in India, it is a proof that there must be a large and capable body of men who are perfectly fit to undertake the performance of political duties for their country. I had the advantage of being present at the meeting of the Indian Congress of 1890, and I have never seen any debate carried on in a more orderly, more loyal, or a more dignified and amicable manner. Everything was conducted exactly with as much regularity as if it had been a meeting of the great Federations of Conservative or Liberal Associations in this country. The only thing that was changed was the beautiful and gorgeous costumes of the delegates, there being a very marked contrast between them and the more prosaic costumes of Western Europe. I should like the House to take note that the Indian Congress when sitting was not confined to the delegates sent from various parts of that vast country. Some six or seven thousand spectators were present, all taking the greatest interest in the proceedings, and showing the same political energy and enthusiasm as would be the case on a similar occasion in England. I should also like to point out that the delegates were all elected in open, free, public meeting; and that, therefore, while we are looking around to see if by any possibility we can introduce a little of the elective principle into India, the elective principle has been already carried on in India to a very large extent, in the most orderly and regular manner, by a large section of the Indian people. Do not let us suppose, therefore, that the principle of election is a new one in India. I should also like to insist upon the loyal spirit shown by the people of India. If the House will allow me I shall read the opening remarks of the Chairman at the meeting of 1891 in December last. He said—

“The keynote of the movement is loyalty to the British Crown and attachment to the British people, to whom India owes its rebirth. The promoters of the movement have a thorough appreciation of the excellent intentions of the Indian Government, and it is their fixed desire and firm resolve to secure by loyal and constitutional means the reforms which are essential to the fruition of those intentions. As loyal subjects of Great Britain we desire the everlasting union of England and India. We know, whoever may misjudge us, that we can render no greater service to either country than by openly declaring what we consider to be unsuitable or defective in the existing administration."

Now, the Indian National Congress, a purely elected body, has gone through the usual forms of criticism. At first it was the subject of ridicule; then threats were used and the Anglo-Indian Press suggested that it should be boycotted and suppressed; and, lastly, it was received and treated with respect, if not cordiality. Lord Lansdowne, with respect to the meeting of 1890, removed a certain interdict which had prevented the Civil servants of the English Crown attending the meeting, even as visitors, up to that date. Lord Lansdowne annulled that interdict, and, speaking in the most handsome and courteous manner of the Congress, said it was perfectly admissible, that it was the expression of the voice of the people, that it was constitutional, and that there was no reason why Civil servants should not attend it as visitors and spectators—though not, of course, as members taking an active part in the proceeding. The English Press has also changed its tone very much as regards the Indian Congress. The English Times, in its notice of the last Indian Congress, treated it with far more courtesy than it had ever done before; and so it is also with other English papers. I do not wish to weary the House with extracts. The Anglo-Indian Press, however, does not treat the Indian Congress in the same friendly spirit. But you might almost as well expect the Orange Press in Ireland to be fair and impartial to the hon. Member for North-East Cork (Mr. W. O'Brien) as to expect the Anglo-Indian Press to deal fairly with the Indian National Congress. The House may be surprised to hear that there are 755 Municipalities in India, and about 892 Local Boards—in all 1,647 institutions of a municipal character. A certain proportion of the members of these Bodies are nominated, but a large number—the majority—of them are elected by the people in open meeting. These Bodies have control of Rs7,000,000, and they have the charge of all municipal business, including streets, roads, water supply in all cities and most towns, of local roads, schools, hospitals, dispensaries, and sanitary improvements, and of harbour works, port approaches, and pilotage. Officials testify to the great interest shown in the election. One report states: "At the contested elections in Murabganj 96 per cent. and in Jalesar 89 per cent. of the registered electors appeared at the polls and voted." At Mooltan, in the Punjab, 70 per cent. of the registered voters polled. So keen was the contest that the successful candidate won by one vote only. The average attendance of Members of Municipalities of the united Provinces was 63 per cent. of the whole number, and in one town exceeded 90 per cent. I now turn to the main question which is before the House—that of the application of the elective principle to the Vice-regal and the Provincial Councils. What did Lord Dufferin say in his Jubilee speech with regard to it? He said—

"Wide and broad indeed are the new fields in which the Government of India is called upon to labour—but no longer, as of aforetime, need it labour alone. Within the period we are reviewing, education has done its work, and we are surrounded on all sides by native gentlemen of great attainments and intelligence, from whose hearty, loyal, and honest co-operation, we may hope to derive the greatest benefit. In fact, to an Administration, so peculiarly situated as ours, their advice, assistance, and solidarity are essential to the successful exercise of its functions. Nor do I regard with any other feelings than those of approval and goodwill their natural ambition to be more extensively associated with their English rulers in the administration of their own domestic affairs."

This is a complete answer to the plea of the Under Secretary that it was impossible to find in India native gentlemen worthy and capable of taking places in the higher Councils of India. This was confirmed by Lord Dufferin in another speech which he made in 1887, when he said—

"Glad and happy should I be if during my sojourn among them (the people of India) circumstances permitted me to extend and to place upon a wider and more logical footing the political status which was so wisely given, a generation ago, by that great statesman, Lord Halifax, to such Indian gentlemen as by their influence, their acquirements, and the confidence they inspired in their fellow-countrymen were marked out as useful adjuncts to our Legislative Councils."

Lord Northbrook has also expressed himself in favour of a "properly guarded application of some mode of election."

I understand it is the general feeling of the Indian National Congress that it would be advisable to leave to the Viceroy to propose what method of representation he considers best. Lord Lansdowne has, I believe, not expressed himself as opposed to the elective principle; but it is very difficult indeed to ascertain what really passed between the Viceroy and the Home Government with reference to the question. To a certain extent the knowledge is abroad that Lord Lansdowne sent round proposals to the Lieutenant Governors which received general acquiescence except in one case, as to the introduction of the elective principle as far as regards Provincial Councils. Lord Dufferin actually forwarded a scheme to the Home Indian Office containing this actual proposal, but the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India has had the wisdom to omit this striking proposal when he referred to Lord Dufferin's proposition and programme. It is scarcely necessary for me to refer to Lord Ripon's views upon the question, because we all know that his Lordship has broad opinions with regard to it; but I may mention that in a speech which he delivered at Edinburgh a short time ago, when some Indian students presented him with a Memorial thanking him for his services to the people of India, he said—

"I do not at all desire to see the early establishment of household suffrage throughout India, and I am sure you will not be surprised when I say so; but what I do wish to see is that there should be infused into the Legislative Councils of that country a reasonable proportion of the representative element, which will enable you, the educated natives of that country, to make your voices really heard by the Government through the Representatives of your own choosing."

Now, there is another Gentleman who sits in this House, and who always takes a distinguished part in the debates which arise upon matters affecting India. He has a thorough knowledge of that country, and his opinion will be received with respect by this

"An hon. Member has referred to the Native Congresses. I may just say that I have long thought that elective Members might be substituted for the appointed Members on the various Legislative Councils. I shall be prepared to bring forward a moderate and practical scheme to give effect to that principle on the proper occasion."

I am delighted to have that testimony from the hon. Baronet—his opinion is of real value. I must apologise to the House for perhaps wearying it with so many extracts, but I think the House is more likely to value the opinions of such eminent authorities rather than the impressions of a humble Member of the House like myself, but I am now coming to a conclusion. First, however, let us see what the author of Greater Britain (Sir Charles Dilke) has to say upon the question. He writes—

"But the National Congress does not ask for their political enfranchisement. It asks for the general introduction into the provincial institutions of the country, which already exist, of that elective principle which we have ourselves, by Governmental action, introduced into the Municipalities. In this I think the movement wise. To my mind, British rule itself in India will be strengthened by widening its base, by the development of municipal and other elective institutions, and by the representation of these elective bodies upon Provincial Councils."

I would further like to read a short extract from a book called New India, written by Mr. H. J. Cotton in 1886. In this book Mr. Cotton states that his father and his grandfather had been for 60 years in the Indian Service, he himself for 25 years and is so still, and he disclaims the slightest disloyalty to it; but he thinks it his duty, as a servant of India and of the Empire, to express freely his sentiments. He says—

"The constitution of these Councils has lately attracted much attention in the Native Press, and I sincerely trust that public opinion will not cease to express itself on the subject until some radical and thorough reform has been effected. It is not too much to say that the present constitution of the Legislative Council is the merest farce. Not only do officials predominate to an extent which absolutely precludes the possibility of any independent action, but these officials consist almost entirely of individuals who, from the very position they hold, are unable to display depends for his prospects in the service. The excellent and faithful agents of the rich and powerful zemindars, who now enjoy a seat in the Bengal Council, would as soon bite off their tongues as place themselves in opposition to Sir Rivers Thompson. No blame to them. They act in accordance with the antecedents of their own order, and of their fellow-countrymen of the old style. The very essence of their creed is subservience to authority. Is there one among their friends and associates who would justify their action if they were to place themselves in opposition?"

We may be sure of one thing, that the Indian people will continue to make claims which will be irresistible because they are just and reasonable, and that we must be prepared for some changes if we really mean to carry out the reforms which are required. The House of Commons has, in the past, not taken a great deal of interest in Indian affairs, but I must say that when it has interfered with regard to them, it has, as a rule, according to my experience, been for the benefit of India. Therefore I can recommend it to use its powers on this occasion. I submit that if the Manipur question had been submitted to the House, much gratuitous mischief would have been prevented. Its interference with the Opium Traffic and "Abkari" have been fraught with good, also the discussion on the restoration of the Maharajah of Cashmere was not useless. Perhaps the House is not aware that that Prince was restored to the Throne a few weeks ago by the Viceroy on his late journey to Cashmere. I do not propose to go into these matters on the present occasion. The question now to be dealt with is the constitution of the Legislative Council. It is proposed that there shall be four additional Members. It seems to me that that is a totally inadequate addition, looking to the number of Members on the Viceregal Council. It is evident that the question is one which deserves the greatest attention. I think that the best rampart we could have against a Russian invasion is the loyalty and attachment of a happy and contented people. I have produced a great deal of weighty evidence, not of Radical Members of Parliament, nor of pushing Babus, but of men who have borne the burden of the Viceregal power, with regard to the question, and the House will be able to judge for itself whether India is ripe for a further extension of the elective principle. This House ought not and cannot throw its responsibility on the shoulders of any Viceroy or any official, however high-minded he may be. I have, therefore, great pleasure in moving my Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, no reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle will prove satisfactory to the Indian people or compatible with the good government of India,"—(Mr. Schwann,) —instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I should wish if in my power to curtail this Debate, so far at any rate as any controversial element is concerned. I do not speak of the information, the knowledge and the experience which may be brought into this Debate by Members competent to enter into an examination of Indian affairs, but so far as controversy is concerned I should hope it may be compressed within narrow limits. We have before us a Motion on the part of the Under Secretary of State for India that this Bill be now read a second time. We have on the other hand before us the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for Manchester (Mr. Schwann), who asks the House by that Amendment to declare that in his opinion—

"No reform of the Indian Councils which does not embody the elective principle will prove satisfactory to the Indian people or compatible with the good government of India."

Well now, Sir, I ask myself the question whether there is between the Bill now before us, and the Amendment of my hon. Friend such a difference of opinion or of principle as to make me desirous of going to an issue in respect of that difference. Undoubtedly, Sir, if I look at the Bill I am disposed to agree with my hon. Friend that taken by itself its language is unsatisfactory in so far as it is ambiguous; but then, Sir, I have the advantage of an authoritative commentary. The hon. Gentleman the

Under Secretary of State for India has introduced this Bill to our notice in a very comprehensive and lucid speech. If I were to criticise any portion of that speech it would be the portion in which the hon. Gentleman addressed himself to the consideration of the Amendment before the House. It appeared to be his object, or at all events I thought it was the effect of his language, to put upon that Amendment the most hostile construction it could bear, whereas I desire to put on the speeches that we have heard on the Bill not the most hostile, but the least hostile and least controversial construction to which they are susceptible. Now, Sir, while the language of the Bill cannot be said to embody the elective principle, yet, if it is not meant to pave the way for the elective principle, it is in its language very peculiar indeed. It was, I believe, suggested by a Nobleman in the House of Lords, friendly to the elective principle, that unless it were intended to leave room for some peculiarities not as yet introduced in the Indian system in the appointment of the Members of the Indian Councils under this Bill, it would have been a very singular form of speech to provide, not simply that the Governor General might nominate, but that he might make regulations as to the conditions under which such nominations, or any of them, might be made either by himself or by the Governor General in Council. It is quite plain that those who framed that language, and we must assume also those who adopted that language and have sent for our consideration a Bill couched in such language, had in view something beyond mere nomination. Now, Sir, I come to the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India. That speech appeared to me, I confess, to distinctly embody what is not very different from the assertion of my hon. Friend in his Amendment, except as to this important point—that the Under Secretary proposes to leave everything to the judgment, the discretion, and the responsibility of the Governor General of India and the authorities in India; but, otherwise, apart from limitation, I think I may fairly say what the

hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary did embody in his speech was the elective principle in the only sense in which he could be expected to embody it. My construction of that speech is—and I do not think it admitted of two constructions, especially considering the reference the hon. Gentleman made to the speeches of Lord Kimberley—my construction of that speech is that it is the intention of the Government and the intention of the House of Lords, in which we are now invited to concur, that a serious effort shall be made to consider carefully those elements which India in its present condition may furnish for the introduction into the Councils of India of the elective principle. Now, Sir, if that effort is seriously to be made, by whom is it to be made? I do not think it can be made by this House except through the medium of empowering provisions. The hon. Baronet the Member for one of the Divisions of Worcester (Sir R. Temple) has spoken at some period of proposing a plan of that kind; and I have observed on more than one occasion with pleasure, the genuinely liberal views of the hon. Baronet, with respect to Indian affairs and to the Government of the Indian people; and were he to produce a plan of that kind, I have no doubt it would contain a great deal that was wise, a great deal that was useful, and a great deal that would be honorable and agreeable to the spirit of an Assembly such as this. But I doubt if, even under such enlightenment, it would be well or wise on our part, with our imperfect knowledge, to proceed with the determination of the particulars of any such plan. The best course we could take would be to commend to the authorities of India what is a clear indication of the principles on which we desire them to proceed. It is not our business to devise machinery for the purpose of Indian Government; it is our business to give to those who represent Her Majesty in India ample information as to what we believe to be sound principles of Government; and it is of course the function of this House to comment upon any case in which we may think they have failed to give due effect to those principles; but in the discharge of their high administrative functions, or as to the choice of means, we should leave that in their hands. It would be a great misfortune if, with imperfect information, we were to indicate leanings which might tend to embarrass them in the discharge of the duties of an office so highly responsible. It is quite evident, without any disparagement to the remarks of my hon. Friend, that the great question we have before us—the question of real and profound interest—is the question of the introduction of the elective element into the Government of India. That question overshadows and absorbs everything else; it is a question of vital importance, and also, at the same time, a question of great difficulty. Do not let us conceal from ourselves that no more difficult duty has ever been entrusted to a Governor General than the duty of administering such a Bill as this and giving effect to it in a manner honourable and wise. I am not at all disposed to ask from the Governor General or the Secretary of State who has communicated with him and shares his responsibilities—I am not at all disposed to ask them at once to produce large and imposing results. What I wish is, that their first steps shall be of a nature to be genuine, and whatever amount of scope they give to the elective principle, it shall be real. There are, of course, dangers in the way. There is the danger of subserviency; there is another danger, and that is the danger of having persons who represent particular cliques or classes or interests, and who may claim the honour of representing the people of India. The old story of the Three Tailors of Tooley Street does, after all, embody an important political truth, and it does exhibit a real danger. It is to the Governor General's wisdom we must trust to do the very best, and to make the most out of the materials at his disposal. What we want is to get at the real heart and mind—at the most upright sentiment and the most enlightened thought, of the people of India. But it is not an easy matter to do this, although, with regard to the view expressed by the Under Secretary of State for India, I think we are justified in being a little more sanguine than he was as to the amount of these materials. The hon. Gentleman did not indicate where such materials for the elective element in India are to be found. Undoubtedly, Sir, as far as my own prepossessions go, I should look presumptively with the greatest amount of expectation and hope to the Municipal Bodies and the Local Authorities in India, in which the elective element is already included. My hon. Friend who moved the Amendment that is now before the House did valuable service in pointing out the amount of authority that can now be alleged on behalf of the introduction of the elective principle—the authority not merely of men distinguished generally for their political opinions, but of those who have been responsible for the actual administration of India. These men, after carefully examining the matter and divesting themselves of those prejudices which administration is supposed to impart, have given their deliberate sanction to the introduction of this Bill. It is there that I feel we stand on very firm and solid ground, and Her Majesty's Government ought to understand that it will be a most grave and serious disappointment to this House if, after all the assurances we have received from high quarters, that some real attempt will be made to bring into operation this great and powerful engine of government, there should not be some result which we can contemplate with satisfaction. I do not speak of its amount. I think it should be judged by its quality rather than by its quantity. In an Asiatic country like India, with its ancient civilisation, with its institutions so peculiar, with such diversities of races, religions, and pursuits, with such an enormous extent of country, and such a multitude of human beings, as probably, except in the case of China, never were before comprehended under a single Government, I can well understand the difficulties that confront us in seeking to carry out our task. But, great as the difficulties are, the task is a noble task, and one that will require the utmost prudence and wisdom to carry it to a successful consummation. But we may feel, after the practical assurances we have had from persons of the highest capacity and the greatest responsibility, we may feel justified in expecting something more than a merely nominal beginning in this great and magnificent undertaking. It is not too much to say that this great people—this nation to which we belong—has undoubtedly had committed to it a most peculiar task in the foundation and the government of extraneous territories. But all other parts of the British Empire present to us a simple problem in comparison with the problem which India presents. Its magnitude and its peculiarities are such as to lift the function of Great Britain in this respect far above all that any other country has ever attempted, and far above all it has itself attempted beyond the sea in any portion of the Dependencies of the Empire. I rejoice to think that a great and a real advance has been made, both before and especially since the time of the transfer of the Indian Government to the immediate superintendence of the Executive at home and the supreme authority of the Imperial Legislature. The amount of progress they made has been made by the constant application to the Government of India of the minds of able men acting under a strong sense of duty and also under a strong sense of political responsibility. All that has so far taken place induces us to look forward cheerfully to the future in the expectation that if there should be a real success in the application, the genuine even though limited application, of the elective principle to that vast community, it will be the accomplishment of a task to which it is difficult to find a parallel in history. In these circumstances I deprecate a Division on the Amendment of my hon. Friend. I see no such difference between the Amendment and the language of the Bill as ought to induce my hon. Friend to divide the House. If the language of my hon. Friend is to receive a perfectly legitimate and not a strained construction, it is only an amplification and not a contradiction of what the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary implies. I think it would be a great misfortune if the House were to divide on this subject. There is no difference of principle disclosed, because the acceptance of the elective principle by the Under Secretary, though guarded, and necessarily guarded, was, on the whole, not otherwise than a frank acceptance. I do not think there is on the other side of the House any of the jealousy of the introduction of that principle, which, if it existed, would undoubtedly form a strong mark of difference between the two parties. In reality and in substance we have the same object in view, and we are prepared to recommend the employment of the same means to secure that end. If that be so, it would certainly be unfortunate that any Division should take place which though the numbers might be unequal (I certainly could not take part in any Division hostile or apparently hostile to the Bill) would, after the speech of the Under Secretary, convey a false impression. It is well the people of India should understand the truth—that united views substantially prevail in this House on this matter. My persuasion is that these views are united, and that they are such as likewise tend to the development of an enlightened and so far as circumstances will permit not only of a liberal, but of a free system. While my hon. Friend has done service in bringing this matter forward, he has really no substantial quarrel with the declarations of the Government, and I think he would do well to withdraw his Amendment and allow this Bill to receive the unanimous assent of the House, in the hope that without serious difficulty it may shortly become law, and fulfil the benevolent purposes with which it has been submitted.

*MR. J. MACLEAN (Oldham): The right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has taken advantage of the speech of the Under Secretary of State for India to suggest that there is substantially no difference of principle between the Bill and the Amendment. I hope I may be pardoned for introducing a slight controversial element, but I hardly think the House appreciates the vast and far-reaching importance of the change that it is proposed to introduce into India. I listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. Member for Manchester, because I wished to discover any explanation the hon. Member would give of the elective principle, but I fail to find any such explanation, and I am still at a loss to know in what manner this elective principle will be introduced. Personally, I am not at all opposed to the introduction of some kind of elective principle into the domestic affairs of parts of India. Probably I am the only Member of this House who has taken any part in introducing the elective principle into the local affairs of India. Some 20 years ago Bombay was governed by the advice of a Bench of Magistrates, and it was mainly owing to a motion which I made at a meeting of the Bench of Magistrates that the Government was induced to concede to the people of Bombay the management of their own affairs. Sir Seymour Fitzgerald, who was then Governor of Bombay, sent for me, and asked what system should be set up, and I recommended that household suffrage should be made the basis of an Elective Municipal Council. That proposal was accepted by the Government, and the result has justified the experiment. But although the experiment has succeeded in Bombay, it must be borne in mind that Bombay holds an exceptional position in India. It is a town which somewhat resembles one of the old free cities of the German Empire. Bombay is the second city in the whole of the British Empire in point of population, and the natural beauty of its situation, and the magnificence of its buildings, and the public spirit of its citizens, make it not unworthy of this proud position. In Bombay there is a community which is gathered from all quarters, but among whom English influence prevails. There are not there, as in other parts of India, great nobles who lament the loss of the power they formerly enjoyed; there is not the same strict separation of castes; there is a strong body of Parsees, and certainly there is more freedom there than there is in other parts of India. Whatever may be suited to Bombay is not therefore necessarily suited to other parts of India. What is more, the good feeling which prevailed in the Anglicized Indian communities of 20 years since does not now exist. Lord Ripon broke up the entente cordiale between Europeans and natives, and created the anti-English agitation which now finds expression in the Congress movement.

It is significant that very often nowadays we hear in this House questions addressed to the Government as to whether there are not a great many more Europeans in the public service of the Crown in India than ought to hold those positions; and the Member for South Donegal is frequently asking why the natives are not allowed to occupy the higher positions in the Executive Service. The reply is that the Administration is English, and must be kept under English control. The effect of Lord Ripon's Administration was to put into the heads of the natives the idea that they could govern the country themselves, and exclude the English from any exclusive rule of that country. Then grew up the Congress movement, which begun in 1885, and went on increasing during several years, although latterly it has been on the decline. But that movement cannot be said to represent in any real sense the wishes of the people of India. We know that the Europeans, as a community, all stand aloof from it, although a European here and there of fantastic ideas may give it the benefit of his assistance. Are the Mahomedans in favour of the movement? I have myself presented several Petitions to the House, and so has the hon. Member for South Worcestershire, from most enlightened Mahomedan representative bodies in India protesting against any concession being made to this National Congress movement. The Parsees, as a community, are also opposed to it. In fact, it is only a movement promoted by the Hindoos, and they themselves are divided in their opinion upon it, for many of the most enlightened Hindoos have protested against the movement. The Hindoos are the majority of the people of India, and it is only natural that the Mahomedans should be afraid of what might happen to themselves if they were governed by a Legislative Body containing a majority of men bitterly opposed to them in race and religion. I venture to say that Representative Government has nowhere succeeded where antipathies of race and religion have prevailed. I doubt whether Representative Government has been a success anywhere in the world except in England and some English-speaking communities abroad; and I doubt whether Representative Government could be continued here, or whether we should not be plunged back into civil war if issues of a most vital and fundamental character were raised in this House affecting the Constitution of the country. It is only where there is agreement upon the main foundations of Government that it is possible for representative institutions to succeed. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Schwann) tells us a great deal about the education we have given to the people of India. But merely intellectual education, which does not touch the morals, manners, or habits of a people, cannot change their character or give them that sobriety and robustness of disposition which is essential to the smooth and even working of representative institutions. I suppose the Barons who could not sign their names to Magna Charta might be as trusty statesmen as Burke or Macaulay; and amongst the most illiterate English peasants, who belong to a race that has the love of freedom instinctively in its life-blood, and who understood the principle of self-government and respected the rights of individuals almost before the dawn of history, there are those who would be far more capable of attending to the administration of public affairs than the most cultivated Bengalees who ever discoursed as fluently as the Member for Midlothian himself upon political institutions. In saying this, I, of course, do not wish to cast any reproach on the people of India. They have a civilisation of their own, which in some respects may be perhaps occasionally superior to ours, but you are running a great risk in proposing to transfer a large portion of the administration of India to men like the Bengalees, who have been slaves, nay, the bondsmen of slaves, for fifty generations. That is simply a physiological fact. There is another element of danger in this proposed change, for, if you are going to place real power in the hands of these men, you will disturb the pre-eminence of English rule in India. The hon. Member opposite wishes to do that.

MR. MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg pardon; I do not wish to do anything of the kind, and that observation ought not to pass without instant contradiction. The hon. Member says we wish to disturb English rule in India. We wish to do no such thing, but we wish to make English rule more beneficial to the natives of India.

MR. MACLEAN: There is another point I wish to dwell upon in order to show the danger it would be to the pre-eminence of English rule in India to make a change of this kind. A very great and important change has been made in India during the 14 years in which I have been absent. You have changed the whole political system of India, and shifted the centre of power from Bombay and Calcutta away up to the North-West. That being so, and the system of Government having become more exclusively military than before, what would be the effect of placing the control of the finances or military affairs of India in the hands of men chiefly belonging to the lower Provinces and not to the North-West Provinces at all? Sir Charles Dilke has been quoted as being in favour of this movement promoted by the National Congress. He has written a very interesting book on Greater Britain; but perhaps its defect is that he tries to make friends with everybody all round, and consequently often defends a system in one page which he shows to be utterly impracticable in the other. I will read a sentence in which he refers to the National Congress. He says—

"We are not driven by considerations which touch their happiness to work towards the unity of India, but in the development of the provincial system which ought gradually to create a federal India, except for fiscal and military purposes, the natives must undoubtedly take a leading part."

Do hon. Members appreciate the gravity of the restriction he there places upon the development of the elective principle? He says he is in favour of some advance in the Provincial Councils towards the introduction of the elective principle, but he also says that these Councils are not to touch either finance or military affairs—

"We must have British military supremacy," he adds, "sufficient to preserve peace, and British control sufficient to raise the necessary taxes and to prevent the imposition of Customs" duties. Our first duty in India is that of defending the country against anarchy and invasion.

Nobody can say that a man who writes in these terms can be taken to be in favour of the programme of the National Congress. In another chapter he gives an argument which turns the whole proposal of the hon. Member for Manchester into ridicule, for he says—

“I have formed a distinct opinion that we should cease to enlist men from the unwarlike races. We have already ceased to enlist Bengalees, and I should wish that the same principle should be extended, and that we should no longer enlist men from Southern India. No one would dream of sending Madras, Bombay, or down country infantry regiments against Russians.”

MR. SCHWANN: Is that quotation from the last edition of Sir Chas. Dilke's book? There are two editions of Greater Britain, and the extract I gave is from the edition not three weeks old.

MR. MACLEAN: This is from the Problems of Greater Britain, and not the original book of Sir Chas. Dilke. I may point out that what his opinion really amounts to is that we are bound to preserve in our own hands the military and financial control of India. Now, what would be the result of having a Legislative Assembly in which the natives of Bengal and Madras and Bombay would be in an overwhelming majority as compared with the Representatives of the Punjab and the warlike Northern races? Here you have it confessed that you cannot rely on troops from the Southern districts of India, and yet you are to give the natives of those districts a majority in the Legislative Councils, so that the warlike races are to do all the fighting and the unwarlike races are to hold the power of the purse. Can anybody imagine a more absurd system of government than that, or suppose that British rule would last in India if the warlike races were subjected to a rule of that kind? Hon. Members attempt to minimise the importance of the concession which the National Congress demands; but if you once make this fatal concession, of course the people of India will want the power of the purse also, and they never will be satisfied until they get it. A great deal has been said about Lord

Dufferin's opinion and what ought to be done. He has, no doubt, temporised in some of his Despatches, but we know what he really thought of the Indian National Congress when he made his celebrated speech in Calcutta on 1st December, 1888, in which, describing the promoters of the Congress movement, he said—

“Who and what are the persons who seek to wield such great powers—that would tempt the fate of Phaeton and sit in the chariot of the sun? They are most of them the product of the system of education which we have ourselves carried on during the last 30 years. Out of the whole population of British India, which may be put at 200,000,000 in round numbers, not more than 5 or 6 per cent. can read and write, while less than 1 per cent. has any knowledge of English. Thus the overwhelming mass of the people is still steeped in ignorance. During the last 25 years probably not more than 500,000 students have passed out of our schools with a good knowledge of English; there being perhaps 1,000,000 more with a smattering. Consequently, it may be said that out of a population of 200,000,000 only a very few thousands possess an adequate qualification, so far as an acquaintance with Western ideas or even Eastern learning are concerned, for taking an intelligent view of those intricate and complicated economic and political questions affecting the destinies of many millions of men that are almost daily presented for the consideration of the Government. I would ask, then, how could any reasonable man imagine that the British Government would be content to allow this microscopic minority to control the administration of that majestic and multiform Empire for whose safety and welfare they are responsible in the eyes of God and before the face of civilisation? It appears to me a groundless contention that it represents the people of India. Is it not evident that large sections of the community are already becoming alarmed at the thought of such self-constituted bodies interposing between themselves and the august impartiality of English rule?”

That extract conveys the real sentiment of Lord Dufferin in regard to the aims and intentions of the National Congress. They may be disguised for a time until the British Parliament is deluded into making certain concessions which will pave the way for further concessions, but the aims and intentions are still the same as they were when Lord Dufferin described them in such accurate language. I will say no more in regard to the Amendment, but I should like to make one or two comments upon the Bill brought forward by Her Majesty's Government. When the Under Secretary of State quoted Lord Kimberley's speech in the other House,

I asked whether the Government accepted that statement as describing their intentions in bringing forward this Bill, and I was somewhat surprised that he gave an unconditional assent.

Mr. CURZON: I should say that I did not mean that the language of Lord Kimberley expressed the intentions with which the Government had brought forward this Bill, but on behalf of the Government I did not dissent from the interpretation put by Lord Kimberley upon the possible application of a particular clause.

Mr. MACLEAN: I think that means the same thing. The Government does not exclude the principle of election from this Bill; but it leaves it in the power of the Governor General in Council, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council, to make regulations as to the conditions under which persons shall be chosen for appointment to the Legislative Councils. With all respect to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, I maintain that when Parliament is making a change of this sort it should know exactly what it is doing and should not allow the principle of election to be brought in by a side wind. If we were to pass a measure of that sort we should be playing into the hands of Party Government in regard to India, and none of us would wish to do that in the management of Indian affairs. Let us suppose, for example, that a Liberal Government came into office, and we had Lord Ripon as Secretary of State for India, and Lord Reay as Governor General, would not these two noblemen strain every clause of this Bill for the purpose of introducing an elective system which would suit the views of their friends the Members of the National Congress? It is extremely dangerous to leave such a power to whoever may be Secretary of State or Governor General for the time being; and when this Bill is in Committee I shall propose an Amendment, which I hope the Government will take into their serious consideration, providing that the regulation for the choice of Members of these Legislative Councils which are to be made by the Governor General in Council, with the approval of the Secretary of State in Council, shall be submitted to both Houses of Parliament. It is absolutely essential that if the principle of election is introduced at all, it should have the direct and immediate sanction of both Houses of Parliament, for that is the only way in which we should be able to prevent a dangerous application of the new system. I think the concessions in the 2nd section of this Bill will not satisfy anyone, because practically they lead to nothing. When the Secretary of State for India introduced this Bill in the House of Lords he said it was an unimportant measure; but I look upon it as the most important measure which has been brought forward since the whole constitution of the Government of India was changed after the great Mutiny of 1857. There is no greater danger connected with our Government of India than that we should make it the field for experiment in constitutional changes. It has always seemed to me that there was something profoundly mournful in the poet's description of Venice in the days of her decadence:—

"Once did she hold the gorgeous East in fee,
And was the safeguard of the West."

England is a greater and a nobler Venice, and she "holds the gorgeous East in fee," and is "the safeguard of the West" in a far larger sense than ever Venice was. But if we wish to lose these glorious titles to the respect and admiration of mankind, we cannot take a surer step towards attaining that end than by making India a field for rash and ruinous experiments which strike at the foundations of the Empire acquired and bequeathed to us by the wisdom and valour of our forefathers.

(7.25.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I cannot congratulate the hon. Member opposite on acting on the wise precept laid down by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, that we should refrain from making this Debate of a controversial character. I shall not enter into matters of a controversial character, because the issues at stake are so enormous; but I wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for India for a deliberate statement upon an important point. The right hon. Member for Midlothian accepted to the full the statements of the hon. Gentleman with reference to the admission of the representative principle, and they were made in the presence of Lord Cross who was seated upstairs, and of the Leader of the House, without any expression of dissent or of disapproval being made. But now a thick and thin supporter of the Government accuses the right Member for Midlothian of taking a tactical advantage of the Indian Government. I wish to know whether the Government accepted the principle of representation or not? I believe they have done so, and in that belief I shall modify the speech I intended to make. Four years ago the hon. Member for Oldham made himself unconsciously the agent for stirring up religious animosity between Hindoos and Mahomedans, and his observations in this House were warmly repudiated in the Indian Congress by a Mahomedan gentleman. The hon. Member for Oldham has quoted the substance of Lord Dufferin's speech; but Lord Dufferin, when he delivered it, was under an absolute mistake as to what was aimed at by the National Congress and the Party of reform. He thought they wished to capture the Executive Government, but they wish to do no such thing. If the principle of election were carried out to the fullest extent the Indian Councils would be nothing more than consultative; the Bill has guarded that carefully. It would be possible for the Governor General to destroy all their legislative arrangements or to carry any Statute in the teeth of these bodies. When Lord Dufferin said the Reform Party wished to gain supremacy or controlling power over the Executive Government he misunderstood the change which the representative principle would make. The Indians would not be allowed to legislate; the Councils are consultative and not legislative in the true sense. When I interrupted the hon. Gentleman he misunderstood me, and I tried to explain myself by saying that Englishmen or Europeans ought to leave India if they did not stay there for the benefit of the people. I adhere to that absolutely. The right hon. Member for Midlothian said in his Limehouse speech that our time in India depended on our stay there being profitable to the people, and our making them understand that, and later on he said—

“It will not do for us to treat with contempt or even with indifference the rising aspirations of this great people.”

The right hon. Gentleman has said practically that same thing to-night, and I charge Ministers that they must not deceive themselves in this matter. The Under Secretary said this was not a very great measure; I consider it a great measure, though small compared with what we were promised six years ago. The noble Lord the Member for Paddington (Lord R. Churchill), when a responsible Cabinet Minister, in introducing his Indian Budget in August, 1885, pledged the Government to give full administrative reform to the Government of India. That promise is to be fulfilled by this Bill, which comes down here for consideration, after having been proposed in another place two and a half years ago. The four principles now embodied in the Bill are mainly due to the Indian National Congress, and yet those who at that Congress suggested these very reforms were for years subject to wicked misrepresentation. The Times said in those days that India had been won by the sword and should be kept by the sword. But the feeling on both sides of the House have changed since that, and we endeavour to elevate these suffering millions, and make their lives better. The Quarterly Review said that the Indians are not fit for self-government and called them a race of liars. Professor Goldwin Smith said that the concession of the smallest reform to India would lead to universal anarchy. Lord Salisbury said—

“I do not see what is the use of this political hypocrisy; it does not deceive the natives of India; they know perfectly well they are governed by a superior race.”

As a superior race it is our duty to show mercy to these people. I take it that this Bill gives representation to India, and that the House will not be deceived in the matter. In regard to the theory of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Maclean) as to the selective principle I will give an illustration. A Maharajah of the North West Provinces was appointed a Member of the Supreme Council, and he could not speak a word of English, and was not allowed to have an interpreter. After the meeting a relative asked him how he got on. The reply was—

"At first I found it very difficult, but then there was the Governor General who elected me, and when he raised his hand I raised mine, and when he put his hand down I put down mine."

The Indian Government wants men who will give a fair and independent expression of opinion, who will be backed in their opinion by the knowledge that they represent the feeling of hundreds of thousands of their fellow-subjects, and truly represent their ignorance and prejudices. Edmund Burke said that the statesman would not be worthy of the name of statesman who did not consult the ignorance and prejudices of the people. We want to know what these people think. The hon. Member for North Manchester (Mr. Schwann) quoted a number of authorities in favour of the representative principle; I have studied a great deal of literature on the subject, and have found the most unlikely people in favour of it. In a book which came out in the native tongue, just after the Mutiny, and which was translated by Sir Auckland Colvin in 1887, called The Cause of the Indian Revolt, said that one of the direct causes of the Mutiny was the want of representative institutions. Sir J. Lawrence, in 1864, said that it would be to the advantage of the people of India and of the Government if the people had a voice in their own affairs. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir R. Temple) is in favour of a limited system of representation, and undoubtedly he would have benefited during his administration if he could have had the assistance of Indian gentlemen who were the mouthpiece of many people whom he could never reach. In 1880 a deputation of Indian gentlemen waited on Lord Hartington to press the principle of representation. The Times in 1890 admitted the principle of election, and said—

"There is no doubt of the force of the argument that nomination is not calculated to give the Government the advantage of contact with some of the important factors of Indian society."

Mr. Mac Neill

The differences between Hindoos and Mohammedans were, till the English Government came in, not religious but political, and the great administrator, Akbar, placed religious toleration in the forefront of his programme, making all creeds equal in the sight of the law. The hon. Member for Oldham spoke at some length of the incapacity of the natives for administrative and executive functions, but yet in India there is a perfect system of self-government where the natives have shown to the utmost advantage their powers and capacity for popular self-government. In the French dominion, at Pondicherry, they have full representation. But in India there is a large English and European class, irrespective of the official class—the milling and mining interests are all manned by Europeans—who bitterly complain of the loss of rights and privileges in their new Indian life. The hon. Member for Oldham was wrong in saying that there were not many Europeans who sympathised with the aspirations of the natives. An eminent merchant, Mr. Ewell, took the chair at the Indian National Congress, and he was supported by a large party who complained that Englishmen in India were unrepresented. Everyone who is not an official is debarred from having any voice in the management of public affairs; that ought not to be. It is not good that Englishmen should be deprived of their rights, nor is it desirable that natives should be debarred from having a voice in public affairs. The hon. Member talked of the miserable poverty of these people, but that might be made riches and their ignorance knowledge if they could only send people of their own flesh and blood to set before the English people their grievances, and when they understood them they would be delighted to remove them. Mr. Bright in one of his last speeches said that India was governed by despotism, and under this Bill that proposition remains. We want these Councils to be consultative, and surely the Indian Government would be glad to get the best advice, and then to act on their own responsibility. At present no Bill is introduced into the Supreme Council until it has first been submitted to the Secretary of State here, and it cannot be introduced if he vetoes it, and the Councils are official Councils pure and simple at present. There are only about 14 sittings of the Supreme Council at Calcutta, and then it moves to Simla. There, where the non-official Members cannot afford to follow, the greater part of the work is done. I see the First Lord of the Treasury in his place, and I think we are entitled to have from him some statement to the effect that the words of the right hon. Member for Midlothian were a correct view of the intentions of the Government, and that they intended to do their best to secure more representation for the people. I believe when they realise the sufferings of the people the Indian Civil Service act fairly well towards them, and when I spoke in the contrary sense the other day the sufferings of these people were weighing on my mind. I hope if my words reached India that the Gentlemen whom they concern will believe I think they are doing their best, and that they will, if possible, increase their efforts to save the people. It is because I believe the representative principle would better enable the Government to help the people that I am in favour of this Bill.

*(8.33.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I must begin by referring in very thankful terms to the kind manner in which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian alluded to me. He adverted, among other things, to a plan of my own which I have more than once mentioned in this House, and again this evening I have been challenged to say in general terms what it was. My plan always had reference to the Bill before the House and to the rules which, according to it, are to be framed; and it will be found a modest plan and contained in very brief compass. In the first place, I must admit that to formulate any scheme which would in any proper sense represent the population of India is an absolute impossibility. You might theoretically construct a system whereby constituencies could be formed in every district; but that would involve local Parliaments consisting of hundreds of Members, and it would be impossible to say, if such a system were introduced, what sort of men would be elected, and how such bodies would work. In fact, the idea is really a travesty of a responsible Government in India. But because such a representation of the people is impossible in this sense, it does not follow that some moderate scheme within sensible limits might not be propounded. And my plan would be simply this. It is now proposed that 16 additional Members (presumably natives) should be given to the Legislative Council of the Government of India. Well, I suppose they might be elected by 16 selected cities in various parts of the great Indian dominion. Of course I should like to select the cities, and they would be so chosen as to represent as nearly as possible the various sections of the population. It would be essential to provide for a minority representation, and certain cities should be chosen that would evidently elect Mahomedans. All these cities that I should select would be places which had the elective principle in force within them, both for municipal and local purposes, and where, therefore, the idea of election would be familiar to the citizens. To such a scheme as this there is the obvious objection that these cities do not represent the country—that is to say, the country in our sense of the term, as contradistinguished from the town. But, nevertheless, their inhabitants would form fair specimens, samples, and types of the various forms of thought and sentiment that reign in that vast population, and they would be great centres of native thought, activity, and industry. So far there would be, not an adequate, but a limited representation upon a scheme that is perfectly practicable; and because perfect representation of town and country is impossible, that is no reason why we should not have, at all events, some representation of the towns. Then, according to that plan, it would be necessary that the Government should always provide itself with a majority, whether by nominated Members or otherwise. It would not do to leave to elected Members, in such a country as India, anything like control of the legislation and finance. Elected Members would be there to help, not to supersede; but the advantage would be that instead of having nominated Members, you would have men chosen by the suffrages of their countrymen. At present every Governor General or Governor who has a nomination endeavours to choose a man who is a type, a representative; and every man that I myself have ever nominated was exactly the man who would have been elected if there had been an elective principle in force. Now within the moderate compass above described, an elective scheme could be safely and effectually carried out. That is the plan I have always had in my mind; and it is perfectly workable, and also perfectly consistent with this Bill. Although I quite acknowledge that our tenure in India largely depends upon good administration, good management, and conciliation of the people, yet its ultimate basis is upon the sword and on nothing else. Therefore, we must have a majority on the Legislative Council; but, so long as we have a majority, I would like to make the majority as nearly as possible a mirror and a looking-glass of the sentiments of the people. These remarks which I have made with regard to the Governor General's Council might be applied to the various Provincial Councils. In all these provincial areas, I am particularly careful to explain, I would have the various minorities represented, especially the great Mahomedan community. And I must say, with great deference to the hon. Member for North Manchester and the hon. Member for South Donegal, that probably not one of these cities would elect a National Congress man. If they did so, that would only be proof that the majority of the citizens were not taking any interest in the election, and were allowing men to be elected who did not represent the popular opinion. That being my plan, the House will see that it is quite moderate and reasonable; that it starts with small beginnings and is quite compatible with this Bill. I would point ment in India and not arranged by this House. It is impossible for us, sitting as a Committee in this House, to make out an elaborate scheme; we must leave the matter to the Executive Government on the spot, under regulations as provided for in the Bill. Next the hon. Member for Manchester says that no plan will be satisfactory to the people of India which does not specifically include the principle of election. I must repeat that question which has been asked more than once in this House—who are the people of India? How are they represented? The hon. Member evidently thinks that the National Congress represents the people of India. Now, I venture to traverse that statement in the strongest possible manner. The men who propose a new elective Constitution, if British rule were to disappear to-morrow, would be swept into the sea. ("No!") That is my opinion, and I think that any person who understands India will say the same. I do not wish to disparage those who compose the National Congress. They are what we have made them, and no man living has had a greater share than I have had in making them what they are. All I say is that they do not represent the population of India. The hon. Member for Manchester speaks of them as forming a nationality. I cannot imagine any name less applicable to them than that of nationality. That is just what they are not. He said they spoke with the voice of the people of India. Nothing could be more contrary to the fact—their voice is their own and nothing more. The hon. Member said they have great influence over the mass of their fellow-countrymen. They have no influence at all among the mass of the people. They are looked upon as semi-foreigners, having all the faults of foreigners, with, perhaps, few of their merits. They are not popular. No doubt they deserve to be popular; only the people of India do not seem to see it. I quite agree with the hon. Member for Oldham in regard to their position in the country. Everything to elevate them by culture I would do ; but as to giving them political power—they are the very last persons I would select. Until they show greater moderation, greater sobriety of thought, greater robustness of intelligence, greater self-control—all which qualities build up the national character—I, for one, would not entrust them with political power. Therefore, I am not in favour of making any concession to the Congress particularly. They should be content with their place in the ranks of their fellow-countrymen and take their chance with them. The hon. Member spoke of the mute multitude of the unrepresented masses. So did the Under Secretary for India, with much justness. The masses in India are indeed outside any conception of the elective principle. Besides the masses, who are spoken of as working men, artizans, and labourers in the field, there are distinct sets of classes who are thoroughly outside any electoral idea. Perhaps the most important class in India are the village headmen. They have withstood the shock of revolution and the stress of war, and they have come out of it like gold refined by fire. These men, though quite representative in their way, are thoroughly outside any idea of any electoral system. Then take the great landholders. When I was at the Imperial Assemblage at Delhi, I had of an evening in my reception tent a group of men whose total rental was not less than half a million sterling—they never dreamt of election. Tens of thousands of small landowners are of the same mind. But besides landowners there is the great class of peasant proprietors. They are everywhere, from Cape Comorin to the Himalayas, and constitute the very backbone of the Indian population. They are wholly outside this idea. Then there are the frontier chiefs, the men who dominate the border, who keep back marauders and robbers, and who are the wardens of the marches all around the frontiers of India. They never heard of election. Take the hill tribes scattered all over the country; their hills are just like the bones in the physical body, or the arteries. All these tribes are thoroughly innocent of this idea. There are the martial races that supply not only the foot soldiers and the troopers, but also the native officers for the Infantry and Cavalry. I say these men never heard of election. Then take the purely peaceful races : the native bankers and traders who have accounts in every village, and also transactions extending over Asia into Europe, and even on to America ; the shopkeepers, who are a numerous class in every town, in every village ; the still more important class, the proprietors of ships and boats, the men who circumnavigate the Indian Peninsula, who conduct an inland navigation on the great rivers, not surpassed in extent in any part of the world ; all these men are outside the idea of election. Then we come to the priests, both Hindu and Mahomedan, who live in the recesses of temples and mosques, in cloisters and shrines, but yet who have potent influence over the lives of the people from the cradle to the grave. These men think nothing of the principle of political election. Take the Brahmins, who study the ancient Sanskrit, the men who look back to the dawn of ancient civilisation, and who are the repositories of the religious traditions of the country ; the Mahratta Brahmins, the representatives of an Imperial as well as a priestly race ; and, lastly, the men of what I may call the old school—those men who look back to the ancient régime, who regard all Western civilisation as an evil. All these would abhor the idea of election. I ask the House to reflect on the great variety and importance of the classes I have mentioned, and hon. Members will see what a powerful phalanx they compose. Take the masses, and all these classes together,—what remains of the whole population ? Why, nothing, except the few thousands who form the National Congress — and they are the only advocates of the elective system. But, further, we have the Mahomedans ; they are actually opposed to such a system. I have myself submitted representations on their behalf, and have promised to watch their interest in reference to this Bill. They are anti-Congress' out and out. They know that they form a very important and influential section of the community, and they say that according to the scheme of the National Congress, an undue share of power would accrue to that Congress, which consists almost entirely of Hindoos and Parsees. I desire to speak of the Parsees with all respect, but they do not represent the feelings of the people of India—they are, in fact, simply like the swallows that portend the spring. The Mahomedans say that they would be outvoted by the Hindoos in every place, and they naturally wish to maintain some influence in the country, whose destinies in historic times they have so largely helped to mould. They ask, in effect, that there should be some arrangement for the proper representation of their important minority, which may now be numbered at between 50,000,000 and 60,000,000. This question of proportional representation alone shows how hard and onerous the elective system must be in such a country as India. Now, I will ask this important question: Is the elective system at all in the hearts and minds of the people? Of course it is not. The dignity of the village headman is hereditary; so also are the village offices; and almost all the ancient appointments held by Mahomedan Judges are more or less hereditary. Here and there germs of the elective system are to be found. Priests, for instance, are elected, though in what way no outsiders can say. In Mongol or Mogul times the victor in the saddle would be hailed Emperor by the knights on horseback around him; but the dignity thus elective in the beginning soon became hereditary in his son. But if the elective system is going to be introduced, the natives would have to be educated and taught what it means. It is quite possible to do that, but if you try it you must bend yourselves to the task. I have myself experimented with the elective system in Calcutta. In that metropolis I thought I perceived a middle cess. It was almost as hard to get the citizens of Calcutta to vote as it is to bring ratepayers to the poll at London School Board or County Council elections. But they soon got used to it; and now I understand that they regard it as a privilege of which they would not bear to be deprived. In Bombay, on the other hand, the elective system has always been found to answer, and with regard to District Boards in the interior, which were originated under the régime of Lord Ripon, the principle of election is growing year by year. No doubt in most towns there is the germ of the elective system; but if this plan is to be carried out generally for political arrangements, it would have to be by means of rules and regulations, which should be framed here, and their working out left to the authorities on the spot. I have myself just propounded a plan. But I would not send it out cut and dried to India. Even for an abridged plan like that the number of persons whom the Governor General would have to consult, and others who would have to be won over, and their views taken into account by him, must be very large indeed. It would be a very serious matter, but I have no doubt something of the kind could be done in time under the regulations as in this Bill provided. That is why I approve of this Bill. It leaves the details of the scheme to be worked out on the spot. I have no doubt that the authorities in India will be greatly guided by what is said in this House, and that the Government out there will profit by a perusal of this Debate. If a few Members are to be added to the Council I fail to see any danger allowing those Members to be elected instead of being nominated. Broadly speaking, I would venture to express two opinions: The first is, that this Bill is entirely worthy of the support of this House; and, secondly, that the Amendment of the hon. Member for Manchester ought not to be accepted.

amongst whom I have spent the greater part of 30 years, may be taken as my justification for endeavouring, with the kind permission of the House, to place them in possession of some most serious facts, drawn from my own observation, which will, I believe, incline the House to the conclusion that the Government of India cannot be safely carried on any longer without the introduction into it of the principle of popular representation. Sir, on the very few occasions when India gets a hearing at all in this House, it is, I fear, far too much the fashion for the House to accept the views of gentlemen who have held official positions, and who invariably give assurances that everything is going on most admirably, and that the Government of India is the best of all possible Governments. Now, Sir, I protest against the views of these gentlemen, however personally worthy and excellent men they may be, being accepted as authoritative in regard to the real condition and wants of the people of India; for my experience of them all, with only a few exceptions is, that they are much too apt to indulge in optimist views, which, however, unconsciously to themselves, are really nothing but the offspring of an easy-going hope that a state of things is sound, from which they have reaped comfort, honour, and substantial advantage. There are two main reasons why the alien bureaucracy which we call the Government of India are fairly frightened at the bare idea of the introduction of the elective principle: In the first place, they know that the people's representatives, in so far as they were able to make their presence felt at all, would feel bound to insist on a reduction of the vast salaries and appointments now held by Europeans, whereby the natives are excluded from all good offices in the Public Service of their own country, and whereby the revenues of their country are appropriated and eaten away. Nine years ago a Return was presented to this House, on the Motion of Mr. John Bright, which casts a grim light upon the cause why the present Motion is so strenuously opposed. That Return shows that, other than the rank and file of the British Army, there are only about

68,000 Europeans in the whole of India, and that of these no less than 25,000 receive salaries from the Government of more than £100 a year, the total amount of their salaries arriving at the enormous figure of £13,000,000 yearly. Moreover, nearly one-third part of this vast sum, or £4,000,000, is paid in the shape of pensions, &c., to Europeans living in this country. But, on the other hand, what is the case with regard to the natives of the country? There are no less than 285,000,000 of the natives of India, and of these only 11,000 hold Government posts over £100 a year. Their total of salaries, moreover, amounts to only £2,250,000. Last year the Government kindly accepted a Motion which I made for a continuation of that Return up to the present time, and I have no doubt that when it is presented it will reveal a state of things still worse than that which I have described. The fact is, Sir, that the whole policy of the Government of India is framed for the purpose of supporting, and the natives of India are ground down for the purpose of paying, the gigantic salaries of these 25,000 Europeans. And, Sir, it is because the Government of India well know that to introduce an elective element into its Councils would be to introduce a jarring element which would disturb the fine unanimity hitherto displayed by these Councils in voting salaries for their own class, and taxing the people of India in order to pay for them, that the present proposal is vehemently opposed by the privileged class whose monopoly would thereby be threatened or broken down. But there is another and a still more serious reason why it is essential that the elective principle be introduced without delay, and that is the enormous and ever-increasing impoverishment of the people, which is taking place under our rule. It is solely by the device of absolutely excluding elected representatives from their Councils that our officials are now able to go about crying "peace and prosperity," while all the time biting poverty and decadence of the most serious character is going on under our rule throughout the length and breadth of India from day to day, and from year to year. And, Sir, I venture to say that this hiding away of the truth, which could and would at once be declared by the mouths of elected Representatives of the people, constitutes the most serious possible danger for the future of our Empire in India. One of the chief apostles of the official classes, who are accustomed to soothe the Members of this House with bland assurances as to the increasing wealth and prosperity of the Indian cultivator, is the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham. On the occasion of the Indian Budget Debate last Session he delivered to the Committee one of his usual optimist speeches as to the wonderful and increasing prosperity of the people and the lightness of their taxation. In reply I called attention to the more than Draconian Land Revenue Law, the passing of which was his last and chief act as Governor of Bombay, and I asked, why did he find such a law of unparalleled stringency necessary to extort the Land Revenue if the people were prosperous and lightly taxed? I asked, and I now ask, for example, why the hon. Baronet had taken away from the cultivator all appeal against the Revenue collector's claims? Why did he ordain that on default of a single instalment the entire Land Tax of the whole year should become due at once, with interest at a rate unnamed, together with a fine of an amount unspecified, and which can be increased from time to time at the discretion of the Government? Why did he ordain that instead of one-half only the Revenue collector may seize for an arrear the whole of the ryot's crop, leaving the ryot and his family literally starving? Why did he ordain that the lands of a whole village of solvent ryots should be attached for arrears due on a single holding? Worse still, why did he find it necessary to provide that all the solvent and wholly innocent villagers should be subjected to immediate distraint and sale of their property, movable and immovable aye—and also subjected to personal arrest and imprisonment—for no offence whatever, except for the default of a single one of their number? Lastly, why, in the face of all this prosperity, did he find it

sary to ordain that for the default of a single shilling for a single day the entire holding of a cultivator, with his 30 years' lease, with his crops, plantations, cattle, implements, houses, and improvements, would become forfeited to Government, and the cultivator and his family evicted and thrown upon the world absolutely without grace or notice?

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not see the relevancy of the hon. Gentleman's observations.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I was going to point out that such an inhuman law as this could not possibly have been passed without amendments had the Bombay Legislative Council possessed even a fair amount of Representatives elected by the people of India, and is it not most dangerous that the frightful impoverishment now caused in the Bombay Presidency by the administration of this inhuman law should go on?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman is not entitled to review the whole condition of India on a Bill of this kind.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: My view is that the people are now ground down by the existing legislative enactments, and I wish to warn the Government of the consequences whilst there is yet time. Sir, I can conceive no stronger possible argument for requiring the recognition of the elective principle than the fact that under scientific engines of financial torture, such as the law which I have described, the Indian cultivator is now suffering absolute depletion in silence, because he has not so much as a single Representative by whom he could make his sufferings known to this House, or even to the Indian Government itself. Our Revenue system steepes the people in poverty, yet our officials, one and all, declare that they are rolling in wealth.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to inform the hon. Gentleman that he is not touching the Bill before the House.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I regret, Sir, that I am precluded from touching the details of this infamous Revenue system, but I will state broadly the result.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman must obey my ruling.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I am endeavouring, Mr. Speaker, to obey your ruling most absolutely. Now, Sir, no assertion is more universal amongst our officials than that we only take from the cultivator one-half of the net produce of his holding, leaving him the other half to himself to revel in luxury, after paying for the costs of cultivation, including the support of his family. Sir, this fallacy is so dire that, unless speedily corrected by popular representation, it must of itself be fatal to the Indian Government. In order to show the real truth on this subject, I have myself had an industrial census taken of an average village in the Bombay Presidency; and, if I may venture to ask the further indulgence of the House, I will give a brief abstract of the result. The population of the village is 236 persons, including families. The land farmed is 1,400 acres, and the whole crop of the year valued only 2,900 rupees, because, from sheer poverty, not a vestige of manure is ever put into the soil. Now, if we allow only 10 rupees or 14s. a year for the sustenance of each person, and 8 rupees per year for the sustenance of each of the 58 pair of bullocks required for the cultivation, it appears that the real net produce of the village amounted to 76 rupees only. Nevertheless, the Land Tax and Local Cess extorted from these poor creatures last year amounted to no less than 1,100 rupees, or nearly 40 per cent. of the entire gross produce. How, then, it will be asked, was the assessment paid? The village accounts supply the answer. It was paid by application to the village usurer, who lent the money to the half-starved villagers at an interest of 24 per cent., and the balance which they owe him now amounts already to more than ten years' assessment. Whatever small sums they are able to pay to him, for either interest or principal, are earned not from the land at all, but entirely from the labour of the villagers at other callings in the adjacent town of Sholapore. Now, Sir, there is no question that this miserable state of things is only kept dark because there are no elected representatives of the people, and it is chiefly in order to hide these things away that popular representation is denied. Our Indian officials detest this Motion, because it would secure a representation under which these horrors would be exposed, and by which the Draconian Laws under which they exist would be repealed. Do our officials desire, or do they fear, to know the truth? If they so desire, why do they not welcome this Motion? Is it not a safeguard to any Government that the people should have a representative channel through which to let their wants be known? Why, then, do they fight so strenuously against opening such a channel? There is only one answer: Because the first thing that elected representatives would do would be to reveal such an appalling picture of poverty and heart-rending sufferings of scores of millions of helpless human beings that the British nation would rise as one man and overturn their entire system. Sir, I repeat that it is only a selfish desire to retain lucrative posts which makes our European officials seek to persuade this House that the natives of India are unfit for representative Institutions. Such men carefully conceal that, before British Rule came to destroy it, there was little else in India except popular Government. I would venture to call attention to the facts on this subject which are given by the famous Sir Thomas Munro, who said—

"In all Indian villages there was a regularly constituted Municipality, by which its affairs, both of revenue and police, were administered, and which exercised to a very great extent magisterial and judicial authority."

To this the famous Sir John Malcolm, one of the highest possible authorities on the subject, adds his testimony as follows:—

"The municipal and village institutions of India were competent, from the power given them by the common assent of all ranks, to maintain order and peace within their respective circles. In Central India their rights and privileges never were contested even by tyrants; while all just Princes founded their chief reputation and claim to popularity, on attention to them."

Some years ago in the Legislative Council of Bombay, the Hon.

Rao Saheb V. N. Mandlik, a distinguished native reformer, afterwards a member of the Governor General's Council, thus charged the British system with having produced atrophy in the political intelligence of a people who had been accustomed from time immemorial to self-government—

"Those who assume incapacity on the part of the people for self-government betray a complete ignorance of the past history of India in general, and of Western and Southern India in particular. I am prepared to admit that the disuse of particular powers of mind and body may cause a partial atrophy of that portion of the organisation.

"The people of this country are perfectly capable of administering their own local affairs. The municipal feeling is deeply rooted in them. The village communities, each of which is a little republic, are the most abiding of Indian institutions. They maintained the framework of society while successive swarms of invaders swept over the country. In the cities also the people clustered in their wards, trade guilds, and punchayets, and showed much capacity for corporate action.

"These facts supply an answer to the sceptics as to our aptitude for self-government. Those who say we are yet to have a trial in the matter appear to forget that they are speaking not of Kaffristan or the country of the Hottentots, but of the inhabitants of a country with a long history, reaching even beyond hoary antiquity, with definite forms of Government, with an extensive and varied literature, and with comprehensive systems of philosophy and ethics, of religion and morals, of natural science—from mathematics up to astronomy, of architecture and engineering, as evidenced by splendid public works and monuments, and of the fine arts. Elective Government was not only not unknown, but so late as the Fourteenth Century a large tract of country on the coast of Western India was actually governed by a Council of four Senators, with a President elected by the people every three years."

And yet this ancient nation, consisting of 285,000,000 of men, is at this day traduced and libelled by an interested bureaucracy, who shout loudly that they themselves possess a monopoly of political and moral virtue, while the natives possess a corresponding monopoly of vice. Sir, I am firmly convinced that no time should be lost in giving to the people an elective voice in expending their own revenues and declaring their own wants. I have no desire to speak as an alarmist, but I say that it is useless for any well-informed and impartial observer to deny that, under our frightfully expensive and impoverishing system of government, biting adversity is now fast turning the hearts of the masses of the people against their British masters. As the struggle for bare life becomes harder and harder a deep and sullen sense of wrong is stealing over the length and breadth of the land. It is the result of no single incident. It is the voiceless and ever-increasing growth of gradually accumulating privations. It is not race antagonism of any kind whatever. It is the embitterment caused by the steady advance of pinching poverty; when the daily toil becomes more incessant, and yet the out-turn of the over-cropped field becomes less and less every year; when the little savings, hoarded perhaps for two generations, have to be dug up from the floor of the mud hut and handed over to the Revenue officer; when the scanty meal becomes scantier; when the little condiment eaten with the rice has to be intermitted; the bangle on the arm of the wife or baby has to be sold; the marriage of the daughter has to be postponed till the village money-lender can be induced to advance the where-withal. It is the sense of wrong and injustice when the bread-winner is taken away from his home and imprisoned for debt in the civil gaol. It is the exasperation of a ruined family when their holding is confiscated for arrears of Land Tax, and when its occupant from that hour descends in the social scale, and, ceasing to be a farmer, becomes a landless labourer. Sir, all these terrible truths are far too apt to be excluded from the mind of the Anglo-Indian official as he goes about crying "peace and prosperity." But I venture to say that they furnish perhaps the strongest illustration ever witnessed of the absolute necessity of giving a vast people like the natives of India a representative voice in their own affairs, and the absolute impossibility of safely governing them without giving them such a voice. The late John Stuart Mill had India in his eye when he wrote these well-known words—

"The government of a people by itself has a meaning and a reality, but such a thing as government of one people by another does not and cannot exist. One people may keep another as a warren or preserve for its own use—a place to make money in, a human cattle farm, to work for its own profit.”

It remains to be seen whether this House to-day, by rejecting the principle of this Amendment, will decree that India should be retained for a further period as a human cattle farm, or whether by accepting the Amendment they will tell the Indian people that it is their firm intention, cautiously and carefully it may be, but still honestly and really, to develop representative Government among them.

*(9.55.) MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire):

Sir, I have been struck, as I think the House generally must have been struck, by the extraordinary contrast which is observable between the two last speeches to which we have listened (Sir Richard Temple and Mr. Seymour Keay). Each of those speeches was delivered by gentlemen of very long Indian experience, and their statements are so absolutely opposite that it is difficult, if not almost impossible, to believe that these two gentlemen could have lived in the same country. Sir, I am bound to say, from all I have been able to ascertain, that I agree more largely with the speech of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. Seymour Keay) than with the speech of that official optimist the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham (Sir Richard Temple). I wish it was not so. It is exceedingly painful for an Assembly like this to listen to statements such as have just been made. I hope there may be in these statements some exaggeration. I believe, indeed, that they are somewhat exaggerated; but, at the same time, I believe—and I am sorry to say it—that the statements of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down represent more truly the situation in India than the statements we are accustomed to hear from the hon. Baronet opposite. My honest conviction is—and I have taken considerable pains to ascertain the truth—that many of the Indian people are suffering from extreme poverty and from an accumulation of grievances which prove the necessity of establishing in India some kind of local representative Government. There is every desire on the part of the people of this country to act in a manner which will best contribute to the welfare of the people of India; but, Sir, the Government of India is a bureaucracy, and in the nature of things a bureaucratic Government cannot be a perfect Government, and must of necessity generate certain vices. There was a time when it was impossible to govern India in any other way; but the time has now come when it is essential gradually to modify the system and methods of its government if we wish to retain the confidence of the people, and even to maintain our hold upon that country. I rejoiced to listen to-night to the noble speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. I do not think the Indian question has ever been raised to a higher level in this House, and in the generous sentiments expressed all friends of India will agree. But I fear that to some extent the right hon. Gentleman has read his own generous sentiments into the Bill, and I much doubt if it will be so interpreted by the ruling classes in India. All friends of India will welcome the suggestions of self-government put forward by the hon. Member for Evesham. But I share the apprehensions of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken, as to whether any Governor General will have the courage to give effect to the elective principle in view of the official pressure all round him. We have only had one Governor General of recent years who has had the courage to set that opinion at defiance. We know that Lord Ripon introduced a system of Municipal Government into India—a most valuable instalment of Local Government—and we know also that he intended to give larger scope to the natives in the government of their own country. But there was never any Governor General more disliked by the official classes than Lord Ripon was; and I very much doubt if we shall again get a Governor General to act so disinterestedly for the good of the people of India. It was my fortune to travel through India soon after Lord Ripon left the country, and I was struck with the fact that the affection of the people went out to him as it had never gone out to any Governor General in modern times. It is quite true, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian has said, that the language in which the Bill is couched is ambiguous and unsatisfactory. I cannot myself clearly see the elective principle in it. It may be there, but it is a very small germ indeed. I believe if we had another Lord Ripon the principle of election might be discovered. But if we have an ordinary Governor General I would take the view of the hon. Member for Oldham, that the principle would be non-existent. However, I am glad to think this Bill does mark a certain advance in our method of governing India. It will enable the financial state of India—its very unsatisfactory state—to be discussed once a year in face of the public, and that is a very great gain. It also contains one or two other points of very considerable value. The right to discuss the Budget and to put questions will, however, remain very much a dead letter except so far as it is exercised by elected Members, because clearly those who are nominated by the Government will not do anything that might be inconvenient to the Government. Therefore, unless there is grafted upon the Bill some genuine representation whereby independent criticism and judgment may be obtained the Bill will fail to satisfy Indian expectations. I agree with all that has been said by the hon. Member for Manchester of the value of the Indian National Congress as the mouth-piece of Indian feeling, and if the hon. Member for Evesham would now go back to India after his absence of twelve years he would form a different judgment from that which he has expressed to-night. A friend of my own, an Englishman, was elected to that Congress. The election took place in one of the largest villages in the interior, and the inhabitants were called together in the market place. My friend was put up for the position; he was moved and seconded before a large crowd of people; every one was invited to take part in the proceedings, and he was cordially and unanimously elected by the whole mass of the population.

Mr. S. Smith

And I believe this was the system adopted all over India in choosing the Members of the Indian National Congress. So far from being elected at hole and corner meetings, they were, as a rule, elected by free voting—they were the freely chosen candidates of large masses of the population of India. And I hold that, at the present moment, there is no way of getting at native opinion more reliably than through the Indian National Congress. I am aware it does not perfectly represent the people. Everyone who knows India is aware that it is almost impossible to get any Representative Body which will be a mirror of the endless shades of caste, race, and religion in India, but the Indian National Congress approaches this more nearly than any institution which has existed in India for 100 years. I have read the proceedings with care and have been struck with the moderation and wisdom and statesmanlike ability with which their views have been placed before the public. You will find no Parliament in Europe in which the Debates have been conducted more creditably than in the Indian National Congress. The fact is, we ought to be proud of that Congress; it is our own creation; it reproduces the education we have given to India, and our own sense of liberty and justice. It is indeed an exact copy of ourselves in Indian form. We have transplanted our ideas into India, and we need not be astonished to see them grow up and bring forth fruit. I would say, further, that there is no population more thoroughly Conservative than the population of India. Both Hindoos Mahomedans are essentially Conservative and further removed from anarchy or revolutionary ideas than any other people in the world. And on this ground I think we can treat the Indian people with kindness and confidence, and extend to them a greater degree of power and responsibility than we could safely do to almost any other population in a similar state of civilisation. My belief is if we give representation to India we will be astonished to find how many defects exist in our administration. We will make discoveries which will not be pleasing to our amour propre, we will discover for the first time that India is full of real grievances, and of some real wrongs as well, and we ought to let them have a legitimate outlet instead of sitting on the safety valve and risking an explosion. I agree entirely with the view that our Government in India is much too expensive. It is far too much arranged in the interests of European employés. The land is exhausted by a wretched system of agriculture, in some degree the result of the revenue system we have laid down. I doubt that India is not getting richer but poorer, and that the peasantry are loaded up to the lips with debt. And all these grievances need to have an outlet, need to be discussed, faced, and honestly dealt with in place of being hidden and veiled over with optimistic statements. I feel sure if we allow in India the full light of publicity to be thrown upon all the dark corners of our Government, we shall immensely improve that Government, immensely increase our hold on the country, and take a position 100 years hence very much stronger than it would otherwise be. I am told it is very difficult to devise any elective system. I admit you cannot have a complete system any way analogous to what exists in England or America. But why should we not allow a certain number of large cities, through their existing Municipalities, to elect a certain number of Members to the various Legislatures? I think this would be an excellent thing, and I believe it would work perfectly well and form a basis which we could afterwards enlarge. I have no belief in the possibility of any system for India corresponding to universal suffrage; the country is utterly unfit for it; it must have an intermediate system resting on existing bodies and existing associations. I think we could not do better than adopt Lord Dufferin's suggestions. He recommended a tentative scheme of election. When a Viceroy, so essentially Conservative, recommends such a plan, surely the British Parliament will be willing to endorse it. I feel the enormous responsibility that rests upon the people of this country for the government of India. It is too great and too undivided a responsibility, involving as it does the charge of one-fifth of the human race. A mistake made by our Government might cost the lives of millions of people, and we ought to be glad to devolve some of this responsibility on the people of the country themselves. The previous Under Secretary (Sir John Gorst) admitted that India was under despotic Government. No doubt it is far humaner than that of Russia for example, but it is equally destitute of any trace of representation. It is surely time that this country, which has set the example of Constitutional Government to all the countries of the world, should begin to engraft its own institutions on India. Our system of Government there is only provisional; it cannot last; it must be modified sooner or later, and now, when we are in a time of peace, there is a good opportunity. There is no fear of invasion by Russia at present; but if ever there should be, we shall have to rely on the loyalty of the natives of India, and then we should have to give in a hasty and ungracious manner those concessions which we may now grant considerably and graciously. I hope the Government will give something like an assurance that they will take the generous view put upon the Bill by the right hon. Member for Midlothian, and should they do so, I believe there will be great satisfaction when the news reaches India to-morrow.

*(10.18.) MR. O. V. MORGAN (Battersea): I am in the position of a distinguished Member of this House who said that a three months' visit to India only made him aware of his great ignorance of that country. I feel in that position after three visits. On the whole I like the Bill; I think it is a step in advance, and that is a very great deal, for in dealing with a country like India we have to be very cautious. The Bill increases the numbers and powers of the Members of the Legislative Councils; it gives them power to discuss the Budget and to put questions to what we may call the Ministers. I think that, perhaps, is as important as anything, because at the present time there are certain Indian newspapers which are never happy unless making false statements against the Government. The Government will now be able, in answer to questions, to admit or deny these statements, and the natives will get to know the real state of the case. I should have been glad to see some change in regard to the Indian Council in London. It is antiquated and its Members are antiquated, because a man who has left India for more than ten years is not in touch with the present state of affairs. I was there ten years ago, and was much struck last winter with the great change that had taken place during that period. I believe no country in the world has changed so much in ten years. The Members of the Council, though eminent men, retired from the Civil Service long since, and there is no Representative of Indian opinion, or even of commerce, on the Council, and that may be the reason why the Government of India has been so slow in the construction of railways. There is great diversity of opinion among the natives as to Representative Government. The Hindoos think it should be on an educational basis; the commercial interest think it should be on an Income Tax franchise; while the Mahomedans, who form one-third of the whole population, are not in favour of it at all. Their reasons are that they are not so well educated as the Hindoos, having neglected their opportunities, though they are now sending their sons to school, and that they are outnumbered by the Hindoos. The Parsees are about equally divided on the point. I had a most interesting conversation with a man in Bombay, who may be considered the only true representative of the working classes. He was formerly an operative, but through his education became the spokesman of his class, and publishes a newspaper in their interest. In reply to my questions he said he hated the National Congress, as it was a Brahmin movement. I said it was rather a Bengalee Baboo movement. He replied that the Bengalee Baboos were the enemies of the working classes as much as the Brahmins. I agree generally with the remarks of the hon. Member for Flintshire (Mr. S. Smith), though I do not think there is so much poverty and suffering in India as he has depicted; the agricultural population were last year able to export large quantities of their produce at remunerative prices. There are many difficulties in the way of giving Representative Government to India, but I am glad the attempt is going to be made in a small way. It is wise to introduce the representative principle, because the educated classes are largely increasing in number, many are educated in England and go back to India with English ideas, and they would become more English still if they were admitted to the friendship of the resident English people. I was sorry to see the absolute indifference with which they were treated by the English people. Perhaps this change in the form of Government will bring the two classes nearer to each other. I was pleased with the speech of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, and I hope the Government will give us some further assurance as to their intentions. If the Government give an answer that is at all satisfactory, I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press his Amendment to a Division.

*MR. CURZON: I think the House will agree that we have now arrived at the period when this Debate may well close. I do not think the Government has any cause to be dissatisfied with the course the Debate has taken. We have had a number of interesting and valuable speeches from hon. Members who are fully qualified, by experience or residence in India, to deal with these questions. I was glad, Sir, to observe in all these speeches that the importance of this Bill has been recognised; and, in fact, there has been no attempt on either side of the House to underrate it. The hon. Member for Oldham went so far as to say it was the most important Bill which had been introduced since the Government of India was taken over by the Crown. I was further interested to observe that in the various speeches no serious criticism—certainly no criticism of a hostile character—has been directed against the specific reforms and changes introduced by this Bill. The concession of the right of financial criticism, of the right of asking questions, and, finally, the addition to the Members of the Supreme and Provincial Councils, have all met with the approbation of this House. I do not think I have heard a single remark to the contrary. I am, therefore, relieved from the necessity of making another speech on the general provisions of the Bill, and it will only be my duty to make a few observations in reply to particular remarks or queries that have fallen from hon. Members in the course of the Debate. I do not think, Sir, it will be necessary to follow with any great minuteness the hon. Member for North Manchester, who moved the Amendment. He indulged in many interesting and picturesque observations about the National Congress of India, whose meetings he is more fortunate than myself in having attended. I do not think I am called upon to follow the hon. Gentleman through the whole of his speech, but I am bound to notice one statement, for he was guilty of a serious misrepresentation when he said that the system of nomination, as applied to the various Councils in India, is at the present moment a fraud. I am convinced that if he had a wider experience of India he would not have made that statement. There are hon. Gentlemen in this House—at least, two hon. Members—who have filled the position of Governors in India, and I am certain that they can bear me out in the remark that the object of every Governor in India is as far as possible to persuade, and to induce, representatives of even advanced political opinion to join those Councils. [Sir R. TEMPLE: Hear, hear!] That, undoubtedly, was the case with the hon. Baronet who cheers me, and equally so it was the case with the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General when he was a Governor in India. And if the hon. Member applies his remarks to the present time, I would like to ask him whether in his knowledge of India he has never heard the names of Peeri Mukuji or Cristodas Pal? These are names, as the hon. Baronet knows, of very prominent representatives of the advanced section of public opinion in India, and the gentlemen who bear these names were lately upon the Council of the Governor General. In the face of these facts, I am certain that the hon. Member will see that he was, at any rate, misinformed. Then the hon. Member complains of what he calls the inadequate addition that is proposed to the Legislative Councils, and he spoke of the addition proposed by this Bill—an addition both to the minimum and the maximum number of Members—as a modest and inadequate addition. It is the case that Lord Dufferin, whose views have been freely quoted in the course of this Debate, did not himself think that an addition to the numerical strength of the Supreme Council was required; and the problem that you have to face in India is this—not that you have a number of men who are anxious and willing to join the Councils, but that there is a difficulty in obtaining men with both the qualifications of willingness and intelligence who will surrender that portion of their time that is required for the important business of these Councils. I doubt very much whether the hon. Member has a clear idea of the business of the Supreme Legislative Council in India. It is fortunately free from the system that prevails in this House. There is no Queen's Speech or programme of legislation at the beginning of each year. Contrary to the principle that we adopt, the Legislative Council only legislates when legislation is required, and that does not happen invariably, as Members might be led to suppose from the practice of this House. What is the process of legislation in the Council of the Viceroy? Before a measure is ever introduced into the Council—a proposal which very likely relates to some particular part or Province of India—it is referred to the Government of that Presidency or Province, and inquiries of a most wide and comprehensive character are made by competent persons. The Bill is then introduced into the Council and read a second time, and next passes to a Select Committee of experts, who are really responsible for the final form in which it goes before the Council. The hon. Member should further remember that the Legislative Council of the Viceroy does not, as does this Parliament, sit for six, seven, or eight months in the year. Legislation is only carried on during the Calcutta season. I think the hon. Member will see, therefore, that there is less need for a large addition to the numbers or a larger attendance than he at first supposed. But if he is unwilling to accept my words on the subject I should like to quote to him the opinion of Lord Northbrook on this question of the number of Members. Lord Northbrook spoke as follows in another place :—

"The National Congress and others have recommended a much larger extension of the numbers of the Legislative Councils. I believe myself that the Bill (that is our Bill) goes far enough in that direction. I believe there would be a great difficulty in making any much larger increase in the number of the Legislative Council of the Viceroy, and a substantial increase has been made in the Local Councils. Therefore I think the Bill provides fully for all present needs in respect of the increase of Members."

I do not think I need pursue the subject further, and I will come now to the speech—if I may venture to say so, the wise and weighty speech—with which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian (Mr. Gladstone) favoured the House at an earlier period of the evening. The immediate effect of that speech was to eliminate the element of controversy, to a very great extent, from our Debate this evening, and to diffuse a spirit of harmony over these proceedings. The right hon. Gentleman complained, at the outset of his speech, that the language of this Bill was ambiguous, but I was glad to find as he proceeded that the ambiguity was one from which he did not himself draw conclusions that were hostile to the Bill or its framers. I entirely endorse, speaking on behalf of the Government, that part of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in which he said that it is not for us, for this House, to determine a plan or to devise the machinery, but that the means of initiation must be left in the hands of the Government of India. A subsequent speaker, the hon.

Member for Elgin and Nairn (Mr. Keay), has argued that the matter should be settled by this House, but I prefer the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian on that subject. It is the object of the provisions that have been introduced into this Bill, and of that particular sub-section of Clause 1 which I read to the House and which has been the subject of so much discussion, to leave the initiative to the Viceroy of India, subject to the assent of the Secretary of State, and it will be for him to frame the conditions under which these future nominations are made. Hon. Members have more than once asked to-night whether the words of the clause are to be taken as merely complimentary words, and the hon. Member for Elgin and Nairn, of whom I have previously spoken, said that he was prepared to stake his political reputation that this clause would be a dead letter. I am sorry to say for the sake of the hon. Gentleman that I think his political reputation stands in very great peril. Undoubtedly the words of that clause were designedly introduced by the Government, with a clear apprehension of their meaning. I do not think there was any want of clearness in the terms in which I expressed the possible application of that clause at an earlier period of the evening. I endeavoured to give hon. Members to understand that it has been designed to give perfect latitude to the Viceroy in this matter, and that it will admit of the introduction of the principle of representation in India, whether the system be election or selection, or delegation, or whatever the precise method may be that recommends itself to the Government of the Viceroy. I think that it was a very important contribution to this Debate when the Member for Midlothian, speaking with a full knowledge of the enormous responsibility of Indian Government, said that the question of degree, and the manner in which this principle may be carried out, are matters not for the consideration of this House, but primarily for the consideration of the Government of India. I think it would be in the highest degree unwise if this House were to endeavour to exercise pressure in a matter the handling of which must necessarily be left to those who are better informed than ourselves. I will not further detain the House, and will only say, in conclusion, that I entirely accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman as to the objects with which this Bill is introduced. They are undoubtedly to enlist in the service of the Government of India what I think he described as the upright sentiment and the enlightened opinion of native society, and if this Bill is discussed with as little delay as possible, and passed into law, I am certain that it will be attended with beneficial results.

(10.42.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): There is, I think, considerable excuse for the ignorant and inexperienced Members of this House to speak on this subject, for the Government of India has been removed from the immediate control of the East India Company to that of the Imperial Government, in which the House of Commons plays a conspicuous part. It is admitted that all Members of Parliament are responsible for the Government of India, and though we may not, perhaps, have a knowledge of all the various languages or of the various modes of Government in the various Provinces, yet we hold certain general principles which we believe should be applied to this Dependency, and we claim the right to express our opinions. In the course of his argument in moving this Bill the right hon. Gentleman said he did not exclude the possibility of the introduction of the principle of election or selection of the Council of the Governor General and of the various Provincial Councils. The hon. Gentleman the Member for North Manchester who moved the Amendment, said that unless the Bill recognised the principle of election it would not be effective. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian afterwards spoke and said in words of gravity and wisdom, which were recognised as much on this side of the House as they were on the opposite side, that there was not much difference of opinion between them; but the Under Secretary of State for India in the speech which he has just delivered, has, I think, gone rather too far in his interpretation of what was said by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for India said that he endorsed entirely the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, that it was not for this House—I do not profess to quote the words exactly—to dictate in detail the measures that ought to be adopted. Of course we all admit that, but I understood—I hope I am not wrong—the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian to lay down the principle that it was for this House to choose the general principles on which the Government of India was to be carried out. The hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for India—if he will allow me to say so—is as yet a young man, and it is a great distinction for him at his early age to occupy the high position he does and I congratulate him upon it, but he has not been quite so long a follower of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian as I have been, as to be as well-qualified to interpret what is meant by him. I am only sorry the right hon. Gentleman is not in his place at this moment. I quite believe the right hon. Gentleman meant, when he spoke, that it was for this House, for the Imperial Government of this Country to lay down the general principles of equity, under which the Government of the Indian Dependency was to be carried on; and at the same time he admitted—and we all follow him in that—that so far as matters of detail are concerned the Governor General and all the Governors of particular towns must be held responsible for the mode in which these general principles are to be applied. If both sides of the House agree upon this, of course there is no need going to Division. But we have not been told precisely by the Under Secretary of State for India that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian was right in his interpretation of his speech. He has not told us that what was meant in Sub-section 4 of Section 1 of the Bill is the gradual introduction of the elective principle into the nominations for the various Councils that govern the great Dependency of India. If he had said that I do not believe the hon. Member for North Manchester would go to a Division. If I were in his place, unless the Government more distinctly acknowledged that the elective principle must be introduced, and at once, in the selection of Members of the Council of the Governor General and of the other Governors of the Provinces, I should certainly go to a Division. No one on this side of the House thinks that India is prepared for Home Rule in the sense that Ireland has been prepared for Home Rule, but although we believe that India may not be prepared for a complete Home Rule measure, yet we think that India is prepared for a tentative, gradual, and very moderate introduction of the electoral principle and that is all that we ask. Surely, if the Marquess of Dufferin thought that the Government ought to have the means of controlling and neutralising the effect of the moral mischief which accrued from holding up English rule to hatred and contempt, we ought to have some men brought in who are elected by their fellow countrymen. I do not say they ought to dominate or control the action of the Government—very far from it. All I say is that they ought to be able to introduce some elected Members who would be able to communicate to the Government freely the aspirations and feeling of those who had elected them. The Members of all Governments, Liberal as well as Conservative, have spoken in a disparaging manner of the natives of India. I remember some years ago I had to negotiate with a Member of the Liberal Government as to the candidature for a particular constituency, the main Members of which had nominated an Indian gentleman. This Liberal Member of a Liberal Government said: "Do not have that nigger." Well, that was in anticipation of the words of a certain Member of the present Government, who said something about a black man; so that both sides are pretty much tarred with the same brush. Well, I think that something is necessary to bring about a closer and more fraternal sympathy between the subjects of the Empire in India and the subjects of the Empire at home. You cannot neglect the fact that the educated natives of India have been studying our constitutional history, that they have been reading the history of the way in which our forefathers wrenched something like liberty and equality from their former tyrants, and they wish to emulate the principles and the aspirations, though not the methods—they do not believe the methods are necessary—of our forefathers. Well, I think we ought to make some allowance for the extension of British culture to India. We leave to the future the gradual development of the elective principle; we would be contented with the most modest introduction of it at the present time.

Mr. Picton

(11.0.) MR. SCHWANN: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether or not he will distinctly state to the House if it is intended by Sub-section 4 of Clause 1 to apply the electoral principle in India? If it is so intended then I am willing to withdraw my Amendment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hon. Friend is in charge of this Bill, and I trust that it will be left to him to answer the question.

*MR. CURZON: I would say, in answer to the question of the hon. Member, that I do not know that I can add anything to what I have already stated in this House upon the subject. The initiative is left to the Viceroy of India, and it would be an unfortunate thing for the Government or for the House to transfer that initiative to itself.

(11.3.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): As one who has listened to this Debate, and who cannot pretend in any sense to have been convinced by what has been said in favour of the Bill, I must express my adhesion to the views enunciated by the right hon. Member for Midlothian—that this clause is both ambiguous and misleading. It is a proposal to place additional power and further emoluments in the hands of the bureaucracy of India. The result of such instalment of so-called representation would be so meagre that it would not be worth having. The subjects of the Queen in India have always been treated as subjects to be trodden under foot. You have only to go to any regimental affair in India to hear them spoken of, not as "Indians" or "natives," but as "niggers." The noble Lord who is at the head of the Government has himself called them "worse than Hottentots." I hope that my hon. Friend will go to a Division on the question, and that those who have had the opportunity of expressing their opinions with regard to it will also endorse them by going into the Division Lobby. The hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham said "Do not give political power to the Hindoos;" but the hon. Baronet, like others who have held positions of trust in India, have always stood by their order and by the bureaucracy. The hon. Baronet also spoke of the mute masses of the people of India, but I would like to ask whether they have not had good reason to be mute, when they are subject to periodical starvation and periodical deprivation? I never had an opportunity of visiting the coral strands of India, nor Greenland's icy mountains but I have always understood that the headmen of the villages in India are peculiarly under official power, and that they are coming more and more in contact with English officials in India. They like to mix with the English snobocracy, and to rub skirts with officials, and by that means they are led by the nose. These are matters which are really not for the welfare of the people of India, and are not intended to raise the character of the people of India. I am convinced that this Bill will not confer upon the Indian people any benefit, as it is not intended to carry out the principle of representation, and, accordingly, I hope my hon. Friend will go to a Division.

*(11.20.) Mr. S. HOARE (Norwich): The House has had the advantage of listening to several Members who have had the good fortune to visit India; and as one who has likewise visited that country, I should like, if the House will bear with me for a few moments, to say a few words. It was said by the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Flint (Mr. Samuel Smith), that India is growing poorer every day. Sir, I had hoped that having made that statement the hon. Member would bear it out with some statistics and some facts, knowing as I do how thoroughly well able he is to marshal facts and figures and to explain them to the House. The hon. Gentleman, however, gave us nothing of the kind. Now, Sir, though I cannot claim to be an authority, I may say that during my visit to India I consulted many native authorities, and formed some views which may possibly be as accurate as those of hon. Gentlemen opposite. One view which I formed is this: that India, so far from growing poorer is growing richer, and its trade is becoming larger, and growing almost daily. The railways of India have been increasing at the rate of 1,000 miles a year. Perhaps it may be said that these do not tend to the improvement of the wealth of India. Well, Sir, when twelve months ago I received the Viceroy of India in the middle of the central provinces, and he opened the line of railway that is some 850 miles in length, the great portion of that railway was through uninhabited jungle, where there was no wealth whatever, and yet during the present six months that railway is earning a profit sufficient to pay its guaranteed interest on £7,000,000. Surely that must mean that there is some increase of wealth in that district. Then, Sir, there are the discoveries of coal. I stood a year ago on ground where a few years previously there was no sign of coal, but where now there is a substantial coal-mining industry. The financial position of India is, of course, difficult, owing to the great depreciation of silver, but I cannot allow that this is owing to the method of English rule, or that the progress of India has not been vast during the last 20 years. With reference to the point of establishing some kind of electoral system, I realise the great difficulties attaching to the institution for the carrying out of such a system. I asked the opinion of numbers of my countrymen in India on the subject, and I attach great weight to what they said. When the time comes we shall be glad to place some further power in the hands of the people of India, but it is somewhat premature to speak of introducing the electoral system. Sir, I hope the statement will not be repeated that India is not progressive, because it is progressing in every part so far as its material wealth is concerned.

MR. SCHWANN: On the whole, though I have not had an altogether satisfactory pledge from the Government, I will ask leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL

[Lords].—(No. 228.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I beg, Sir, to move that this Bill be now read a second time. There has been a universal expression of opinion in favour of the measure which was read a second time last year, and which has been most carefully considered by Lord Herschell and by all the lawyers in the House of Lords, and which meets with their approval.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir R. Webster.)

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday.

MILITARY LANDS CONSOLIDATION BILL.—(No. 184.)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE].

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [25th March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I understood the Government was willing to assent to the reference of this Bill to a Select Committee, and I should like to have an assurance on that point, as otherwise I do not think it would be right to allow a Bill of this kind to go through the House without some debate and without any explanation. This Bill deals with a question upon which I think we ought not to rush to a decision lest we should afterwards find, as we have found in the Ranges Act, that there is interference with the rights of people for whom no redress is provided. The Bill, I understand, gives the Government power to acquire rights over common land by lease or otherwise, and it does not appear to me, so far as I can understand the clauses, that commoners' rights are properly safeguarded. Now that the Financial Secretary has returned to his place, I put the question to him; is it intended to send this Bill to a Select Committee or a Hybrid Committee in order that the rights of persons interested in common lands may be inquired into and protected?

(11.32.) THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): I regret that I should have been absent for I moment. It is the intention, and I believe that has already been announced by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Stanhope) that this Bill shall be referred to a Select Committee where the clauses will be fully investigated in a manner satisfactory to the hon. Gentleman.

(11.33.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): It is clearly understood then, that this Bill goes before a Select Committee. I know that many Members on this side of the House entertain objections to the Bill, but they are not present, because they assumed that this Bill, standing No. 11 on list for the day, would not be reached before 12 o'clock. Perhaps there will be less objection if the Bill is threshed out before a Committee and subsequently comes before us. I know that questions of commoners' rights arise, and notably in connection with the establishment of a rifle range in the New Forest. But I have neither power of voice or the necessary information to discuss the Bill now, but I sincerely hope that proper means will be taken to allay apprehensions I know have arisen, and I think it is a questionable proceeding to attempt to carry this stage of the Bill under these peculiar circumstances, when it would not have been reached but for the dropping of intervening Orders of the Day.

(11.36.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I understand that the Bill includes a proposal to take away a large portion of commoners' rights in the New Forest, and I know that in this many Members take an interest, but they had no reason to expect the Bill would be taken and have left the House. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) is anxious to speak on the subject, and it is a question of such public importance that the Bill should not pass without discussion. I know there is a question arises as to the abolition of public rights of way also. Would the Government be prepared to refer the Bill to a Commons Committee empowered to make the usual local inquiry under the Commons Act at the public expense? To put myself in order and to enable the hon. Gentleman to reply, I move the adjournment of the Debate.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—(Mr. Lloyd-George.)

(11.39.) MR. BRODRICK: I hardly think it is necessary for the hon. Member to insist on that Motion. With regard to the commons part of the subject, I may mention that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) who has specially interested himself in this subject expressed himself as perfectly willing that the Bill should go before a Committee.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: What kind of Committee?

MR. BRODRICK: An ordinary Select Committee of the House, and I think that inquiry would satisfy hon. Gentlemen for there is nothing in the Bill calling for special local inquiry. In regard to the New Forest there is a local inquiry proceeding, and upon this a report will be made. This is not dealt with in the Bill. The object of the Bill is simply to consolidate existing Acts, and of course the Committee upstairs will have the opportunity of going into details which a Committee of the whole House would not have. We do not propose by the Bill to reopen all the questions connected with commons; it is simply a consolidation Bill which a Committee upstairs will be eminently qualified to deal with. I think there is a general consensus of opinion in favour of such a course, and I hope the hon. Member will not press his Motion.

(11.42.) MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford, Central): I hope the hon. Member will not proceed with his Motion for adjournment. I have carefully examined the Bill in the interests of commoners, and I am satisfied that it will be in the interest of commoners that the Bill should pass into law. It is not merely a consolidation Bill for it does remove a very serious difficulty arising out of the Ranges Act passed last year. In reference to this I had the honour of introducing a deputation to the Secretary for War, and the right hon. Gentleman has very fairly met the demand made by the deputation. There was one point I referred to the other night in connection with the New Forest range. Proceedings in reference to that range have been commenced under the Act of last year, and I suggested that an Amendment should be introduced providing that this also should be dealt with under a Provisional Order as is provided in the Bill for future proceedings. Subject to this, I think the Bill is satisfactory and may well be allowed to be referred to a Committee.

(11.45.) MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I do not think my hon. Friend's Motion is unreasonable under the circumstances. This measure comes on unexpectedly. It was not expected that the Debate on the Indian Councils Bill would terminate so early as that the Government, by passing over other measures, would reach this Bill. Of course I should not be in order if on this Motion I attempted to discuss the Military Lands Consolidation Bill, nor can I say I am well acquainted with its contents, but I may observe that while the Financial Secretary describes it merely as a Consolidation Bill, the right hon. Gentleman on this side (Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who is well acquainted with the measure, says it is not merely a Consolidation Bill. It appears it does include an alteration in the law. There is a difference of opinion, and there should be a full statement of the contents and discussion if necessary before we dispose of the Second Reading. The short time at our disposal does not permit of a full examination of this Bill of 30 clauses, and I think an adjournment now is only reasonable.

(11.47.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I may be allowed to point out the fact that there is one clause in the Bill, the 25th, excluding the New Forest from the scope of the Bill, and I have reason to know from local knowledge that local opinion is in favour of the Bill.

(11.47.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I should like to be able to advise my hon. Friend to withdraw his Motion, but first I should like to know whether the Bill is to be referred to a Committee of seven Members, or whether it will simply go before the usual Select Committee of four Members? If the Bill goes before a Hybrid Committee with an assurance that all interests will be considered, perhaps we might allow the Second Reading to be taken now. The New Forest people may be protected, but there are other commoners who require protection.

(11.48.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I am sorry I cannot agree with my hon. Friend (Mr. Morton). There are clauses which, as applied to Ireland, require very serious consideration. There are powers to be given to the War Office over foreshores and tidal waters adjacent, and there have been very serious complaints as to the method of carrying on torpedo practice. There is a contention now going on between the War Office and the Harbour Authorities as to the firing in Cork Harbour.

MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that it is a Motion for Adjournment which is before the House.

MR. FLYNN: The fact that I am precluded from going into the merits of the Bill is in itself an argument for Adjournment. The Bill contains much controversial matter which cannot be disposed of to-night, and if debated at all it must occupy a couple of hours.

(11.49.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid.): I hope the Motion will be accepted. I know that the hon. Member for Northampton desires to speak on the Bill, and naturally he did not expect that the Orders of the Day would be disposed of in a few minutes that this Bill might be reached. The hon. Member for Hants (Mr. Jeffreys) has spoken of the New Forest, but the district is not within his constituency, and I should be more satisfied if the Member representing them expressed the opinion of the commoners there. In these 30 clauses questions arise that concern the whole country from Scotland to the New Forest, and I do not think we ought to be asked to dispose of the Second Reading in this hurried and unexpected manner.

(11.50.) MR. BRODRICK: May I be allowed to explain that the War Office have nothing to gain by pressing the Bill forward? Every power the Bill contains the War Office already have; nothing in the Bill extends those powers, and whatever change is proposed is in the direction of a limitation of the power of the War Office. Should the House decline to proceed with the Bill, the position will be that the War Office will have more extended powers than they would have in the future if this Bill were passed. So far as the Government are concerned, they have no reason to press the Bill. Our desire is to meet objections raised by hon. Members on the other side to the Ranges Act passed last year. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Shaw Lefevre) admits that those objections are met, and I hope, therefore, that the Bill will be allowed to go to the Committee.

(11.51.) DR. TANNER: The hon. Gentleman must have raison de quoi—he should have told us all about it at the commencement of the Debate. Have we not often found the Government trying to smuggle a Bill through late at night? The Bill applies to Ireland, and it must be debated if there are objections to it. I think the Government should be satisfied with the progress they have made with their business to-night, and I hope they will not allow their desire to get the better of their good sense.

(11.52.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I hope the Debate will not expire in this uninteresting manner. I have listened to the reduplicated explanations of the Financial Secretary, and, accepting them in the spirit in which they are offered, I cannot say they carry conviction to my mind. They did not seem consistent with themselves or calculated to promote the object he professedly has in view. I understand that the last argument of the hon. Gentleman was directed to this point; that if he lost on a Division his Department would be gainers. Well, it seems to me that on the face of it that is paradoxical and to a certain extent unintelligible. I cannot see if it is to the interest of the Department he represents to lose a Division why he should persist in persuasion against proceeding to a Division. That the Bill should be hurried on in itself excites suspicion. Many hon. Members interested have left the House under the impression the Bill would not be taken, and I am not free to assume that were they present they would be influenced in favour of the Bill by the considerations the hon. Gentleman has advanced. If the hon. Gentleman had been officially convinced he would have put his views in a way more consistent with his first argument.

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

(12.10.) Question put accordingly, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

(12.20.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR claimed, "That the Original Question be now put."

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): On a point of Order, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask you if the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in taking that course?

*MR. SPEAKER: There is no necessity for a further Motion, the Division already taken lead up to a decision on the Main Question.

MR. SEXTON: What I wish to ask, Sir, is whether the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman is superfluous, whether the putting of the Main Question follows on the Original Motion for the Closure?

*MR. SPEAKER: There can be no further debate on the Main Question. The right hon. Gentleman having moved that the Question be now put, and that being carried applies to the Original Motion. The proceeding is in order. I am acting under the Standing Order of the House.

The House divided:—Ayes 153; Noes 44.—(Div. List, No. 56.)

Bill read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be referred to a Select Committee."—(Mr. Brodrick.)

COLONEL NOLAN: I should like to speak upon that Motion.

*MR. SPEAKER: Further proceedings stand over if objection is taken.

It being after Midnight, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow at Two of the clock.

SHORT TITLES BILL [Lords].

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 29th March, 1892.

POST CARDS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether cards conforming in size, weight, and shape with Post Office regulations will be allowed transmission through the post with an adhesive halfpenny stamp, as is already permitted when the matter written on the cards is identical, as in the case of circulars; whether the actual cost of the cards is an expense to the Government, or whether they make a profit on the sale; and, in the latter case, what justification there is for the Government making a profit on the sale of stationery; what objection there is to the public supplying their own cards; and whether, as the question has been some years under the consideration of the Departmental Committee of the Post Office, they have yet come to a decision?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I have been requested to answer the question of the noble Lord. I am afraid the only answer I can give is that the question is still under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government; that the prices charged to the public leave a slight margin of profit, but against this is to be set the cost of distribution, which is considerable.

LORD LAMINGTON: My Lords, that would be an argument in favour of allowing the public to supply their own cards.

STAMPING THE HOUR OF COLLECTION ON LETTERS.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

LORD LAMINGTON: I beg to ask Her Majesty's Government whether for the more certain and more rapid transmission of letters, they will adopt the system of stamping the hour of collection on letters as is already done in Canada, Australia, and America, and was once the custom in this country?

VISCOUNT CROSS: The answer I have to give to the noble Lord is to the following effect:—The adoption of the system of stamping the hour of collection in figures upon all letters passing through the post would not tend to greater certainty or rapidity in the transmission of the letters, and would not be more effective than the present system of postmarks in enabling the Post Office to trace delays; nor would it show the actual hour of posting or the course of the letter, which might have to pass through several offices. It could only show the hour at which the letters were brought into the office at which the first stamping took place. Figures were, it is true, at one time introduced into the London postmarks, but the practice was found to give rise to a good deal of misunderstanding on the part of the public, and to lead to complaints which had no foundation. It was on this account eventually abandoned.

COUNTY COUNCILS AND BILLS, SCOTLAND.

QUESTION—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: My Lords, it happened that last year on more than one occasion Bills were brought forward which affected county finance and county administration in Scotland, and that those Bills passed, or very nearly passed through Parliament without the County Councils having had an opportunity of expressing any opinion upon them. I brought the matter under the notice of the Secretary of State for Scotland last year, and he told me that he would take steps to convey the information in future in such cases to the County Councils. My Lords, during the present Session one Bill has been introduced and passed through this House so rapidly that it was impossible for the County Councils to consider it, and there are pending in the other House at the present time Bills, some introduced by private Members, and I think one, at all events, introduced by the Government which also the County Councils have had no opportunity of considering. I should like therefore to ask the Secretary for Scotland what steps have been taken to ensure that all Bills specially affecting counties in Scotland should be brought under the notice of the County Councils in Scotland before being passed by Parliament?

*THE SECRETARY FOR SCOTLAND (the Marquess of LOTHIAN): I suppose the noble Earl is referring to what I stated last year on the Amendment to the Public Health (Scotland) Act Amendment Act when I said that I had given instructions that if possible such Bills should be distributed to the County Councils before they passed through Parliament. I stated at the same time that it was not part of my official duty to do so. I may state that I had made arrangements and hoped it would have been possible to carry them into effect, but I found, in endeavouring to do so, that really in practice it was not feasible. I think the noble Earl will agree with me that, unless this proposal which he now makes could be carried out in its entirety, it would be very undesirable to try it at all; because the County Councils would rely upon the Scotch Office to send them all Bills, whether private or public, and, if they did not get them, they would suppose that the Bills had either been dropped or were not to be pressed. I think that would be a very undesirable state of affairs. My Lords, the fact is that it is quite impossible for my Office to undertake this duty. What had always been done previously to the passing of the Local Government (Scotland) Act was that those interested in any Bill, the Commissioners of Supply, either through agents in London or through Members of Parliament who might be interested in them, always had the Bills sent down to them for consideration; and I cannot see why that system should not now be carried into effect. I am afraid I cannot undertake, on the part of the Government, to forward every Bill, either public or private, to the County Councils for their consideration. At the same time I hope the noble Earl will not misunderstand me; I trust he will bear me out in saying that I have consulted, as my desire is on all possible occasions to consult, the views of the County Councils before legislation is passed—I mean in all practical and proper ways. My Lords, the Roads and Bridges (Scotland) Bill, to which my noble Friend referred, is a Bill that affects the County Councils very considerably I admit; but, as I stated to your Lordships at the time, I was unable to postpone that Bill, even if Amendments might be desired, because it is absolutely necessary that the Bill should pass through Parliament without any delay whatever. If that Bill had been referred to the County Councils it would not have been possible to pass it before June or July, which would have been much too late for the purposes with which it is intended the Bill should deal. Therefore, while I am afraid I cannot undertake to send all Bills to the County Councils for consideration, my answer to the noble Earl is that I will do what I have hitherto done—take every proper step to ascertain their views upon any Bill that may be brought before Parliament.

POOR LAW (IRELAND) AMENDMENT BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee without amendment; and to be read 3^a on Thursday next.

LABOURERS (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS BILL.

HARES BILL.

Reported from the Standing Committee, with an amendment to each Bill; the Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND) ORDER (GLASGOW, &c.) BILL [H.L.]

A Bill to confirm an Order of the Boundary Commissioners for Scotland, relating to the burgh and city of Glasgow, the burgh of Renfrew, and to the parishes of Cathcart, Eastwood, Govan, and Renfrew, in the Counties of Lanark and Renfrew—Was presented by the Lord Ker (M. Lothian); read 1^a; to be printed, and referred to the Examiners. (No. 56.)

House adjourned at twenty minutes before six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Tuesday, 29th March, 1892.

The House met at a quarter after Ten of the clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to,—Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Bill; Army Annual Bill; Millbank Prison Bill, without any Amendment.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners:—

The House went;—and being returned;—

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to,—Consolidated Fund (No. 1) Act, 1892; Army (Annual) Act, 1892; Betting and Loans (Infants) Act, 1892; Millbank Prison Act, 1892.

QUESTIONS.

RUSSIAN JEWISH EMIGRANTS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if any information has been received to the effect that an extraordinary exodus of Jews is likely to take place from Russia in the course of the spring; and in such case, if Her Majesty's Consuls will be instructed to warn the emigrants by public advertisement in the Russian and Polish Press, and all possible means, that as there are large numbers of our own countrymen unable to find full industrial employment, there is no room for more foreign workers in the United Kingdom? In asking this question of my hon. Friend, I beg also to inquire if he is aware that the latest Return of Alien Immigration shows an increase of 1,074 or 25 per cent. in the number of European Aliens arriving in England during January and February, 1892, over the same period last year, bringing the number not en route to America up to nearly 5,000 in the two months?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): My attention has not been called to the Return mentioned by my hon. and gallant Friend, but, as he is aware, the matter would not come under the consideration of the Foreign Office, but of the Board of Trade. With regard to the question as given notice of, I have to say that Her Majesty's Ambassador at St. Petersburg has reported that Mr. Arnold White sees reason to apprehend such an exodus as is referred to. Instructions have been despatched through the British Embassy to Her Majesty's Consuls and Vice Consuls to warn emigrants against coming to this country.

MR. OCTAVIUS V. MORGAN (Battersea): Is the hon. Gentleman aware of the stringent measures adopted by the German Government to prevent any of these 300,000 pauper emigrants going to Germany?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I have only seen the telegrams which have appeared in the Press in the last day or two with regard to the action of the German Government, but I do not think any official information has been received.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): Arising out of this question, I beg to give notice that on Friday I will ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether under the circumstances and the extent of the evil represented, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to ask for any legislative powers to deal with the matter?

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): In reference to his answer, may I ask the hon. Gentleman whether the Consuls have any power in these matters, and is the giving warning likely to be of any use?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: No; I do not think they have any power, but we thought it well—and at least it can do no harm to have it publicly announced—to take steps to have the information brought to the notice of those who intend to come to this country.

THE "CROFTERS' ACT" IN THE OUTER HEBRIDES.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that the Secretary for Scotland has received repeated complaints from crofters in the Islands of Boreray, Benbecula, and other places in the Outer Hebrides, to the effect that extension of holdings, granted them under the Crofters' Act, has been suspended for two years by appeals on the part of the landlords; and whether he will be so good as to use his influence to insure an immediate sitting of a full Court of the Commissioners to dispose of the appeals, and prevent the crofters losing for another season the full benefits of the extension granted?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I am informed that the Secretary for Scotland has received an application from some crofters in Benbecula desiring him to make arrangements for an early hearing of certain appeals, which have only recently been lodged, against orders made at the end of last December, and I have to inform the hon. Member that these appeals will be heard as soon as the Commissioners have disposed of other more urgent business. No applications have been received from the other districts mentioned in the question.

THE SURREY COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTION—REIGATE DIVISION.

SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that at the recent election for a member of the Surrey County Council, Reigate, Western Division, the Returning Officer refused to give a casting vote, and sent the writ back, "No Election;" "F. E. Barnes, 500; J. Seex, 500;" and whether he will order a fresh election, or state what steps will be taken to remove the deadlock?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's):

the Borough because the votes given for the two candidates were equal in number and the Returning Officer had declined to give a casting vote. It appears to be a matter of regret that the Returning Officer did not exercise the power conferred upon him by the Statute of giving a casting vote in a case of equality of votes; but under the circumstances I apprehend that, if it is desired that a further election should be held, the only course is to apply to the High Court for the issue of a mandamus for the purpose.

SALE OF ENCLOSED LANDS—1 AND 2 WILLIAM IV.

SIR W. FOSTER: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is acquainted with any instances in which land enclosed for cultivation as allotments under 1 and 2 William IV., Clause 42, has been sold; whether the proceeds of such sales, if any, are devoted to Poor Law purposes, and whether all such sales are reported to the Local Government Board?

MR. RITCHIE: I am only aware of two instances in which portions of land which has been enclosed for allotments under 1 and 2 William IV., Clause 42, have been sold. In one case the land was acquired under compulsory powers for School Board purposes, and in the other case the portion of the land sold was purchased by the Guardians of the Union as a site for a relief station. The dividends on the proceeds of these sales are applied in aid of the Poor Rate of the parish, with the exception that a portion of the sale produce was applied to the repayment of a debt in respect of a public Free Library. Lands enclosed under the Act referred to, unless they are purchased under powers of compulsory purchase conferred by Parliament, can only be sold with the consent of the Local Government Board.

SIR W. FOSTER: Does the Local Government Board receive notices of all such sales?

MR. RITCHIE: Unless acquired under powers of compulsory purchase they cannot be sold without the sanction of the Board. If they were acquired IMPORTATION OF LIVE CATTLE.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK (Penryn and Falmouth): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can state the reasons which have led to the issue of the recent Order prohibiting the importation of live animals from Spain and Portugal; and whether, in view of the inconvenience caused to importers and others at Penryn and Falmouth, in Cornwall, and other ports in England, he can hold out any hope of the Order being repealed at an early date?

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): Before my right hon. Friend answers that question may I be allowed to supplement it with another question, of which I have given my right hon. Friend private notice; whether in view of the spread of foot-and-mouth disease owing to the importation of live animals from abroad, and seeing that such importation of live animals amounts to one per cent. of our entire consumption, he will take steps to stop the importation altogether?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I think I can answer my hon. Friend behind me at the same time I answer the question on the Paper. I have been induced to issue the recent Order because of the spread of foot-and-mouth disease on the Continent. The last intelligence which we have received mentions the appearance of the disease in Holland in spite of the rigid precautions against it which are taken by the Dutch Government. The importation of animals from Holland was fortunately prohibited by the Board some weeks ago, and I have now thought it right, as a measure of precaution, to prohibit the landing of animals from the remaining countries of Europe from which the importation is comparatively trifling. I cannot hold out any hope of the Order being withdrawn so long as foot-and-mouth disease prevails on the Continent.

INSANITY OF CONVICT CLARKE.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he can give the date upon which a prisoner named Clarke showed signs of insanity, the date upon which the medical officer of Portland Prison first reported him insane, and the date of Clarke's removal to Broadmoor Convict Asylum?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): This prisoner was first visited by the medical officer in December last, was certified insane on 17th February, and removed to Broadmoor on 26th February.

THE CASE OF DR. GALLAGHER.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will allow an independent medical expert to examine Dr. Gallagher, a prisoner in Portland Prison, as to his sanity, if the expense of such examination is borne by Dr. Gallagher's friends?

MR. MATTHEWS: I can only repeat the answer I gave yesterday. There are no reasons why I should allow an independent medical examination.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: The right hon. Gentleman does not propose to have any additional examination to that of the prison doctor?

MR. MATTHEWS: Not at present.

IRISH DRAINAGE BILL.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether he can now state when he intends introducing his Irish Drainage Bill?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary hopes to be able, in a few days, to introduce a Bill dealing with the subject.

TRUANT SCHOOLS FOR SCOTLAND.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware of the views entertained by School Boards in several large cities and burghs in Scotland relative to the expediency of extending to Scotland the powers of English School Boards to establish truant schools; and whether he will introduce a short Bill to confer on School Boards in Scotland these powers during the present Session?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I am aware of the feeling which exists in several of the larger burghs in favour of extending to Scottish School Boards the power of establishing truant schools. I think myself that the extension would be beneficial, but I cannot hold out much hope of legislation on the subject this Session.

PENSIONS TO CRIMEAN AND INDIAN MUTINY VETERANS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that the Chelsea Hospital Commissioners are issuing to Crimean and Indian Mutiny soldiers who are applicants for special pensions a schedule containing 22 elaborate questions requiring much time to answer, while the signature must be attested by a Magistrate, and that again certified as being known to a clergyman or military or naval officer, who must further declare his belief that the oldier's statement is true and complete; and that appended to all these formalities is a certificate, to be signed by a clergyman, inspector or superintendent of police, that the applicant is "without means of support and in destitute circumstances;" and whether it has been foreseen that the effect of such a condition will be to relieve the poor rates by securing pensions for men now depending on parish support, and to exclude applicants who have endeavoured to maintain their independence and self-respect and are not wholly without means of support or absolutely destitute?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY, WAR DEPARTMENT (MR. BRODRICK,
Surrey, Guildford): The paper of questions issued to applicants for these special pensions contains only such inquiries as are necessary to preclude imposture and to enable the Commissioners to select the cases in which pensions are most required. These pensions are compassionate, and men in necessitous circumstances must necessarily be preferred; but of the 100 cases dealt with this year very few were in receipt of parish relief.

POSTAL AND MONEY ORDERS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General will he explain why postal orders may be purchased at any time during business hours at a post office, whereas money orders can only be obtained between 10 a.m. and 4 p.m.; and whether he will give directions that money orders shall be issued at any time during business hours; or, at least, that the hours of issue shall be greatly extended?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The issue of money orders is a business requiring care, and it can be entrusted only to an officer experienced in this particular branch of duty. To require the attendance of such officers during the whole time in which post offices are open would involve considerable additional cost, which would seem to be unnecessary, as there is little demand from the public for money orders after the usual hours. The sale of postal orders on the other hand requires no special skill or knowledge, nor the keeping of any special account, but is like the sale of stamps, and can be undertaken by any officer and at any hour.

RESTRICTIONS ON IRISH CATTLE TRADE.

MR. PINKERTON (Galway): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he is aware of any cattle disease within the cordon drawn by the Londonderry Board of Guardians, which district includes the Counties of Derry, Donegal, Tyrone, Fermanagh, Leitrim, Sligo, Mayo, Galway, Roscommon, the Poor Law Union of Cavan, and the Union of Longford; whether his attention has been directed to a resolution passed by the Derry Board, protesting against the stoppage of cattle drawn from that district at English and Scotch ports, and thereby prevented reaching the markets in the interior; and if he finds, on inquiry, there is no disease of any kind within this district, he will take steps to remove all restrictions upon the exportation of cattle drawn from that protected area?

MR. CHAPLIN: As I stated in reply to the hon. Member for Donegal on Thursday last, I felt it necessary to prohibit the removal inland of animals landed in Greenock and Glasgow, not because I had any reason to believe that foot-and-mouth disease existed within the Derry cordon or in any part of Ireland, but because a somewhat serious outbreak had occurred not long ago in Glasgow, and if movement inland from Glasgow and that neighbourhood had been allowed at that time, the risk of spreading the disease would have been very great. I am happy to say that I have now felt myself justified in removing the prohibition against the movement of animals out of Renfrewshire, and there is now no reason why Irish cattle should not be landed at Greenock and sent inland to those counties which do not object to receive them.

THE WEARING OF THE SHAMROCK

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if it is a fact, as stated, that Staff officers were observed, on the 17th March, wearing the green in uniform on duty in camp at Aldershot; that one regiment was played to Divine Service with a bunch of shamrock stuck in every helmet; and whether, in view of the fact that there seems to be no objection, in principle, to the wearing of national emblems on national festivals by soldiers, their doing so in future should be generally allowed?

MR. BRODRICK: The Commander-in-Chief has no knowledge of the circumstances stated in the question, and His Royal Highness considers it desirable to leave all such questions to the discretion of the commanding officer.

FOOT-AND-MOUTH DISEASE IN KENT.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he can now see his way to rescind or to relax the orders with respect to the moving and selling of sheep and oxen in the County of Kent?

MR. CHAPLIN: I regret to say that an outbreak of foot-and-mouth-disease occurred on Saturday last, the 26th inst., at Pheasant's Farm, Milton, near Sittingbourne, with which locality the hon. Member is well acquainted. Another occurred at Neats Court, Minster, yesterday which was reported to us this morning. Under these circumstances, I do not see my way to make any further relaxation of the existing orders at present.

ROYAL SMALL ARMS FACTORY.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if, considering that Section 4 of "The Superannuation Act, 1887," provides a gratuity on discharge to workmen employed in the Royal Small Arms Factory for not less than seven years, the Director General of Ordnance Factories has published a notice in the factory that he will not recommend for gratuity any employé with less than twelve years' service; and, if so, by whose authority the Act has been overridden?

MR. BRODRICK: The Act is purely permissive, and the seven years was the minimum service for which a gratuity could be awarded. Having regard to the fact that in the Ordnance Factories and the Naval Dockyards the full market rate of wages is paid, and that such gratuities are not given in the private trade, after full consideration it was not thought that a less period than twelve years could be applied to such establishments.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether it is a fact that the Superintendent of the Royal Small Arms Factory, Enfield, has written to the War Office, pointing out the seriousness of the proposed discharges of workmen from the factory; and, if so, will he lay the letter upon the Table?

MR. BRODRICK: No special representation has been made on the subject, but the Secretary of State has been in constant communication with the Superintendent at Enfield to avoid all unnecessary discharges.

THE BEHRING SEA DIFFICULTY.

MR. GOURLEY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government, before refusing the request of the United States Government for a renewal of the modus vivendi of last year regarding seal fishing in Alaskan waters, had under their consideration the telegraphic Despatch of the hon. Member for the Kirkdale Division of Liverpool, Her Majesty's Special Commissioner, in which he stated that "the renewal of last year's prohibition and the 7,500 limit would be beneficial"; if so, will he state why the policy thus indicated is not being followed?

MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It is not correct to say that Her Majesty's Government have ever refused the request for a renewal of the modus vivendi. The conditions under which Her Majesty's Government are prepared to agree to a renewal are fully set out in the papers published yesterday. The hon. Member has not accurately quoted the Despatch of the 9th March from the Special Commissioner, who stated therein that he was of opinion that the taking of one season's limited crop could not injure the seal herd, but that the renewal of last year's prohibition and the 7,500 limit would be beneficial although not necessary. That policy is being followed, subject to the conditions considered necessary by Her Majesty's Government, in the interest of British subjects engaged in the industry.

IMPRISONMENT WITH FLOGGING.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that at the Newcastle Quarter Sessions in October last a man was sentenced by the Recorder (Mr. Digby Seymour) to a year's imprisonment and three whippings of twelve lashes each, one whipping to be inflicted at the beginning of the imprisonment, the second at the end of six months, and the third a week before the man's liberation; if so, what was the nature of the offence; what was the form of the indictment; and under what statutory authority was the sentence imposed?

MR. MATTHEWS: The prisoner in this case was convicted of indecent offences towards three different women. The proceedings taken were under 5 George IV., c. 83, ss. 4 and 10. The Recorder subsequently recommended that the second and third whippings should not be inflicted, and this part of the sentence has been remitted.

PREVENTION OF CRIMES ACT—THAMES POLICE COURT.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case of Jeremiah Cronin, who was charged at the Thames Police Court on Tuesday last under the Prevention of Crimes Act, with failing to report himself, when the learned Magistrate (Mr. Mead) remanded the prisoner for summonses stating the specific charge to be served on him, and is reported to have said—

"At present there is no evidence of any direct charge. I have already pointed out the loose way in which these cases are prepared by the Authorities;"

who is responsible for the proceeding against Cronin; whether the preferring of such charges under the Prevention of Crimes Act has to be specially authorised by any official; and whether he will take steps to secure that the said Act shall be enforced only in a careful manner?

MR. MATTHEWS: I hear from the learned Magistrate that this case will be before him to-day, and, under the circumstances, it is not expedient that I should reply to the hon. Member's question.

COLONIAL COMMERCIAL LEAGUES.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the self-governed Colonies are free to form a Commercial League among themselves, and to admit foreign nations thereto, but that Great Britain is precluded from entering into similar mutually advantageous trading arrangements within the Empire she has founded, by provisions in Treaties made with two alien States; and, in such case, if Her Majesty's Government are taking any steps to remedy this condition of affairs?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In reply to my hon. and gallant Friend, I have to say self-governing Colonies are free to form Commercial Leagues among themselves, subject, in the case of the Australian Colonies, to the restrictions of Section 3 of the Australian Colonies Customs Duties Act of 1873. The products of foreign nations could under the scheme be admitted by the League on the same terms as the produce of the colonies comprising the League; but Great Britain could only be a party to such League on condition that Belgium and the Zollverein received similar treatment to Great Britain. We have no information leading to the belief that at present the Colonies desire to adopt a policy of such a Customs Union; but should such a desire arise, and the Treaty between Great Britain and Belgium and the Zollverein interpose obstacles in the way of the realisation of such a desire, it would be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to consider how to remove those Treaty restrictions and to shape their course accordingly.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: In this connection, may I ask if any answer has been sent to the unanimous address of the Canadian Assembly in December last?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no information, but, of course, if my hon. Friend puts a question on the Paper I will make the necessary inquiry.

SALARIES OF IRISH LAND COMMISSIONERS.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury when he will give effect to his pledge of last year, that measures would be adopted in the present Session to make the salaries of the Irish Land Commissioners appointed in 1885 equivalent to those of their junior colleagues appointed in 1887 and 1890?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It is the intention of the Government to introduce a Bill dealing with this subject, though I do not pledge myself that it will carry out exactly the view which, judging from his question, the hon. Gentleman seems to hold. The Bill will, I hope, be introduced very shortly by my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary, but I will consult with him on the subject.

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to convey that there has been a modification of the view expressed by the Government last year?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is not to understand that, but it would be premature to offer any explanation of the Bill now.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to cut down the higher salaries?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Gentleman should wait until the Bill is introduced.

COAST COMMUNICATIONS.

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the great importance of rendering every facility for the better preservation of life and property round the coast of the United Kingdom, he will be good enough to grant an early opportunity for a Debate on the question of "Coast Communication," in order that the House may be enabled to pronounce an opinion as to the desirability of establishing a complete system of telephonic and telegraphic communication round the coast as well as with certain rock lighthouses and light vessels? I ask this question, notwithstanding the fact that I have been fortunate enough to secure this day four weeks for the discussion of my Motion on the subject.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope my hon. Friend will be fortunate enough without any special arrangement to obtain the day he seeks for the discussion of the important question to which he refers, but I am afraid that in the event of my hon. Friend not finding the time by the ordinary methods to bring the subject before the House, it will be impossible for the Government to make any exception in favour of a particular Resolution without involving themselves in difficulties which would make the carrying on of Government Business well nigh impossible. I should be glad, however, if the hon. Baronet would specify more particularly what measures he has in view which he desires to recommend to our notice.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: With the permission of the House I may be allowed to say that what I ask for is: (1) That a complete system of day and night (including Sundays) telephonic and telegraphic communication be provided by Her Majesty's Government round the coast of the United Kingdom in order that every coastguard and signal station be so connected, and that where such stations do not exist the post offices nearest to the lifeboat stations be connected; (2) that certain lighthouses which could probably furnish early and valuable information to lifeboat and rocket apparatus stations be also placed in telephonic and telegraphic communication; (3) that a Royal Commission be appointed to inquire into the desirability of connecting certain light-vessels and rock lighthouses by cable with the mainland in order to give information of vessels in distress.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As my hon. Friend knows, the Government have hearty sympathy with the object he has in view, and I hope that during the present year the Government may be able to do something material towards carrying it out.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Does the hon. Baronet mean to include Ireland in his proposal; he said, I think, Great Britain?

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: I said distinctly the United Kingdom.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Does that include Ireland?

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: England, Scotland, and Ireland.

EMPLOYMENT OF WILLIAM DIGBY, OF CALEDON, COUNTY TYRONE.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if it is a fact that William Digby, of Caledon, County Tyrone, was employed for eight years in carrying the night mail to Tynan on Sundays at 1s. a week, the job having been offered to several Protestants and refused; whether an arrangement having been come to lately by which the post became worth 6s. a week, Digby has been discharged and a Protestant appointed in his place, and whether there was any fault to be found with Digby on the score of character?

SIR J. FERGUSON: Digby was employed by the sub-postmistress of Caledon as station messenger on Sunday evenings, a duty for which an allowance was made of 1s. a trip. Whether the job had been offered to others, and, if so, of what religion these others were, is not known. Since the 23rd February last the duty has been merged in a night mail station service, for which an allowance is made of 6s. a week, and Digby's services are no longer required. He is reported to have been insubordinate and to have given much trouble at Christmas time.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say what was the nature of the insubordination? Was it in the fact that the man acted as agent for a Nationalist subscription?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The official Report says: Owing to his insubordinate conduct, and he having given much trouble to the sub-postmistress during the late pressure, he cannot be recommended for further employment.

THE DUNDALK BURIAL BOARD.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (on behalf of Mr. NOLAN, Louth, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Local Government Board have declined to sanction a loan of £6,500 applied for by the Dundalk Joint Burial Board, under Section 247 of "The Public Health (Ireland) Act, 1878," for the purpose of providing a cemetery for the united district of Dundalk, under the Dundalk Joint Burial Board Provisional Order, 1891, upon the ground that a certain proportion of the sum asked for would be chargeable on the urban district of Dundalk, which sum with the balances of other loans would exceed twice the annual assessable value of that district; whether he is aware that the net annual value of the premises assessable within the district of the Joint Board amounts to upwards of £31,000, and whether, inasmuch as the Joint Board has not at present incurred any liability by borrowing, it is entitled to borrow up to double that amount without reference to the separate liabilities of its constituent authorities; and if he would state what is the practice as regards borrowing by Joint Boards adopted by the English Local Government Board?

MR. MADDEN: The case is substantially as stated in the first paragraph of the question. The net annual value of the urban sanitary district is £21,890; and twice that amount, or £43,780, is the limit under Statute of the borrowing power. There is at present a sum of £35,995 due in respect of loans borrowed under the Sanitary Acts, which thus leaves £7,785 as the present maximum amount which can be borrowed as a charge upon the urban sanitary district. The proportion of the proposed burial loan for which this district would be liable amounts to about £4,500, while at the same time there is a proposed sewerage loan of £7,000, making a total of £11,500 against the present maximum limit of £7,785; so that the Local Government Board were unable to sanction the amounts sought. The Board were legally advised that they were bound to take into account the indebtedness of the urban sanitary district when considering the loan to the Joint Burial Board. An Inspector of the Local Government Board has recently held an inquiry, and as a result the Board has suggested that the Sanitary Authorities and the Burial Board should confer with a view to proposing some modification of their schemes.

CERTIFICATE OF DEATH.

MR. MADEN (Lancashire, Rossendale): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to an inquest held on 22nd March, 1892, at the Islington Coroner's Court, by Dr. G. Danford Thomas, on the body of Susannah Elizabeth Waller, aged seven months, the daughter of Herbert Waller, greengrocer, of 100, Palmerston Road, Finsbury Park; and whether he is aware that a certificate of death was given signed by D. H. Dyte, L.R.C.P. Lond., M.R.C.S. England, and L.S.A. Lond., of 43, Poole's Park, who it was proved had not seen the deceased before her death; if so, what course of action does the Home Secretary propose to take?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received a Report on this case from the Coroner. The facts are correctly stated in the question. The Coroner informs me that he has communicated with the Registrar General in order that such legal action may be taken as he deems desirable. I may add that I have received a letter from Dr. Dyte, who admits he had not personally seen the deceased and expresses his deep regret, but he explains that the child was regularly attended by his assistants, who reported to him from time to time, and that he was only prevented from personal attendance on account of severe illness.

THE POLICE REGULATIONS AS TO CARTS.

SIR J. KENNAWAY (Devon, Honiton): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, in the case of Dr. Callaghan, of Colyton, whose leg was broken owing to his horse shying at a Post Office hand-cart left unattended in the public road, the leaving of the hand-cart was a breach of Police Regulations, for which the Department is responsible, and therefore liable to make compensation to Dr. Callaghan?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am informed that there was no breach of Police Regulations in this matter. The Regulations require that any truck shall not "stand longer than is necessary for loading or unloading goods," and in this instance the accident happened whilst the Post Office men were carrying into the office the parcel basket which had been brought in the truck. It is quite clear that the Department is absolutely free from all responsibility in the matter.

ROYAL ARMY CLOTHING FACTORY.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether, in connection with the Royal Army Clothing Factory, any value-scale for trimmings has as yet been adopted; and, if so, since when and how; and whether the apportionment of amounts chargeable to the Army Clothing Factory service on garments in connection with cutting and trimming is fixed by the manager of the factory and accepted on his authority?

MR. BRODRICK: There are difficulties in fixing a value-scale for trimmings. The matter is, however, under consideration, and a decision will soon be arrived at. The apportionment of amounts chargeable on garments in connection with cutting and trimming is according to a scale drawn up by the manager of the Clothing Factory; and as he alone has the practical experience necessary, this scale is accepted on his authority.

DR. TANNER: Is it a fact that these matters have been animadverted upon on many occasions, and have been condemned by the Attorney General?

MR. BRODRICK: I am not aware that that was so, but the whole matter will be carefully inquired into.

OFFICERS OF DEPOT CENTRES.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (for Colonel NOLAN, Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what is the total cost of the pay and allowances of the officers commanding dépôt centres?

MR. BRODRICK: The total cost is £40,146; £29,196 is the amount saved from the Pension List; and, therefore, that leaves £10,950 as the net cost of this employment.

MILITARY LANDS CONSOLIDATION BILL.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: I desire to put a question to my hon. Friend, of which I have not been able to give him private notice. I would ask him whether he is aware that Clause 15 of the Military Lands Consolidation Bill, read a second time last night, seriously affects the rights of fishermen, coasting traders, and others; whether he will defer the appointment of a Select Committee until the Target Practice Seawards Committee have reported; and whether he is aware that the Bill will affect the interests referred to at Plymouth, the Needles passage of the Solent, a portion of the sea near Portsmouth, a portion of the Thames near Sheerness, and Cork Harbour?

MR. BRODRICK: I am not aware of the points to which the hon. Baronet refers, but I think if he will consult the Bills which are here consolidated, he will find that we are only dealing with the present state of the law. I would suggest to the hon. Baronet that when the Select Committee is appointed, that will be the proper opportunity for bringing on such points and for calling attention to them, and I will undertake, as far as I have the power, to see that the interests which he suggests are properly represented on the Select Committee.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: Might I point out to the hon. Member—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: I would ask my hon. Friend whether he is aware that the Committee on Target Practice Seawards has only just commenced its proceedings, and that the Committee has to go down to Plymouth and other places and make inquiries, and whether he will defer the appointment of a Select Committee till evidence has been brought before the Target Practice Committee and they have been able to report?

MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): Might I ask if the War Office have not received several complaints from the Cork Harbour Commissioners as to this target sea practice?

MR. BRODRICK: I am not aware that such complaints have been received. As regards the question of the hon. Baronet, the best course would be not to move the Select Committee this week, and if he will kindly renew his question on a subsequent occasion I will undertake to give him an answer on the points he has raised.

SCOTCH EQUIVALENT GRANT BILL.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury when he proposes to take the Second Reading of the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: On Thursday.

MR. WALLACE: Is the right hon. Gentleman certain that the Second Reading of that Bill will be taken on that day?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As certain as anything can be in this House.

MR. WALLACE: I would ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he knows in what order he proposes to take the Second Reading of the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill on Thursday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already stated four times that we intend to put it down as the First Order of the Day.

THE INSPECTION OF MINES.

MR. BURT (Morpeth): I beg to ask the Home Secretary whether his attention has been called to the refusal of a colliery manager to allow the Inspectors appointed by the workmen under General Rule 38 of the Mines Regulation Act to examine the place where a fatal accident may have happened; and whether the workmen's Inspectors are not empowered by the Act to examine such places?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have received no official information of such an instance as the hon. Member refers to. By the 38th rule of the Coal Mines Regulation Act it is provided that an examination by or on behalf of the workmen of every and any part of the mine shall be permitted, and it is compulsory upon the owner to afford every facility for this being done at least once a month. Whether such an examination has, or has not been made, I hope that in the event of anything serious the owner would place no obstacle in the way of such inspection by the workmen.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): Mr. Speaker, may I call attention to the second Order of the Day, "Military Lands Consolidation Bill. Adjourned Debate on Motion for committing the Bill to a Select Committee." That was proposed, I believe, after twelve o'clock. Am I to understand that this is an adjourned Debate, it being contentious Business after twelve o'clock?

MR. SPEAKER: After the Second Reading of the Bill, the Member in charge stated what further action was proposed to be taken in regard to it. There might not have been any objection, but, he having proposed that the Bill be referred to a Committee, and objection being taken, I at once said that in the circumstances the Bill must stand over, and so it becomes from the necessity of the case an adjourned Debate.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): On the last occasion on which I called attention to a matter connected with the subject, an hon. Member came to me afterwards and asked what interest I had in the telegraph system. I may, therefore, at the outset explain that I have no earthly interest as a private individual in the Telephone Company whatever. My interest in the whole question of telegraphy and telephony arises from the fact that many years ago I was instrumental in getting this House to accept the Resolution which led to the adoption of sixpenny telegrams. The Post Office of this country acquired the telegraph system when the telephone had not been invented. In 1876, when a Committee sat to consider the question of postal telegraphs, the invention had attracted some attention, but no mention was made of the telephone as a possible adjunct of the telegraph. In 1878 telephonic communication was being developed, and the system was so far perfected that the Post Office saw it was likely to grow into a serious competitor with the postal telegraphs, and accordingly in a Bill which was introduced in 1878—a Telegraph Bill—the Government endeavoured to extend the monopoly of the telegraphs, which they had purchased, to the monopoly of telephonic communication, which they certainly had not purchased. And in the Telegraph Bill of 1878, as it came down from the House of Lords to this House, Clause 3 read as follows:—

"The term telegraph in addition to the meaning assigned to it by that Act shall include any apparatus for transmitting messages or other communications with the aid of electricity, magnetism, or any other like agency."

That was evidently intended to confer on the Post Office a monopoly of telephonic communication without any proposal to compensate the inventor for his invention in this country. That appeared to me and some of my friends a dishonest proposal, and we opposed the Bill on that ground until the Government consented to drop that clause. The Bill went through with that clause knocked out, but the Post Office saw the danger to their monopoly of the telegraphs which would arise from the development of the telephone, and they set to work and tried to obtain a monopoly in another fashion. Under another clause of the Telegraphs Acts they brought an action, and on the 21st December, 1880, Mr. Justice Stephen delivered judgment in their favour, declaring that the telephone was, for the purposes of the Telegraphs Acts, a telegraph. I do not blame the Post Office for their anxiety to secure a monopoly of telephonic communication. They had expended at this time a sum of £10,000,000 of public money in acquiring the telegraph system, the postal telegraphs were barely paying their working expenses, and it was certain if the competition of the telephone was brought to bear against the telegraph system the result would be a heavy loss to the Post Office. I do not find fault with them, therefore, for endeavouring to extend the monopoly as a protection against that loss. And I say if they had followed up the advantage they had gained in a more business-like manner, they would have been enabled to acquire, on very reasonable terms indeed, all the equitable rights of the inventor of the telephone; they would have been in a position to arrest any attempt to plunder them, as was done in the case of the telegraphs, and in the telephone in this country they would have acquired a most valuable addition to our telegraphic service, which they could have worked in a way such as no private company could have done. The Post Office had the telegraphs in its own hands, it had the highest technical skill in its own department, a monopoly of buildings and offices all over the country, and a network of telephonic communication could have been established with which no private company could ever hope to have competed in point of efficiency and cheapness. And the telephone in that way would have been an admirable feeder of the telegraph service. The Government when they acquired the telegraph service did not, as I think they should have done, afford some equitable compensation to the inventors of the telephone. Instead of doing that, they proposed to attempt to set up some telephonic service for themselves. They did it, however, in a very feeble way, and they defended themselves rather by levying a very heavy tax, a crushing tax, upon such Telephone Companies as were in existence. They levied upon those Companies a tax of some ten per cent. upon their gross earnings. If their intention was to crush out this competition the invention was too valuable to be crushed out, and it improved and extended notwithstanding the heavy taxation. By-and-bye the public conscience began to feel touched. Mr. Fawcett, a gentleman with a very high sense of what was just and who was in intimate touch with public opinion in all matters connected with his Department, saw that the position of the Post Office was untenable, and proposed a new arrangement with the Telephone Companies. In some respects his arrangement did not go far enough; it might with advantage have further reduced the royalties proposed to be levied; but it also went too far, as it placed the trunk lines of the country at the disposal of the Telephone Companies, or promised to give them licences over the trunk lines for communication between the great towns. When the Post Office acquired the telegraphs, an argument put forward in favour of monopoly was perfectly sound. It was that if competing companies were allowed they would tap the large towns which were profitable and leave the smaller and unprofitable towns to the Post Office. The Postmaster General said that in those places where the trunk system has been most largely developed the postal revenue was suffering, and that to such an extent as to make it imperative to consider the question of taking back these trunk lines. By these lines London, Birmingham, Liverpool, Manchester, Leeds, Brighton, and other large towns are in communication, and all the large Scotch towns are similarly connected, while it is promised that, at an early date, all the large towns throughout England and Scotland shall be in communication. Long distance telephony can be made perfectly satisfactory, as is proved by the line between Paris and London, and by the long-distance Continental lines; but in this country it has not yet been developed to such an extent as to be a dangerous rival to the Post Office. When, however, we have the double wire system, with the best instruments, it will prove a formidable rival to the Government telegraphic department. A crisis has now arisen in consequence of the companies asking for powers which it would be right for them to seek if they were proprietors instead of being merely licensees, and the Government oppose these powers. The right hon. Gentleman is too fair-minded not to know that it is impossible to check the growth of the telephone system in this country, and he comes forward to propose as a new modus vivendi that the Government should take back their right to the trunk lines, and in return should lay inter-exchange cables, and allow the use of the post offices as public call offices to the Telephone Exchanges. Mr. Fawcett hoped through competition to secure a cheap and efficient public service. There were, at the time of his arrangement, 13 Telephone Companies licensed to set up wires throughout the Kingdom, but there was nothing like free trade among them. I know of a number of instances where licences were refused when they ought to have been granted. There is the case of a Mr. Symmington, in my own constituency, who, before the introduction of the telephone, created an A B C Telegraph Exchange, and secured a number of subscribers, who had A B C telegraph instruments. He, therefore, first introduced the system of telegraphic exchanges to this country, but he was refused a telephone licence. In another case a gentleman, at the approach of the period for the expiration of the Bell patent, brought over some loud-speaking telephones and sought a licence, which was refused him. In December, 1890, I asked a question on the subject, and was told that it was under consideration. In June, 1891, I received the same reply, and a few weeks ago the Postmaster General told me that it was still under consideration. Meanwhile, the competing companies have come to a nice comfortable arrangement between themselves; they have practically united in one single company, and so constituted a great monopoly. The consequence is, that the present price of the telephone service is greater than anywhere else in the world. The rent in London is £20, and the service is not such as to give satisfaction. A deputation from the Chamber of Commerce waited on the right hon. Gentleman the other day, and one member spoke of the London service as being the dearest and most inefficient in the world, and another represented some thousands of telephone users, united in a Telephone Subscribers' Protection Society, whose object was to get a better service from the National Company. Mr. Raikes opposed the amalgamation of the National and the United Telephone Companies, and threatened official pains and penalties, but nothing has been done in the matter. Now, the right hon. Gentleman proposes another policy which, so far as I can see, will consolidate and perpetuate the telephone monopoly which at present exists. He proposes a system of greater restriction, and tells us that new licences shall only be given under conditions of increased stringency. He also proposes to give the post offices as public call offices, and that will practically give the company using them a monopoly, or, at any rate, an advantage over the other companies. If the Government charge for the inter-exchange cables it will be an addition to the royalty, and the companies will then probably add to their charge, and certainly not lower them. As I do not wish to be unfair to the Post Office, I may mention another reason for the unsatisfactory condition of the telephone service. The paper Electricity says—

"It is not the Post Office which has stood in the way of telephonic progress. Like electric lighting, telephony has been artificially kept up by iniquitous financial speculation, and, as for instance in London, by the ignorance and bungling of an inexperienced staff of employes."

I cannot speak about the speculation and inexperienced employes, but that something beyond the Post Office is to blame for the high charges is evident from the fact that in those districts where dissatisfaction has given rise to competition—as in Manchester—the rent has been reduced to £6 a year, instead of £10 or £12 a year as in other provincial towns. That proves that high charges and unsatisfactory service deter the public from using the telephone. The Manchester Company, which is a new one, put down the double wire system, and within three months of starting had 800 subscribers, the total number of subscribers in London being only five times as many. This incontestably proves that there is something beyond the royalty which is responsible for the strangulation of the telephone business in this country. The policy of the Post Office has utterly failed to bring about competition; it has led to monopoly and high charges; and has kept out improved instruments and an improved system of wires. If we had free competition new companies would come in and spend their capital to greater advantage, and the public would be better served. But between the practical monopoly which the Government has allowed the National Telephone Company to obtain and the inflated capitalisation of the Company, the old system, which was good enough at the commencement of telephonic enterprise in this country, is still considered good enough in London, and practically good enough for all the country except where competition has induced the Company to lower its rates. The result has been to cripple the system. The right hon. Gentleman mentioned the other day that the City of Berlin, although it has not one fourth of the population of London, and although it has much greater postal facilities than London—for it has a tube post by which you can every five minutes send a card or a letter to any part of the town—and although Germany is a very much poorer country, yet in spite of these disadvantages Berlin has four times the number of telephone subscribers that London has.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: What I said was that the proportion of telephones was four times greater than in London. I mean that while the number of telephone subscribers in London may be one per 1,000, in Berlin it is four per 1,000.

Dr. Cameron

*DR. CAMERON: However that may be, the telephone subscribers in Berlin number 17,000, and the fact remains that the Government work the telephones. In France the Government recently took over the telephones, and in 18 months from the time of taking over the number of subscribers in Paris was nearly doubled. Between September, 1889, and January, 1892, the number of subscribers had been increased by 3,475, and the annual income had been augmented by £40,000. This shows how powerful is the natural growth of telephonic communication when once restrictions have been removed and an efficient service provided. It has often been said that telephones are the luxury of the rich. They have been the luxury of the rich in this country in consequence of the high charges and the heavy imposts placed upon them by the Post Office. In Switzerland the Government charge 80 francs (64s.) a year as a fundamental tax for 800 messages, and over that number a charge is made of five centimes (½d.) A similar tariff has been adopted in Norway and Sweden, and I maintain that when once the service is in the hands of the Post Office, and when there is a call box in every post office, there will be no reason why the telephone should not be as generally used as the telegraph, and it will be most useful to the poorer classes of the community who cannot compress their words to meet the necessities and charges of the telegraph. Of this I am certain—that if the Post Office will give the facilities which they propose to do in connection with the Post Office to Telephone Companies, and if the Telephone Companies, driven by public opinion and the force of competition, double their wires and improve their system, the Post Office will find that in urban districts also the telephone system will rise up as a formidable competitor to the Post Office telegraphs. The Post Office will, sooner or later, in self-protection, have to acquire the telephone system, and every year the sum they will have to pay for it increases. If they had acquired it in 1880 they might have secured it for a few hundred thousands: now the sum has grown to millions. But for the impression which the heavy cost of the acquisition of the telegraphs has made upon the country I am certain that the Post Office would not hesitate to purchase the telephone system; but it must be remembered that the Post Office is in a totally different position with respect to the acquisition of the telephones from that it was in at the time of the purchase of the telegraphs. When it proposed to purchase the telegraph system, it proposed to purchase an undertaking over which it had no control, and for the management of which it had no special facilities. After completing the purchase on the best terms it could make it had to buy its experience, and that at a very costly rate. The telephone stands in quite a different position. It possesses already the monopoly of telephone communication, and it can refuse licences or can grant licenses to competing companies. I have no desire to see anything like a confiscation of existing rights, but the Post Office must see that it is in a position to insure that it should not be called upon to pay more than a fair and equitable sum for the acquisition of the system. Already it has a large margin of profit in its royalties, so that if it were to forego altogether the dividends which the Telephone Companies pay, and to forego any prospective increase which the companies will have to pay on their inflations of capital, the development of the system would rapidly increase the revenue which the Government derives from that source. There is a most intimate connection between the telephone and the telegraph. Already it has been shown that simultaneously you can have telephonic and telegraphic messages transmitted along the same wire. Already in Germany the telephone has been made use of as a means of communicating to outlying districts with most satisfactory results. The Government has undertaken the business of telephonic communication with Paris, and, doubtless, that experiment will be followed by the extension of the telephone cables to other European countries. The Post Office is now proposing to take over the trunk lines, and to take over the construction and charge of inter-exchange cables. To safeguard their telegraphic business they will find that they are bound to go a step further and to take over the whole of the business into their hands. Up to the present the Post Office has only appeared in connection with the telephone as the proprietor of rights for which it has never paid; as a levier of blackmail on the users of the telephone, and as a taxer of that speedy communication between the citizens of the country, and especially between business people, which has done so much to accelerate and to stimulate business in this country. Under the Post Office system of dual control, and in spite of the avowed policy of the Office, a monopoly has grown up under which the public groan and the telephone languishes; and in asking the House to support the Resolution which I have put on the Paper, I ask the House to affirm the principle that the Post Office should do something to justify its monopoly, and that it should relieve us of this system of dual control, which has been fraught with so much mischief.

(3.21.) MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I think it is a matter for regret that more notice was not given of a question of the importance of this one. It is of the greatest importance that this House should strengthen the hands of the Postmaster General by insisting that the whole system of telephonic communication should be taken over by the country. At the same time, I cannot agree with the hon. Member (Dr. Cameron) that it would have been better if the telephones had been taken over ten years ago, because a great number of the concessions are falling in, and there is now a better opportunity for the Postmaster General to acquire the whole system on advantageous terms than at any previous period. It has been clearly pointed out that the right hon. Gentleman has not yet gone far enough, but I hope that the discussion to-day will enable him to go further, and take over the whole telephonic connection. I was not a very great advocate for telephonic communication until I had seen the marvellous progress, the splendid instruments, and the system of work in foreign countries. I had no notion of the great future of telephonic communication until I had witnessed the system in Australia, and had read an article, which has no doubt been brought under the notice of the Postmaster General, by the Duke of Marlborough on "The Future of Telephonic Communication." No one who has read that article could fail to come to the conclusion that it is absolutely necessary for the State to take over the telephonic system, and to introduce some system such as is in force in Melbourne, a city with only a third of a million of inhabitants. I trust that this will not be made a Party question, but will receive the support of the entire House, and I have pleasure in supporting the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "the Post Office system of granting licences to private telephone companies having resulted in the restriction of telephonic communication in this country and a costly and inefficient service, this House is of opinion that, alike in the interest of the postal telegraph and the telephone service, the telephonic monopoly possessed by the Post Office should be worked directly and in connection with the Postal Telegraph Department," — (Dr. Cameron,)

—instead thereof.

* (3.26.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I agree most cordially with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Heaton) in expressing regret that more general notice was not given of this Debate, for I am certain that there is no question in which the commercial community just now takes more interest than in that of telephonic communication. I have had the opportunity, as Chairman of the Council of the London Chamber of Commerce, of ascertaining the wishes of the business part of the community with regard to this matter, and I do not hesitate to say that the general feeling is that in the matter of telephonic communication we are much behind other countries. Experience has conclusively proved that the telephone is a great commercial advantage, and, in fact, that in these days commerce cannot be successfully carried on unless the system of communications is as perfect as it can possibly be made. Despatch is now one of the chief elements of profit, and unless commerce has at its service the latest and best appliances of science it cannot be conducted advantageously or properly. I believe, with the first speaker (Dr. Cameron), that the telephones could have been very profitably bought some years ago, and that every year adds to the sum we shall have to pay for them. For my own part, I value at its full rate the advantages which this country has derived from private enterprise, but I think there is now some danger of estimating too highly the service of private enterprise and of underrating the power and organisation of the State. The principle of action which I venture to suggest on this point is that the State ought, as a general rule, to do for the community those things which it can do cheaper and better than the individuals themselves; and this principle is, in my opinion, applicable both in the State and in the Municipalities, not only to subjects of primary necessity, in which it has been largely adopted, but also to our system of communication and the like. And, as regards communications, it is a matter of some urgency that the State should bring to the aid of the individuals greater power than they can themselves apply. Then I think there can be no doubt of this,—that other countries are taking every means to avail themselves of that power and organisation on the part of the community. Let us contrast for a moment the want of development of the telephone compared, in the hands of private companies, with what has been done by the State in regard to the telegraphs, and even the telephone itself. I had an opportunity of experiencing the other day the great facility with which communication could take place from the London General Post Office with so distant a place as Marseilles. That is no longer an experiment; it is a most admirable success as between London and the south of France. I have also some experience of such matters in America, where numbers of towns practically become one, and where an admirable system of intercommunication exists. And judging of the application of the telephone in this country I have no hesitation in saying that when conducted by the Post Office it is decidedly better than in the case of the application by the chief private company. So far as I have had an opportunity of comparing their relative merits, I believe the system introduced by the State under the admirable direction of Mr. Preece has been attended with great practical advantages in this country. It may not be cheaper, but, whether due to a complete metallic circuit and so to the limitation of induction (as I think essential), or to other causes, it is certainly much better because more audible. That being so, I think we ought to persevere in the same direction. The great obstacle, possibly, to the development of the telephonic system may be the fact that it may be made to contribute too much to revenue. I think, in the case of the Post Office that has been carried too far, and that the commercial community has been practically and unduly taxed for the benefit of others, whereas the community ought not to be taxed for classes or classes for the community. In the event of acquiring the telephonic system, therefore the House should protest against the Treasury regarding the system mainly or chiefly for revenue purposes. What the country wants, if it is to keep pace with competing nations, is the best and the cheapest forms of inter-communication.

Mr. Henniker Heaton

(3.35.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I entirely agree with my hon. Friend, and it seems to me to be essentially a question whether in this particular monopoly the State ought to impose conditions on private companies, or do the work itself. The hon. Gentleman opposite has elaborated a very interesting and valuable Socialistic view of the duties of the State. I very much agree with him, speaking generally; but on this particular subject I would point out that this is essentially a luxury for the rich. ("No, no.") Well, you say "No"; my hon. Friend says "No" behind me. It depends upon who my hon. Friend considers a rich man. There is no doubt that if telephonic communication is introduced into houses generally, it will be at a charge of at least £6 per house. (Dr. CAMERON: No, £4.) Well, £4. I will split the difference, and say £5. Anyhow, as a matter of fact, it will cost about £40 to connect any particular house with the telephone. You have got to pay interest on that; besides that, you have to pay for the expenditure of the central office—the people employed on the thing—and I think if anybody calculates it, he will see that I am not very far wrong in saying that the minimum cost in cities like London would certainly be over £5 for the privilege of being connected with the telephone. Therefore, I should not say that this is essentially a poor man's question, and I should rather say that it is a question for not a very rich man like my hon. Friend behind me, but for that man who has certainly a larger amount of wealth than the mass of the community. I remember talking to the late Mr. Fawcett when he was Postmaster General upon this very question, and at that time I urged him to take the patents up at the expense of the State, because I thought the telephone would compete in private hands with the telegraphs and injuriously affect the Revenue. The difficulty then was this: the patents were not in the hands of the original patentee, the patents had got into the hands of the promoters of companies and such like persons. It would, consequently, involve a charge of an immense sum of money for these patents more than they were worth, considering that the patents would be out after the lapse of about 14 years. That was the reason why Mr. Fawcett did not take up the cables. I remember putting the matter to the late Mr. Raikes when he was Postmaster General, and he pointed out to me that he himself personally was in favour of taking over the whole thing, but he said the Treasury were not in favour of it, looking at the very great expenditure. The expenditure would be very great indeed. It would amount to about £8,000,000, and certainly it is a matter seriously to be considered, not whether this would add to the Revenue but whether this would pay its expenditure, before we undertake it. Now, my hon. Friend behind me has complained of the essential monopolies involved in the present system of licences; but, as I understand the Government plan, that is not intended. As a matter of fact, I believe that almost all the persons who have acquired licences have acquired them simply with the object of re-selling them to some particular company. In fact, their object has been a blackmailing one. Therefore, I think the Government ought to be very careful in giving these licences. I think that when the right hon. Gentleman (the Postmaster General) arranges the system in a new Bill he ought to do something like what has been done in regard to the Gas Companies, but with more care for the public interest. He ought to estimate himself, about what the fair price ought to be, and he ought not to allow a company to charge above a certain tariff; and he ought not to allow a company to pay above a certain dividend, providing for a reduction in price under certain circumstances. If this were done, I very much doubt whether there would be any considerable objection to this matter being carried out by public companies. Now we have a National Telephone Company in London. My hon. Friend has most properly complained of that company. That company is a financing company. It had got a capital—speaking in round numbers—of about £3,000,000 sterling. A very large portion of this amount has been expended on what is called buying from the patentees; in point of fact buying patents from middlemen, and Heaven knows who has participated in the spoil. Practically speaking all the important patents have lapsed already, or will lapse in the present year; and therefore we may conceive that the amount of capital which was paid for them is absolutely dead. But these gentlemen have also been perpetually amalgamating with other companies. I think it would have been infinitely better if the Post Office had interfered with these amalgamations. As regards this telephonic system, not only is the service expensive, but the service is exceedingly bad. This may be the consequence of not having this entire metallic circuit. I confess, from the outline of the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General, I certainly do think, with certain further provisions which I have suggested, it would be better for the public and better for themselves if they carried out this system which is to absorb all the trunk lines, and to make these trunk lines intercommunicate between town and town. I think there is at the present moment a trunk line between Paris and London, and I think I am right in saying that it does not pay.

DR. CAMERON: That is not one of the trunk lines that is going to be taken up. The Government has that, and with the exception of that trunk line it would start discharged of the trunk lines that do not pay.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Certainly; and we will only take over those that do pay. I am very anxious to see the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman, but I am bound to say that from the general statement that he made the other day I thought the Bill met this very difficult question very fairly. Like my hon. Friend behind me, I have not, and never had, any financial interest in this matter; but I have always taken an interest in this matter. I thought we were thoroughly behindhand in proportion to the advance other countries have made in telephonic communication; and I do hope that not only in London, but in all the other great towns, we shall have, not only a good telephonic system, but a good, cheap, telegraph system of communication.

*(3.50.) MR. QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): I did not intend to say one single word in this Debate, but as I happen to be so largely interested in the institution which has been so much alluded to by hon. Members who have spoken, I have thought it my duty to draw some slight attention to the matter before the Postmaster General makes his statement. I think I may fairly pass by the statements of my hon. Friend the senior Member for Northampton, who has just sat down. Members of this House must be pretty well familiar with them by this time. I myself have read them, or something very much like them, in the journal with which the hon. Member is connected; and each time they have appeared, I must say I have regarded them with less and less apprehension. I had hoped to have heard from the hon. Member something fresh to-day. It is wonderful that any Company could have developed to such an extent as that with which I am connected, with the hindrances and the disadvantages with which it has had to contend, and the utter absence of any power of communication from place to place, and having to do all its business on sufferance. The hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow has talked about "costly and inefficient service." I should like to state that over 160,000,000 messages have been transmitted at the cost of under $\frac{1}{2}$ d. a message over the wires of the National Telephone Company, which, with the answers incidental, and which, Sir, you know as "arising out of," represent nearer 200,000,000. On the question that the trunk wires are inefficient I may state that on one day we sent 40,000 messages between Liverpool and Manchester districts. One more instance to show that we are not so inefficient: in Leicester, Her Majesty's Post Office Telephone had 130 subscribers in July, 1890, when the Company's Office was opened. The Government Office has now only 100, while the National Company have 275, and yet our subscribers have not the same privileges of those of Her Majesty's Post Office. I cannot understand how it is that in a free country like this the licences of the Government are not entitled to the same privileges as the Government subscribers themselves. In spite, however, of this dead weight, the Company has made marvellous way in all parts of the country. I will also say that if it had the requisite and proper powers it has the means, it has the intelligence, and it has the staff, to meet the requirements of its subscribers in London also; and it would be perfectly able to do the work if the Postmaster General would delegate to it those powers for which it contends. I trust it will not be considered that I am holding a brief for the National Company; and that the House will excuse me for desiring to show that it has made very considerable progress, and done much towards the cheapening of communication in this country.

(3.56.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): Both the hon. Member for Northampton and the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down have failed to show us any reason why the telephonic system should not be taken over by the State. I do not regard the acquisition of it by the State as a mere commercial act. I believe it would be more to the benefit of the community if it were worked by the State than by private companies. Let me take the case of the Small Arms Factory at Enfield. I hold that it would have been impossible, had that factory been in the hands of a private company, to have attracted so much attention to what has occurred there, and to have obtained such favourable answers from Ministers with regard to it. I deplore the loss of the profits which might have been made had the State taken over the railway system of the country. Telephone communication will undoubtedly progress in the same ratio as the railways have progressed, and it will be another source of regret if the profits which will arise from it are enjoyed by private companies instead of by the community at large. There was one statement which fell from the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, from which I must entirely dissociate myself. If there is one profession in the world which requires the services of a skilled operator it is that which is connected with the telephone. Personally, I have never been able to understand what anyone says to me through it, and I doubt whether those who have been the recipients of my confidences by its means have made out what I have said myself. Therefore, I take it that the telephonic trade is a highly skilled trade. I hope that the House will adopt the Resolution of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow.

(4.3.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): It has been stated that the telephonic communication in London would have been more satisfactory had the Company had sufficient powers to work upon. I quite believe that that is true; but I say that no Government can wisely give to a private company the powers that are necessary to conduct an undertaking of this kind. Private rights are so large that no company could be permitted to make profit out of a concession made to the public. The whole benefit of the concession ought to be in the hands of the public, and it ought to be worked for their benefit. My hon. Friend the Member for Northumberland has stated that this is not an undertaking that would benefit the poor. I agree with him entirely. The postal and telegraphic systems do not only benefit the poor; they have been of most advantage to capitalists and people of large means. The same thing is exactly true as regards telephonic communication. It is taken advantage of more by the capitalists than the poorer classes of the community. Therefore, I agree that, in order to make it of some benefit to the general public, it should be taken over by the Post Office and the Government. Every day it is delayed it will be a source of inconvenience to the public. It is the Government alone who can obtain for the poorer classes the benefits which they ought to derive from it. I shall have much pleasure in supporting the Motion.

*(4.8.) THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): The Motion of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow should not, I think, be regretted, for it relates to a question which ought to be fully understood, and in the statement I had the honour to make a week ago I said that I desired to take the House fully into our confidence by explaining thoroughly the scheme which we have in view. I do not think anybody will imagine that the interest taken in the country in this matter is to be measured by the attendance at a Morning Sitting. The discussions in the Press during the last week show that it has far reaching interests, and the more the matter is discussed the more it will be seen that it will, if properly handled, contribute to the wealth and the convenience of the country. The discussion has already taken a considerably wider scope than is given in the terms of the Motion of the hon. Member for Glasgow. Therefore, Sir, I do not think the House will consider I am wrong in following the lines of those who preceded me. Sir, the course previously taken by the Post Office in successive Administrations in regard to this matter may or may not have been the best. It may fairly be considered that this great enterprise of the telephones might have been conveniently conducted along with the telegraph, of which it really forms part, or at any rate to which it is closely akin. But, Sir, that course was not taken, and we have to deal with the matter under existing circumstances, admittedly involving considerable inconvenience from the fact that on the one hand a considerable property has grown up in the hands of licencees of the Post Office, and on the other hand that the system has failed to produce so extensive a use of this most useful invention as was anticipated by the Government who gave licences, or as now obtains in other countries. It would be altogether incorrect and unjust to allege that the object of the Post Office is to stifle this invention. That never was the object of the Post Office—it certainly was not the object of my enlightened and lamented predecessor Mr. Fawcett. I am quite sure there was no man more disposed than he was to encourage invention and to embrace any reform that seemed likely to benefit the country. Now, Sir, the object that we have at heart is the development of the Telephone system, and it is very likely that in my desire not to prolong discussion last Tuesday, my explanations were insufficient. Undoubtedly in the comments that have been made upon the discussion of last Tuesday, several misapprehensions have been disclosed which I am very glad to have the opportunity of removing. It is not correct to say as the hon. Gentleman the Member for the College Division of Glasgow has said that the Post Office set up the telephones in a feeble way whilst they plundered at once the companies and the inventors. In fact, the inventors had in the first instance sold their interests to the companies, and the companies employed them for their own advantage. They did so by the institution of exchanges, which were found by a judicial decision to be against the law because they carried on a business which was part of the Crown monopoly.

DR. CAMERON: I did refer to that.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, the hon. Gentleman did refer to the clause proposed in the Bill of 1878. There was considerable difference of opinion as to that clause. The authors of it deemed it necessary in order to protect the interests of the public. Other lawyers held that those interests were sufficiently protected by the existing law, and a decision of the High Court showed that they were right. But those who introduced the clause, and those who thought it unnecessary, held that the telephones were within the functions of the State. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Glasgow says the Post Office capriciously refused certain applicants grants of licences whereas they were granted in other directions. Well, Sir, no doubt there have been different policies prevailing at different times, and applications were dealt with according to the policy prevailing at the time of their receipt. I am informed that in the case to which the hon. Member referred the application was refused; but if the applicant had applied later, when a more liberal system of licences had developed, he would undoubtedly have been granted a licence. It cannot be said that licences were too sparingly granted, because to 13 companies licences were granted authorising them to establish telephones all over the country; in fact the system was taken up with greater boldness than the railway system in the earlier days of that enterprise, when a great Minister thought it would be the best policy to make the great trunk railways under the control of the State. It is because these companies have amalgamated and because they make no competition worthy of the name, that the establishment of a different system has become necessary; and the Government have intervened to secure the development of the system of exchanges, and their connection with the trunk lines. An hon. Member has referred to an expression I used last week that it is not proposed to continue to grant licences in a wholesale way. Licences will not be granted to companies that are not in a position to carry out what they propose to undertake. We should not encourage competition if we granted licences to persons who could not carry out their undertakings, and who might sell their right and prevent competition being established. Nothing could be more contrary to the fact or more irrational to say that the decision of the Government to obtain control of the trunk lines will discourage competition. It is the very way to encourage competition. The hon. Member has referred to the Company promoted in Manchester by the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Blackfriars Division of Glasgow. That Company established an exchange in Manchester on liberal terms to subscribers. Well, Sir, I think that the decision of the Government to acquire the trunk lines will enable the Government to connect all such exchanges with local exchanges all over the country, so that subscribers in one part of the country may be put into communication with subscribers in every other part. That will be the means of healthy development. Whilst the Government propose that companies should be assisted by becoming connected with the Post Office to acquire a new development of their industry, we only propose to grant the concessions to companies that are ready to join in that system of free and unrestricted communication which it is the intention and the desire of the Government to bring about. The hon. Gentleman the Member for the College Division said the companies ascribed the high rates they charged to the excessive royalties they had to pay, and he argued from that that the possession by the Government of the trunk lines would either oblige still higher rates to be charged or involve the giving away of public money for the benefit of the companies. I cannot admit that the ten per cent. royalty has prevented the large development of the telephonic system. I understand the amount paid as royalties has never exceeded £46,000, whereas I am told the National Telephone Company is paying a dividend of six per cent. both on its debentures and its ordinary shares, on a capital of about £1,800,000.

MR. QUILTER: The dividend paid by the National Telephone Company was 4½ per cent. on the debentures and 6 per cent. on the share capital.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: My figures must have been wrong, but my point remains unaffected that it is not the royalties which have been a hindrance to telephonic development. Now, Sir, the hon. Member has referred to the great development of telephonic communication in Paris. That is, of course, a Government system, and it is exactly that system that we desire to follow in the scheme we have stated to the House—a system which imposes no restriction upon free communication with the Post Office. Having acquired the trunk lines and the mains the Post Office would be able to promote free communication and the commercial development of telephones. The hon. Gentleman opposite says that this appears to be only levying of blackmail.

DR. CAMERON: I never made use of that expression in relation to the acquisition of the trunk lines and mains.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman used the term in connection with the Post Office. The main reason why the Government desire to get the trunk lines into their hands is to see that whatever revenue arises from the telephones a portion shall go to the public. In the second place they desire to promote that development which has been frustrated in the way that has been mentioned. But there is a third way in which the possession of these trunk lines will be of value—it was the way which was alluded to by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Northampton. We are, at this moment, in possession of a telephone between London and Paris, which has attracted so much custom that we have been obliged to make a second circuit. The last report I had was that the number of conversations over that wire was about 120 per day—the charge is eight shillings for three minutes—so that I have no doubt when the Government are in possession of the main trunk lines, and have completed their system, there will similarly be constant conversation between all the large towns in the Kingdom. Persons will be enabled to converse between London and the large towns in the same way as they can do with Paris at the present moment. That will be perfectly independent of the local exchanges. Now, Sir, there is another thing. The Post Office at present possesses the right of laying down underground wires; and having the means, the Post Office will be quite ready to lay down wires and to let them out to the Telephone Companies within these areas for the connection of the exchanges and for the convenience of the public. It is only because we have greater facilities that we propose to undertake this work. Again, we have no desire to restrict unduly the operations of the companies, which we hope will conduce to the public service, and, therefore, we are willing to place a liberal interpretation upon the definition of exchange as far as the areas within which the companies may lay their main wires are concerned. The hon. Member for Canterbury has expressed a desire that the Government themselves should take over the telephones, and, following the example that had been set with respect to the telegraphs, make them national undertakings. I am afraid, however, that such a proposal will be very far-reaching. I do not suppose that in order to carry out the telephone system anything like the large capital that has been invested in the telegraph system would be required, but, at the same time, the House will hesitate before it authorises the Government to increase so largely the duties of the Post Office, or the number of people in its employment. I think it undesirable that there should be a direct employment by the State of a great number of employés, because it is not unknown that complaints have been made in the House with regard to public servants which would never have been heard of had those persons been servants of private companies, who are able to go into the labour market and obtain their servants at the rate of wages which is regulated by the law of supply and demand. Under such a system the employés obtain the best price for their labour, and the companies get the work done as cheaply as they possibly can. But a different element altogether is introduced when the State becomes the employer, and the amount of salaries to be paid for a given quantity of work is no longer fixed by the market price. In these circumstances, I submit that the Government have acted prudently in endeavouring to restrict the number of persons in their employment as long as the Public Service is efficiently provided for. It is admitted that as the telephone is developed a great many more persons must be employed in its Service, and the result would be that in a few years as many persons will be employed in the telephone service as are now employed in the telegraph service. In these circumstances, the Government have resolved not to acquire the business of the companies, but to permit them to continue to carry on the service under their licences. Another point presents itself. It is quite evident that there would be calls for an extension of the telephone in districts where it would not pay. It is much more difficult for the Government to resist such calls for extension than it would be for private companies to do so. Of course, if it were desired that the telegraph and telephone systems should be carried on by the Post Office, irrespective of the amount of profit revenue to be derived from them, that would be a different matter, and the public want could be easily provided for. The hon. Member for Canterbury says in certain of the Australian Colonies the Government have taken over the telephones and telegraphs and are working them with great liberality. So they have taken over the railways, which are almost entirely the property of the Government; and in these countries, as in India, the undeveloped state of the country rendered it necessary that the Government should undertake many matters which can be better managed in this country by private companies. But it is very difficult for the Government to work such undertakings at so cheap a rate as can be done by companies. I know that the Government in India has undertaken necessarily many enterprises which here are left to private agency; but my own recollection of the Australian Government is not favourable to the financial success of such undertakings. Only the other day we heard that the Government of Victoria were increasing the rate of postage and reducing the number of trains, because they were not remunerative. It is for these reasons that Her Majesty's Government have not thought it prudent to undertake this great additional service, and have decided to leave the working of it to private companies. Her Majesty's Government, in these circumstances, feel bound to oppose the Motion of the hon. Member. With regard to the profit of the revenue that is likely to be derived from supplying the public demand for a telephonic service, it is a remarkable thing that an extension of the service beyond a certain point involves a reduced profit. A Director of two American Telephone Companies has informed me that it sometimes takes two or three years of the amount of subscription to pay for a fresh installation, and it is not until the lapse of that period that any profit begins to be derived from the particular subscriber. Those things ought to operate as some excuse for the companies not having brought the cost of their service within what some would call reasonable bounds. We will, however, try to improve the system; and I make bold to say that, in a short time, telephone communication will proceed at a rate hitherto unknown. There are one or two points upon which there is some misapprehension which it is desirable should be removed, and if I oppose the Motion of the hon. Gentleman I think it right to show that the offer of the Government is not illusory, and that we have the same object as the hon. Gentleman has at heart. We propose that trunk communication shall be established as widely as possible between one part of the country and another. There is no reason why new companies should not be formed to create new exchanges. I have not the least doubt that in a very short time we shall hear of the establishment of new companies and new exchanges, although the existing companies could establish new exchanges with special advantages; and behind the companies, if they fail, is the power of the Government to erect exchanges of their own. We desire that telephone communication should be established as widely as possible between one part of the country and another. I have pointed out that there is no reason why new companies should not be formed to create new exchanges; I know of two or three which are only waiting for the settlement of this policy to start. New companies would commence with special advantages, for they would avoid the mistakes and imperfections of the earlier experiments. Undoubtedly, if people desire to have an exchange in their town, and cannot conveniently establish a company of their own or are not efficiently supplied by an existing company, the Post Office will come in, as in the case of Newcastle and Hull, and supply telephone exchanges, and perfect the system. The safeguard of the taxpayer will be our possession of the trunk wires and the fact that a proportion of any profits arising from the increased transactions of the companies will accrue to the Post Office and go to the direct benefit of the Revenue.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): Is there to be a metallic return?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Yes, in all cases under our control. I now desire to point out that no part of this policy requires the sanction of an Act of Parliament, it is all within our existing powers. The Bill is only to extend the facilities for the construction of telephones and telegraphs, I hope with due regard to the rights of Local Authorities and private individuals. I have been describing a new development of the policy to be pursued by the Post Office under the authority of Her Majesty's Government. Undoubtedly the House of Commons will have to be consulted as to the Vote for carrying out this policy as regards trunk and main lines, which will require a considerable expenditure of capital, and will increase the Post Office vote ad hoc, so that Parliament will then be asked to endorse the action which is proposed. We propose to relieve the companies of the burden which has hitherto rested on them in the heavy charge for way leaves, 20s. a mile, where the Post Office has a monopoly, and practically to give them permission to use the post offices as public call offices. I hope that the result of the competition will not be to diminish the profits of the companies, but that they will share in the extension of this scheme which is so much desired, and is calculated, as I believe, to place this country in as full possession of telephonic convenience as any country in the world.

Sir J. Fergusson

*(4.55.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars): We have heard a great deal in the way of complaint against the telephone service, mostly by those outside the House who are users, but some of the statistics given by the right hon. Gentleman will give a better idea of how inadequately London is supplied as compared with the third rate towns in America. He said that in one town there was a telephone to every 80 inhabitants; and in another one to every 120; in London the supply is one to every 750 inhabitants. That is to say, that London, the largest and richest city in the world, the greatest business city in the world, has only one telephone to 7, 8, 9 or 10 in the second and third rate cities of America. Some hon. Members have spoken as if this Motion meant that the Government were to buy up the Telephone Companies, but there is nothing to that effect in the Motion; it merely says that the telephone monopoly should be worked in direct connection with the Telegraphic Department of the Post Office. It was at one time the monopoly of the Post Office, but the Post Office granted licences to 13 companies, though only three or four of them are in use at the present time. These licences have yet 20 years to run, and meanwhile the Government have the option every seven years of buying the companies up, the next opportunity being in six years time. It has been said that at present telephones are a luxury of the rich; in London they are not a luxury of any kind, but a painful necessity at all times to those who have to use them. It seems to be suggested that the Government should take over the telephones because they would do the work better than the private companies but they have not done so in the places where it has been tried. In Leicester the number of Government telephone subscribers has remained stationary while those of the National Company have considerably increased. In Manchester the Mutual Telephone Company got a large number of subscribers in a very short time. I understand that the inter-town service which the Government intends to take over and work is profitable, and that in some districts it pays enormously. The hon. Member who is connected with the National Company said that the number of messages in one day between Liverpool and Manchester was 47,000, a number which appears extraordinary. I have been told that the lines between Glasgow, Edinburgh, Leith, and other large towns in Scotland pay good profits as do also the lines round Birmingham and in the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire. If the Post Office will take over and properly works these lines, they may do it with a very good return on capital expenditure. I am sorry that the right hon. Gentleman has not told us more as to what is to be in the Bill, which is not yet laid on the Table of the House, though the matter has been under consideration for 18 months, and I hope there will not be such delay in its production as will cause any risk of its not passing this Session. I fear I cannot vote for this Motion, because if it means that the Post Office is to start exchanges in opposition to the licensed companies that would be inequitable, the more so that they pay to the Post Office ten per cent. of their earnings. Of course, the Post Office can establish them where licensed companies do not exist. If it means that the Post Office is to buy up the companies and the price is to be settled by arbitration on the basis of the returns, I shall vote against the Post Office doing any such thing. If the Chancellor of the Exchequer were to bring in a Bill asking the House for the money to buy the telephone businesses of this country, and were severely examined as to what property he would get for the money, the House would refuse to give it. If the Motion proposes to purchase without saying on what terms, I am afraid I am unable to vote for the Motion of my hon. Friend.

(5.5.) THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): This matter so deeply concerns the finances of the country that, perhaps, the House will not object if I should say a few words on the subject, notwithstanding the speech of my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General. I think the Executive Government, if I may say so in no Party spirit, and the Civil Service, may congratulate themselves on the fact of the readiness with which the House seems disposed to entrust a vast new business to a Public Department. One would have thought during some of the Sessions that have elapsed that so many complaints have been made as regards the Post Office administration, that any proposal asking for power to extend the business of that Department would have been very severely criticised by the House. But I take it from the general expression of opinion, so far as one could gather it, that notwithstanding the complaints that may have been brought against that Department, the House still has considerable confidence in it, and is not afraid to intrust it with new and increasing duties. While accepting that confidence, I think it is a principle which should not be pushed too far, and I am not prepared to accept to an indefinite degree the growing disposition of the public to place new duties on the State. The Postmaster General is, I think, at present at the head of an army of 100,000 persons, and the relations which he has to establish and maintain between the heads of Departments and this mass of employés is of growing importance, and we must not look forward with any light heart to the number of Government servants increasing in such vast numbers as they do now from year to year. I know the hon. Member for Lanarkshire takes an entirely different view on that matter, and I, perhaps, differ from him just for the reasons which make him assent to the proposals. I do not think it wise in the interests of the country generally that the Government should be continually extending its functions. I wish the House to be extremely careful, and especially in such a case as this, before they ask the Government to put its hand to new work of these dimensions. I think I may fairly say that my late right hon. Friend, Mr. W. H. Smith, who had as much experience as any man of Public Departments and of private business, took the strongest view on this matter, and was entirely a party to the view which the Cabinet took on this matter, namely, that they would not undertake to buy up the whole of the telephone business of the country. We wish the House to know how far we are prepared to go in order to meet the case, and we are not prepared if it can be avoided—and I think it can be avoided—to take up the whole of the business of the Telephone Companies. The hon. Member who has just sat down (Mr. Provand) put two very pertinent questions to the hon. Member for Glasgow, who introduced this matter. He asked whether it was the intention of the hon. Member that we should buy up the whole of the Telephone Companies, or that the Government should compete freely without any compensation against the companies. On the point of buying up the companies, if the House were determined that that is the best way of proceeding, it would be found that an enormous expense would be incurred. With respect to the other matter, of course it would be impossible for the companies to compete, and it would be necessary to take some steps in the nature of money payments to the companies. I remember perfectly well what happened when the Telegraph Companies were bought up, and I shudder at the recollection of the enormous price which the Government had to pay under those circumstances when the private companies stood on their various rights. The public at that time were determined that the telegraphs should be taken over, and the cost was immensely greater than it would have been if the matter had been approached with greater caution. I do not wish the Government to be placed in a similar position with regard to these telephones, and we have, on the other hand, to submit to the House a plan which I think combines the simplicity of Government control with the expansion which we may expect from private enterprise. My right hon. Friend has explained how the trunk lines would be taken in hand by the Government, leaving to the localities the working of the local exchanges. If this is done I believe the public will be better served than if the Government took over the whole business, because there would be competition in the localities to serve the public as well as it could be served; and the attitude we should take up towards the Local Authorities will ensure that when we are assured that a town is badly served, competition should be introduced by another company, but where a town is sufficiently served there should not be all the inconvenience of multiplying wires, taking up the streets, and useless machinery which is inevitably attendant on the establishment of competing companies. It has been suggested during the course of this discussion that the Local Authorities might be willing to undertake the telephone business themselves. I see nothing contrary to the Government policy in such a proposal. If in any particular town the telephone system is not established, there is no reason why they should not undertake it, and communication be established with the rest of the country through the trunk lines which would be in the hands of the State. But though I have spoken strongly against the Government taking more into its hands than is necessary, I think the time has come when it is absolutely indispensable for the Government to have the trunk lines in its hands, because, unless the Government have these trunk lines, we cannot have the competition which is desired by the country. If the companies retain these trunk lines it would be impossible that there should be fair competition. Why has the National Company got a practical monopoly over the other companies? Because they have the trunk lines in their hands, and any telephonic circle which is established is only half useful unless it can be put into telephonic communication with the whole of the rest of the country. The consequence is that if any particular locality is not connected with the trunk lines it is only half-served, and does not get the full benefit of the telephone. And so, in one sense, the Government by taking the trunk lines into their own hands can secure free trade in the localities. On the other hand, we wish the Local Authorities to exercise supervision. I do not know whether the House is aware of the powers which the Government possess in this matter, but there are powers under which they can act, and which render it unnecessary that any fresh Bill should be introduced. In the licence granted by the Government are these words—

Several hon. MEMBERS: Yes; telegraphic communication.

*MR. GOSCHEN: That covers telephonic communication. I am not sorry for the interruption, because it gives me an opportunity of explaining here that telephones are practically telegraphs, and it has been held that the same powers which the Government possess with respect to telegraphs they can apply to telephones. But I will read again this extract from the licence:—

Therefore all the licensees have been warned that the Government has retained the power in their hands, and it will not be against either the spirit or the letter of the licence if we establish trunk lines; but I do think that it would be against the spirit of the licence if we were to take the local arrangements entirely into our hands during the continuance of that licence, to the detriment of those who on the faith of that licence have been extending their system up to the present moment. I hope the House will consider these fair terms, and I venture to hope that they will not pronounce against the Government, in the sense of asking that the Government should take over the whole of this undertaking. We have gone a long way in this direction, and we have confidence that we shall be able to work this system with great elasticity, though I am fearful as to the effect of the telephone on the telegraphic revenue. But we have come to the conclusion that financial considerations ought not to prevail against the extension of the telephonic system, in what is considered by the public to be a convenient and sufficient form. We do not wish the arrangements of the Treasury to interfere with the development of the telephonic system. This discussion has been a very useful one, and has shown the various points on which the public convenience ought to be considered, and I think the House will admit that the policy which the Government asks it to follow is sound and just.

*(5.20.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I think this is a time when the telephone system may be extended with great advantage, and I trust that this Resolution will be pressed to a Division. I cannot help thinking that the Government, even if their present plan is adopted, will find in the long run that they are compelled to go a step further, and the only effect of putting off that step is that they will have to pay very much more for the telephones, when they do purchase, than they would have to pay at present. I am not disposed to advocate any inequitable dealing with the Telephone Companies, but it is one thing to deal equitably, and another to deal on the basis of extreme rights. The Government will find at some time that they will be compelled to take the whole system, and I think the wiser course would be to face the matter at once. I cannot agree with the argument of the Postmaster General that an increase in business means a corresponding increase in expenditure, because the cost of extending machinery or plant is not so great as laying it down in the first instance. And we find in all works that while certain extensions lead to an increase for the moment of the cost of the product, increased business after a while largely reduces the cost.

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Member does not properly estimate what is meant by the extension. New subscribers mean new wires and new instruments, and these cost as much as the wires and instruments in the first instance.

*MR. ROBY: I cannot deal with the matter from my own personal knowledge, but I think the view I suggested is not without reason. But I want to suggest, further, that increased facilities for extension must be placed in the hands of those who are working the Post Office. At present the Government secure all they can out of the Post Office telegraphs, whereas the Exchequer ought to be content with a fixed sum in the way of profit, and to allow the excess to be used by the Postmaster General for the prosecution of experiments or extensions in order that all possible advantages and facilities should be given to the public. The Department should be worked to some extent for the benefit of the public as well as for profit. There should be more elasticity in the arrangements which exist between the Postmaster General and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. If the business is carried on by private companies, the profits go to the shareholders, and the public get little of the benefit, whereas if the Government had stepped in and bought the telephones, any profit that is made would be devoted to the reduction of taxes in some way, direct or indirect, and the public would be eased in that matter. Whether it would not be possible to work some part of the system by arrangement with the Local Authorities is a suggestion well worth considering; but as the telephones are competing with the telegraphs, I think it would be right to make a good mouthful of the business, and for the Government to take the whole matter into its own hands.

The House divided:—Ayes 205; Noes 147.—(Div. List, No. 57.)

Main Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

PAYMENT OF PUBLIC OFFICIALS.

(5.43.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I rise to call attention to the payment of officials in England, Scotland, and Ireland. Last year I called attention to the Estimates for Scotland. This year I shall confine myself to pointing out, in the Estimate dealing with Local Government and one or two other Estimates, where Scotland does not get a fair share of the Imperial grant. I may say, so far as Scotland is concerned, even in the Scotch Office here in London, the officials are paid according to the scale and rate existing in Scotland. Next door to the Scotch Office is the Home Secretary's Office; and the senior clerks in the Home Office are paid at the rate of from £700 to £800 a year. The senior clerks in the Scotch Office are paid at the rate of from £450 to £600 a year. There might be something in the argument of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and of the Treasury, that people in Scotland did not pay as much as they do here for either clothing or food; but here is an officer living in exactly the same town and same street, who, in the English Office is paid £800 a year, while in the Scotch Office he is paid £450 a year. I only want to point out that the argument used last year does not apply. I want to call the attention of the House to the Local Government Vote for the three Kingdoms. The total amount of the Vote for England is £162,049; for Ireland, £133,792; and for Scotland, £9,117. What I object to is that this is contrary to the decision arrived at when we agreed that one-half of the Probate and Licence Duties should be paid for the purpose of cutting off these local elements—in fact, taking them away altogether from Supply; and still we find, notwithstanding the fact that England is getting half the Probate and Licence Duties, we are here still paying in England £3,626 for the inspection of Poor Law schools, and we are still paying £48,964 for district auditors. All these sums ought not to be defrayed from the Imperial taxation at all. In England you have got a medical officer who gets £1,200 a year, with two assistants at £1,000 a year each, and nine Inspectors receiving from £500 to £800 a year. In Ireland there is a medical officer receiving £1,200 a year, and four Inspectors receiving from £500 to £700 a year. In Scotland you have only got one medical officer, for whom you pay £200 a year, and there are no assistants and no Inspectors. The result is, that there is no proper inspection, and the Public Health Act is not properly carried out and enforced in Scotland. In consequence of the parsimony of Parliament in this respect as regards Scotland there are hundreds of preventible deaths occurring in Scotland, and what ought to be done in Scotland is what has been done in the case of England and Ireland—namely, to provide a sufficient number of medical officers and Inspectors. There are cases in which costs defrayed by local rates in Scotland are here defrayed partly by local rates and partly by a subsidy from Parliament. The cost of registration in Scotland is entirely defrayed by the local rates, and it ought to be so defrayed in England. We bear the entire expense in Scotland. I think that in England and Ireland the entire expense should be defrayed by the local rates. We ought not to vote from the Imperial taxes a single penny towards it. I shall at the proper time move that this Vote be disallowed on the ground that it is not required. The subsidies in respect of England and Ireland ought to be discontinued. But there is a much more important question, and that is the subject of technical education. In England there is a Royal College of Science, and in Ireland there is a Royal College of Science, and these are subsidised, but not a single penny is given to Scotland for that purpose. Therefore, our Scotch lads who have to compete for situations in the open market are unfairly handicapped by the State paying this money for technical education in England and Ireland. I shall at the proper time move the reduction of the amount given to England and Ireland for that purpose. There is another matter to which I wish to refer. £15,000 was voted for England and Scotland three or four years ago; but the whole of that amount has been spent on England only, and any for Scotland curiously refused. As I pointed out on the last occasion, there is also a great disparity between the pay of the prison officials of the three countries. The chaplains particularly are very badly used. The salaries of the second-class officials in England begin at £400, and go up to £500. The salaries of the chaplains of that class in England begin at £350 and go up to £450; in Ireland they begin at £325 and go up to £400; whilst in Scotland the chaplains and surgeons begin at £200 and go up to £300. When I raised the question last year I was told by the then Secretary to the Treasury that the reason was that there were more prisoners in the English prisons than in the Scotch prisons; but when I looked at the Returns, I found that the very opposite was the case. Take a large one in Scotland—Barlini—there is an average attendance daily there of 740, while in Stafford there is an average of 588, and in Wakefield 591. Now, in Wakefield the chaplains and surgeons get £350 to £400; at Barlini, where there is a larger attendance, they get from £200 to £300. Therefore, they are underpaid in Barlini. I shall have again to call attention to these special Votes, and to move their reduction to the Scotch level. I think that in this, as in many other things, we are rather badly treated by the Imperial Parliament. I call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Gorst) to it, in order that he may be able to rectify our grievance, and see that a sum of money is voted to Scotland equal to that voted to England and Ireland.

(6.2.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, CHATHAM): I do not know whether hon. Members expect to have a detailed answer to the observations they have made. They have criticised the Estimates with the view of showing what is spent on England and what is spent on Scotland; but the question is, I think, whether, in the different parts of the Kingdom, a sufficient amount is spent to make the Service efficient; and if Scotland can do it efficiently for a less sum than England, so much more is it to the credit of Scotland. I do not think that the pay of the chaplains in Scotland alone should be considered, but whether the Services as a whole are adequately conducted and whether the necessities of Government are met. The hon. Member has selected several Scotch services on which the expenditure is less than on the same services in England and Ireland. It would be easy enough to pick out instances in Scotland where the expenditure is very much greater in proportion. For example, the administration of the Education Act in England costs £58,000, while in Scotland it costs £10,000. But Scotland is a country where the population is more diffused than in England, and therefore education is proportionately more expensive. It.

would be foolish, however, to complain of such expenditure as an injustice to England. Again, the inspection of factories, workshops, and mines in England costs £144,000, while in Scotland it costs £26,750, which is in the proportion of one to eleven, instead of, according to the population, two to fifteen. The question to be considered in each case is, whether the service is adequately performed, and not what is the relative cost. The total cost of the administration of prisons in Scotland is higher than it is in England, the proportion being two to seven, or twice as much as it should be if it were in proportion to the population of the two countries. With all respect to the hon. Member, I think that to compare the salaries in Scotland with those in England or in Ireland is not a very useful course to pursue, and that neither the House nor the Committee of Supply will derive any advantage from carrying on the discussion.

(6.8.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I wish to point out that the Post Office officials, as well as other officials in Scotland, are not paid so well as those who discharge similar duties in England. We wish to see equal salaries paid to them in both countries. In Scotland we are taxed equally with the people of England, and no allowance is made for the fact that Scotland is a poorer country than England—we are taxed up to our full population. Therefore, there is no reason why our officials should be paid less than those in England. The result was this: when you take out of the Imperial Estimates the Scotch grants and take off the English grants you have left on the Imperial Estimates a great many grants to England for which there is no corresponding grant to Scotland at all. There is on the Imperial Estimates for England £162,049, whilst opposite to that we have only £9,117 for Scotland. On the Imperial Estimates there are large sums for England for which Scotland gets no allowance whatever. For example, an item such as this: Inspection of Poor Law schools, several thousand pounds. In Scotland Poor Law schools are paid out of Scotland's share of the Probate Duty—the money allocated to Scotland as a separate nationality—and charges corresponding to that ought in England to be charged to the Local Government Account. Then, I notice some other charges, and amongst them engineering establishments of the Local Government Board Medical Department, Local Government Board Inspection of Alkali Works, &c. All these are properly chargeable against the English Local Government Account, and are not properly chargeable on the Imperial Estimates. There is another point—namely, technical schools. There are in Scotland no technical schools corresponding to those you have in England, and, consequently, there are no corresponding grants to the Scotch people. This endless confusion and endless discussion has arisen from the Chancellor of the Exchequer having divided an Imperial Account into what are now National Accounts. That is one of the defects that will confront the Government at every stage, and their difficulties will not be lessened by the result which these separate accounts show—namely, that England is dipping more deeply into the Imperial pocket than Scotland.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary to the Treasury has improved the feeling between the different sections of the Empire by the speech which he made a few minutes ago. I do not like to use the expression, but I really think he was adding insult to injury. During the speech of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Caithness I noticed that the right hon. Gentleman walked down the length of the floor to the Bar. I knew his object; he was in quest of facts, but found no person able to give him the information he desired. That being so, on taking up the Paper, he commenced to live, in a sense, on his wits. But we know in Scotland that people are proverbially insensible in a matter of this kind to the effects of the highest line of jocularitv. We want something that is practical, and the right hon. Gentleman, to my mind, did not afford us very much satisfaction of that description. He affected to say that the reason why the number of public servants in Scotland was so low, as compared with England, was that the work could be done there more economically. But, Sir, there is a certain justice to be observed. I admit that the public servants in Scotland are more economical to the Exchequer. What we complain of is that that is an oppression and an injustice, and we say that the persons who do the work in Scotland do it on starvation lines. Why should that be—why should starvation lines be the Scotch standard, and liberal lines the English standard? These are the grievances we complain of. The right hon. Gentleman thinks he satisfied us by placing the grievances in a way that was more favourable, but we are not so insensible to the way of putting things as the right hon. Gentleman is pleased to consider. We know the reason why there is this disparity of remuneration in one country as compared with the other is simply this: that England is a supremely powerful nationality in comparison with ourselves, and that they have unjustly used the power they possess. It is simply the weakness of our Scotch representation that prevents us from having a fair recognition in the distribution of public servants, and the remuneration necessary for the maintenance of those servants. The right hon. Gentleman will not put off the Scotch people with this explanation: that it is an honour to us that we can do the public work that is wanted in a more cheap, and I presume in a proportionately more perfunctory form. We know that is not true. Sir, sufferance is the badge of all our race. I say that with a non-Hebrew application. We do not want to maintain that badge, and the proposal of my hon. Friend the Member for Caithness is that, as far as possible, that badge of not only of sufferance, but of dishonour and disgrace, should be done away with. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, in casting his eagle eye over the Papers, fell upon one or two facts. What is the explanation of the fortuitous advantages he descried in looking over that Paper for the first time? It is simply this: that we have not been totally unsuccessful in pursuing our claims even against the English public. Sir, the voice of remonstrance and the claims of justice, although not perfectly responded to, are sometimes listened to in a diminished degree, and I think it was clinching the disadvantage he brought against us when he used the imperfect facts that came to his knowledge in attempting to corroborate his sophistical and fallacious—and I would use another word if I had it at my command—arguments in connection with a portion of the Empire that deserves very much more respect, not only in general but in financial aspects, than it is getting at the present time. The Scotch public understand perfectly well how the matter stands, and, taking it all over, it was well put by my hon. Friend and new ally the Member for St. Rollox (Mr. Caldwell). They perfectly well understand that the financial disparity is, on the whole, a true index of the political disparity and of the absence of the respect properly due to the Northern part of the Island. The right hon. Gentleman the Financial Secretary gave up the case as regards the frightful cost of administration in Ireland; but as regards the weaker part of the Empire (weaker, I mean, in point of representation), with regard to the Scotch portion of the Empire, it is simply sat upon and neglected, because it has not the amount of representative power that the other portions of the Empire enjoy. It does not occur to me to press the matter any further. I desire, with my colleagues, simply to emphasise the feeling that we are not fairly treated; that we are treated with a contempt that ought not to be extended by the more powerful to the less powerful part of the Empire; and I trust that the small success that we have achieved in connection with certain parts of our administration in regard to their financial value will, by the persevering pressure of the Representatives of Scotland, extend so that bye-and-bye the right hon. Gentleman will not have it in his power to attempt to evade an honest and proper and statesmanlike explanation of the clear facts which he contradicted by resiling from practical truths and falling back, I will not say on flippancies, but on cleverness and on an adroit manipulation of arguments which he knows how to use, but which will not deceive those to whom they are addressed.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I think we have a right to complain that when a notice of this kind comes forward for discussion no Representative of the Treasury Bench acquainted with the facts is here to deal with it. That is all the more to be regretted, because the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury, although he possesses great natural acuteness, exhibited to this House this afternoon a total and complete ignorance of the facts of the situation. It was only a gentleman completely ignorant of the state of the facts in Scotland as well as in England, who would, for one moment, have compared the office of Secretary for Scotland with the Home Office. Sir, the Office of the Secretary for Scotland is not only the Home Office, but a Local Government Office, and an Education Office and a Home Office all rolled into one. If the right hon. Gentleman had known that elementary fact he would not have made the comparison in which he indulged. Nor do I think the right hon. Gentleman was fortunate in his defence of the low salaries of the present officials in Scotland. The right hon. Gentleman said, "Do not look to the money, but look to the efficiency." If he is aware of the fact that you could go into the market and obtain as efficient a doctor for £200 as the gentleman to whom you are now paying £400 there would be some force in his observations; but the right hon. Gentleman knows perfectly well that that is not the case, and that the result of the extremely low salaries paid in Scotland is this: that you get a less efficient class of public servants, and must do so. You cannot get any properly educated or qualified medical man to serve in a prison in Scotland at £200 a year. No Scotch doctor, unless at the very bottom of his class, would take such a position at such remuneration. Sir, what we complain of is the inevitable inefficiency that results from the employment of inferior workmen. You have only to look to Irish salaries. I am quite prepared to admit that in Scotland you will get men of equal efficiency at somewhat smaller salaries to do the same work that is performed in England. England is a richer country than Scotland, but Scotland is twice richer than Ireland; therefore, the salaries in Ireland, if the contention of the right hon. Gentleman is to have force, should be lower than they are in Scotland. But in point of fact they are on a much higher scale, and that is a complete answer to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman. If Scotland is to get the benefit of these economies one might appreciate them, but the monies go into the Imperial Exchequer. I do not desire to say anything in favour of exorbitant salaries, and for this reason—that I look forward to the time when Scotland will manage her own affairs and get the advantage of her own economies. Instead of paying per head of the population in Customs and Excise an equal amount to that paid in England, Scotland paid last year more than a million in excess of her proper share. Therefore, Sir, Scotland's contribution to the Imperial Exchequer is far in excess of the fair proportion which she ought to pay, having regard to her population and her wealth; and yet, on the other hand, we have all the Departments of State in Scotland treated in a mean and scurvy and unhandsome fashion, the salaries being insufficient to attract a proper class of men.

GRANTS TO FISHERY HARBOURS.

(6.30.) MR. LLOYD - GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.): I have a notice of Motion on the Paper relating to the distribution of grants in aid of fishery harbours in the United Kingdom. I do not wish to detain the House at length, but I should like to point out the result of these grants so far as Wales is concerned. I find in Class II. a considerable grant in aid of the development of fisheries in Scotland, and another grant not so large in aid of the fisheries in Ireland, but I see no grant in aid of fishery piers and harbours in England and Wales. Last year the Government spent £15,000 on the building of piers and harbours in the North of Scotland, and £11,000 on a pier at Thurso for the development of fisheries there.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I beg to say that was money lent for which the Thurso people pay interest; it was not a grant at all.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: It was money lent by the Government, not by private individuals, and that is the point of my case. We should be glad of a grant for Wales on the same principle, not getting it absolutely without return; we are prepared to accept it on the same terms as it was made to Caithness. There are Fishery Boards exercising authority in Cardigan Bay and elsewhere on the Welsh coast; but the great complaint is that although these Boards are able to prevent illegal fishing and dredging within a certain distance of the shore they are unable to do anything for the permanent improvement of the fishing industry. There is not a single harbour in Cardigan Bay for the protection of fishing boats, and the same may be said of other parts of both the North and South coasts of Wales. I am not competent to speak of England, but last year I did hear an English Member call attention to a similar deficiency in regard to some parts of the English coast; but into that part of the question I am not competent to enter. Resolutions have been passed by fishing communities in favour of petitioning the Government to consider this question, and last year I called the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to the subject. I do not recollect the words of his answer, but so far as my memory helps me, I think he did promise to look into the matter, and I would again earnestly press it upon his attention. We do not desire that the harbours should be made absolutely and entirely out of Imperial funds but that a certain amount should be granted in aid of local subscriptions, or that the Treasury should grant loans on such terms as may enable Local Authorities to undertake the work. Along the coast with which I am most acquainted there are no harbours, so that boats coming from the Isle of Man have, at the least sign of bad weather to return though they may be within a couple of miles of the Welsh coast. The Welsh fishing industry is thus severely handicapped, while, at the same time, large sums are devoted to the development of the fishing in Scotland and Ireland. May

I press the right hon. Gentleman to give us some promise in this respect?

(6.35.) MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give this subject his favourable consideration. I have on two previous occasions asked him whether he could see his way to help the Fishing Authorities on the West coast of Wales to secure experts' opinion as to where and how it would be best to construct harbours. As the right hon. Gentleman is well aware there are only small towns on the seaboard of the Western District each anxious to advocate its own claim to a harbour, but so long as we have not expert opinion to decide where a harbour would be best placed, and how it would best be constructed, the work of securing a harbour at all is at a standstill. Without harbour accommodation the fishing industry cannot develop, and I hope we may have some promise of substantial assistance beyond the statement of the fact that the Loans Commissioners can make advances for the purpose. The small towns I mention cannot act together. I know the interest the right hon. Gentleman takes in the development of the fishing industry, and I hope he will promise that an expert's opinion shall be provided as to how and where it is best to provide the most needed protection for the fishing vessels on the Welsh coast.

*(6.38.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I can hardly understand how this question arises on the Civil Service Estimates, in which no sum is included for any work of the kind.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: Yes; in Class 2 Vote 28 Grant in Aid for Scotch Fisheries.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: Well, I do not wish to dwell upon that. I gather that the request is that certain sums should be granted or loans made by the Commissioners towards the construction of fishing harbours, but neither of the hon. Members has expressed any opinion as to the place where such grants should be expended. I may observe that on the West coast of Wales there are two good harbours at Milford Haven and at Holyhead, and for fishing vessels excellent shelter is afforded by Bardsey Island. I do not say that some additional harbour accommodation may not be necessary, but it is absolutely impossible for me in the absence of any definite request to make any definite promise. If there is any general opinion in Wales that something should be done towards assisting the construction of a harbour at any particular place, surely it is for those concerned to formulate that opinion and lay it before the proper authority, and if such should come before me it will certainly be carefully considered; but I am bound by the terms of the Treasury Minute of May 4th, 1887, which practically precludes grants, and confines my duty to the consideration of applications for approval to loans upon proper security. If hon. Members desire to obtain grants they should endeavour to induce the Secretary to the Treasury to adopt the view that Wales should be put upon the same footing with Scotland and Ireland, and that it would be beneficial to the fishing industry of Wales that grants should be made. But it is not in my power, all I can do is to consider any definite proposal for a loan coming before me. The hon. Member has referred to the Sea Fisheries Committees, and surely they might take expert opinions and if they think necessary formulate some scheme.

BRITISH MUSEUM CLOSING TIME.

*(6.41.) COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton): I take the opportunity to direct attention to the hours at which the public are excluded from the British Museum. Yesterday I addressed a question to the Secretary to the Treasury whether the hours for closing the British Museum could not be made the same as those for the Natural History Museum, and the reply was that it could not be done without additional expense, and that this additional expense prevented the change being made. Four or five years ago I asked a similar question, and obtained a similar reply in regard to the Natural History Museum at South Kensington; but after one or two letters had passed between the Treasury and the authorities at South

Kensington, the additional time was granted and there was no additional expense for the extra time in February and March. All I ask is that the same time should be extended to the Museum in Bloomsbury. No doubt I shall have the same reply in regard to expense, but that ought, I think, to be infinitesimal for the extra half-hour. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will use his influence with the Trustees to get this extension for the public. I have been at the Museum in February and seen the people turned out into the streets by the police at four o'clock while an hour and a half of daylight remained, and I could not but think it hard that the people should not be permitted to enjoy their own Museum for a short time longer.

(6.45.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): My right hon. Friend cannot speak again, but he desires me to say that the Trustees of the British Museum have been consulted, and they see considerable difficulty in making the extension which would involve considerable extra expense. As a matter of fact the Museum is open longer than the other institution with which the hon. Member has compared it unfavourably. The matter, however, shall receive attention, and the Trustees shall again be referred to.

POST LETTER-CARDS.

(6.45.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough.) There are one or two questions I desire to raise in reference to Post Office administration, and one of these has reference to Ocean Penny Postage, but I do not know that it is of any use arguing it in the absence of the Postmaster General. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will consent to adjourn the Debate until we can have the advantage of the presence of the Postmaster General? Of course, if he does not agree to that I must proceed now. The first matter I have to mention has reference to what are called post letter-cards. I have no desire to prevent getting into Committee, or to stand in the way of Business, but I know from experience that we cannot rely upon finding an opportunity later in the Session when the Post Office Vote is taken somewhere about the middle of July. On a former occasion I objected to the price charged to the public for these letter-cards, namely ten for a shilling. I think they might be sold for a penny; and I find that in foreign countries they are sold at a much cheaper rate. Here is a sample of the cards sold in Austria at the rate of 20 for a shilling. Why cannot we sell the cards in this country at as cheap a rate? I am bound to say the policy of the Government in this country is to regard the Post Office business as a means for obtaining revenue rather than as an institution for the service of the public.

(6.49) MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Main Question be now put."

MR. SPEAKER: I must leave the responsibility with the hon. Member. I understood him to say he had no desire to prevent a decision being taken on the Motion?

MR. MORTON: I desire to finish my remarks.

Question put, "That the Main Question be now put."

Main Question put accordingly, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

(7.3) The House divided:—Ayes, 188; Noes, 97.—(Div. List, No. 59.)

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

It being after Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House at Nine of the clock.

Committee report Progress; to sit again To-morrow.

(9.0.) MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): The Motion which stands in my name is one of very considerable importance to a large section of the Irish people. It closely concerns all the tenant farmers of Ireland who have not succeeded in acquiring the ownership of their holdings under the Ashbourne Act or the Land Purchase Act of last year. It is because of the importance of the Motion—because it is I believe, bound up with the future prosperity of Ireland—that I desire to elicit from Members representing different parts of Ireland opinions in regard to the compulsory purchase of land. I do not intend, and I hope I shall avoid, the introduction of Party differences. I know this is a question which is more and more agitating the public mind; it is thrusting itself to the front; and I trust it will receive favourable consideration in the House, having in view the fact that again and again Parliament has affirmed the principle of land purchase. So far back as 1870 we had what are called the "Bright Clauses." Those clauses in the Act of 1870 failed owing to the fact that the whole of the purchase money was not advanced. Only three-quarters of the purchase money, I believe, was allowed to be borrowed from the State; and the tenant farmers of Ireland at that time, and unfortunately since, have been unable to find the 25 per cent. of the whole purchase money. The "Bright Clauses" of the Act of 1870 failed from this cause, and the Ashbourne Act is more liberal in its character. That Act allows to the tenant purchaser the advance of the whole of the purchase money by the State, with no security—or practically no security—to the State for the advance. No doubt 20 per cent. is retained by the State for five years; but, after the expiration of that period, the only security the taxpayers of England will have for their ten millions of money will be the security of the land itself. I believe that under any scheme of land purchase, no matter how you may hedge it round by artificial safeguards securities, and guarantees, the only real security is the land itself. The British taxpayer has already advanced, or has consented to advance, 43 millions of money for the purchase of Irish land. Ten millions of that have been expended under the Ashbourne Act, and we are told that, the 33 millions sanctioned by the House in the Bill of last year will be expended. I very much doubt that, because of the nonsensical guarantees and the vexatious arrangements by which the advances are hedged round. I admit that great good has accrued to the tenant farmers of Ireland under the Ashbourne Act, or to that limited section who have been able to avail themselves of it. The number of tenant purchasers are limited by the amount of ten millions under that Act, but I would have the benefits of land purchase extended to the tenants of Ireland as a whole. I do not wish to see those benefits restricted to a minority, who are in no way more entitled to the benefits of the Act than the majority who are excluded. While I admit the good that land purchase has done, I must allow that, on the other hand, it has created many gross anomalies in every county in Ireland. This may seem a sweeping statement to make to hon. Members who do not know the social condition in Ireland as we do, but let me point out that some of the largest land proprietors in the country—such as the Duke of Abercorn, the Marquess of Londonderry, and the Duke of Leinster, and others—have, under the Ashbourne Act, sold land to the amount of £200,000 or £250,000; and these noblemen, in selling their land, sold just as much as would relieve them from their mortgages and other encumbrances—and sold the least valuable parts of their estates no doubt—and were governed in the sales by the geographical position of the land. They would naturally sell the outlying portions of the land rather than that contiguous to the residence. But how in fairness can such a distinction be made from the tenant's point of view? Why should the man because he lives on the outlying portion of an estate receive a benefit of from 25 to 30 per cent. reduction in his annual payments, and his neighbour living on the better land receive no such benefit? Such a distinction cannot stand the test of time or the next serious wave of agricultural depression. Think what a gross anomaly is created by one man living on one side of a road paying his full judicial rent without the slightest probability of his ever acquiring any other property in the soil, while on the other side of the road is a man, who has purchased under the Ashbourne Act, who gets his 25 or 30 per cent. reduction in his annual payments, and at the end of 49 years becomes absolute owner of his holding. No sensible man can maintain that such a state of things can continue. It may continue so long as the tenant farmer is able to pay his rent; but when he finds himself unable to meet his judicial rent, then the anomaly comes home to him, and you will have further agitation, which I think will be generally admitted is not desirable in Ireland. I want to see the Irish land question settled, but I see no finality except in compulsory purchase. I do not believe it is possible to continue a system of dual ownership. When Parliament was passing the ameliorative measures for Irish tenants it was not intended that the benefit should fall only on the few; it was never intended that land purchase should be for some of the tenants of the Duke of Abercorn or Lord Londonderry, or the Duke of Leinster, more than for the tenants of the small proprietor who lives on his estate. It may be hard to compel a proprietor who lives at home and looks after his estate to sell his land; but what I want to do is to put all tenant-farmers in Ireland upon a level, that, so far as their rent-paying capacity may go, they may have an incentive, an encouragement, in the knowledge that, at the end of a certain term of years, they will become owners of their holdings. Again and again since 1870 we have been told that there is no way more effectual to create in the Irish farming class loyalty to the English connection than to make them owners of their farms. But how can you ever accomplish this except by powers of compulsory purchase? The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has said, with regard to Lord Clanricarde and landlords of that class, that they ought to be compulsorily expropriated. I think the hon. Member said that a landlord like Lord Clanricarde was a standing menace to the peace of Galway. But how can you expropriate such a landlord without some form of compulsory purchase? I certainly do not see how you can, and it is because I desire to see the expropriation of landlords of this class that I desire to see some form of compulsory purchase adopted. I believe this advantage of 20 or 30 per cent. is a mere lottery as to who shall get it; and while the few successful men are well pleased, the many disappointed feel a deeper grievance as times of agricultural depression come round, and so the effect of your Land Purchase Act will be to encourage disaffection, not loyalty, and to make men more anxious for separation if there are those who desire separation. It certainly is not a condition of things calculated to promote the maintenance of the Union. I am not wedded to any particular form of compulsory purchase; all I desire is an expression of opinion from Irish Members—more especially and particularly from those representing Ulster constituencies. I think Ulster Members will admit this is a burning question among their constituents. In other parts of Ireland we have succeeded in getting considerable reductions of our judicial rents; but our brother farmers in the North, perhaps because of their loyalty, have not been equally successful. The benefit is, perhaps, measured by the amount of agitation. But we want no distinction between farmers in the North and South, and I am quite ready to advocate the interests of the Ulster farmers apart from all political opinions. My Resolution goes in the direction of Amendments supported last year in the discussions upon the Land Purchase Bill by Members from Ulster. I think an Amendment of this kind was proposed at the instance of considerable bodies of farmers in the North of Ireland. I remember seeing in the Lobby of the House a deputation of associations in Counties Down and Antrim, by whom this Amendment was supported. If I remember rightly, one proposal was that where two-thirds of the tenants on an estate paying three-fourths of the rental desired to purchase then the Land Commission should be entitled to buy the whole estate at a fair price, and sell to the tenant purchasers, thus relieving the landlord from the trouble and expense of having a portion of his estate separated from the rest, and left on his hands. I do not desire to commit any hon. Member to this or any other Amendment. I simply ask the House to affirm the principle of compulsory purchase in the direction of these Amendments. My Motion declares that compulsory sale is just and expedient; the justice is found in the fact that the present condition of affairs creates glaring anomalies and gross injustice. It is a gross injustice that upon one side of a roadway a farmer should have to pay 30 per cent. more annually than his neighbour opposite. Compulsory purchase is expedient on many grounds. It is expedient to remove an inequality among tenants which is sure to breed discontent, more especially in large portions of Ulster, but in all the provinces of Ireland. It is expedient also to create the largest possible number of landowners in Ireland; and this ought to have especial weight with hon. Gentlemen on the other side, for ownership is supposed to check all radical and revolutionary ideas, and so I trust that hon. Members opposite will pledge themselves to support a comprehensive scheme of land purchase which will turn all Irish tenant farmers into strong Conservatives.

*(9.24.) MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): In rising to second the Motion of my hon. Friend, I feel bound to comment on the strange fact that for six years past—perhaps excepting Home Rule—compulsory sale of land has been the question most actively discussed in Ulster. It is a question upon which, strange to say—though there are differences upon other matters—there is practical unanimity among all tenants North and South. It is a question upon which differences of sect have not been able to create any differences of opinion. Nevertheless, this is the first occasion upon which the House of Commons has been called upon to discuss this question of so much importance to the people of Ireland. The reason for this fact is, I believe, that until the Land Purchase Act was passed last year, we felt that in bringing this question before the House of Commons we should be fighting “as one that beateth the air”—we should have no practical grounds to go upon, for it is obvious it is not within the powers of private Members, even on a private Members' night, to propose the grant of an enormous sum of public money. But by the Act of last year Parliament has made that enormous grant, and we have now a clear case to put before the House of Commons asking the House to decide, in principle, of course—not in detail—on a Resolution that the power of compulsory purchase is necessary in order to apply this large sum of money to the full benefit of Ireland. I notice, with some surprise, that the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) has put down an Amendment to the effect that—

“Whilst anxious for the fullest development of Land Purchase in Ireland, this House cannot profitably consider or assent to any proposal for the application of a general system of compulsory sale which is not accompanied by adequate financial plans for the carrying out of the principle involved.”

If I understand this Amendment rightly, the opinion of the hon. Member is that the House should not discuss a measure of compulsory sale unless it is proposed by a Minister of the Crown, who has the power of proposing that a large charge shall be made on the Revenues of the United Kingdom. In fact, it seems to be the object of the hon. Member for South Tyrone to put off the discussion until Doomsday. I can quite understand this. A discussion on this question is very awkward for the hon. Member. There are many of his constituents who, though they are in other questions keen supporters of the hon. Members, yet in this agree with us. I cannot, however, understand how the House can accept this Amendment, seeing how the House was occupied for the greater part of last Session. To read the Amendment, it might be supposed that the hon. Member for South Tyrone had forgotten the long-drawn discussions on the Purchase of Land and Congested Districts Ireland Bill. Several months the House spent in discussing the Bill, and I think with some adequacy. The majority of Members of this House were heartily tired of the Bill, and sick of the sound of “cash” and “contingent guarantees.” Nevertheless, at this distance of time the hon. Member for South Tyrone seems to have forgotten it all, though he was most diligent in attendance—the watch-dog of landlordism—while his landlord friends lounged in the smoking room or caroused at the Carlton. An enormous sum has been ticketed off for land purchase, and we contend that this should be properly applied. I agree with my hon. Friend beside me in thinking that though the sums already voted by Parliament are not enough to pay for holdings in Ireland, they are sufficient to go a long way towards the settlement of the Irish Land Question if properly applied. The amount which was voted by the Act last Session was not fixed. We cannot exactly say how much was the actual Vote for the purpose of land purchase. Certain Estimates multiplied by 25 will give us the amount. These Estimates are Estimates which increase year by year; they had increased largely since the first calculation was made by the Government; and they will be increased still further by the Education Bill of the present Chief Secretary, which is now before the House of Commons, which will devote a further sum of over £200,000 a year to National Schools in Ireland. The effect indirectly of that measure will be to increase the fund for land purchase by £5,000,000 sterling. Therefore, we find the sum voted is a good deal more than £30,000,000, the popularly supposed amount. We find, according to the last Estimates, with the addition of the £200,000, that the amount which has been voted for land purchase is no less than £38,750,000. We have in addition to that £10,000,000 which has already been spent for the purpose of land purchase. Therefore, we have a sum of nearly £50,000,000 which has been devoted by Tory Governments for the purpose of land purchase in Ireland. That sum is almost exactly the same as that which the Government of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, in 1886, supposed would be sufficient to settle the more pressing difficulties of the Irish Land Question. And if at that time, six years ago, the Government representing the British nation considered that £50,000,000 would be sufficient for the compulsory sale of land in Ireland by enabling the landlord to compel the tenant to buy, I venture to think that £50,000,000 is enough, at any rate, to enable us to apply the beginnings of compulsory sale the other way round. That sum of £50,000,000 is not, I venture to think, an inadequate financial Vote. We take no credit for the sum, except so far as it is due to the agitation which compelled the Government to give the money. The money is voted, and when we come before the House of Commons and ask that, under the Land Purchase Act, the money already voted should be applied in this way, we think we are not going into the region of castles in the air, but that we are bringing before the House of Commons proposals for the utilisation of sums they have already set aside for this purpose by Acts of the Imperial Parliament. Of course it would be easy to make a calculation which would show that a still larger sum might be necessary. I have great doubts of these calculations, which are based merely on Agricultural Returns, so-called, presented to the House of Commons. We have one case of real experience to guide us—i.e., the number of holdings which have been taken into Court under the Fair Rent Clauses of the Act of 1881. Yet very little more than half the reputed number of holdings in Ireland have had a fair rent fixed under the Act, and that after a period of ten years. We find further, when we go into details, that we have to make many exceptions from the total number of holdings before we arrive at the number to be purchased. In the first place, large holdings are already excluded from the Land Purchase Act. Speaking for myself, under a measure of compulsory purchase I would be prepared to see something further done in the way of excluding the large holdings. And even if this money already voted may be taken to be the last sums that are likely to be voted on Imperial security for the purpose of land purchase, yet I say the resources of Ireland and the resources of any administrators or legislators for Ireland will not be exhausted. It is the fashion to laugh and scoff at the notion of Irish security. I say it would be possible on Irish security to give stock bearing not very much higher interest than the 2½ per cent. borne by the stock issued under the Land Purchase Act of last year, and which would, nevertheless, rank higher in the financial market. We have an instance in the case of the Corporation of Dublin. A little while after the Chancellor of the Exchequer converted Consols, the Member for West Belfast, then Lord Mayor of Dublin, converted the loans of the Corporation of Dublin with a loan at 3¼ per cent.; and while the loan of the Chancellor of the Exchequer stands to-day at a discount of five, the loan of the Corporation of Dublin stands to-day at a premium of five over and above the price at which it was actually put on the market. I hope the House will not be put aside from the discussion of the just claims of the tenants of Ireland by any well-woven web of financial speculation drawn out by the hon. Member for South Tyrone. We do not ask the House in this Motion to pledge itself to any single farthing of further grant for land purchase beyond what has already been made; we merely ask them to assert the principle that those monies, having been voted for the purpose of land purchase, should really be applied to land purchase in Ireland. What has been the effect of this Act? You have put before the eyes of the Irish tenant farmers the great prize of nearly £40,000,000, but you have so hedged it round with safeguards and securities that the Irish tenant farmer, for the life of him, cannot get near it. A man who may have found it hard enough to get on at his present rent finds this great grant of money removes him no further from starvation and debt, so that the effect of the great act of justice and mercy of the British Parliament is to add the tortures of Tantalus to the pains of starvation. You have simply put this great boon out of the reach of the Irish tenant farmer. The Amendment of my hon. Friend would bring it into reach. I ask the House on every ground to decide that it is expedient that this great sum should be used for this purpose. We have many arguments which we could use in favour of a measure of compulsion. In asking the House to apply compulsion in this way we move on the lines of well-considered English and Irish precedents, and we ask for an extension of a principle already recognised. There is compulsion in the English Allotment Acts and in the Irish Labourers' Acts. There was compulsion in the Redemption of Rent Act of last Session. The tenants who got the benefit of that Bill were those who had taken land at a full agricultural rent for ever, who had feued their land. Those tenants usually had large holdings; they had their land for ever at a fixed rent, a rack-rent, no doubt, but that was a thing they could not foresee at the time they took the land: in fact they merely made a bad bargain. I ask whether, if compulsory sale is permitted in that case, without providing means for every tenant in Ireland to buy his holding, it is not within the province of this House to assent to the principle of compulsory sale in the case of other tenants numerous enough to take the whole of the money already voted? As to the Small Holdings Bill, we find among Liberal Unionists and some Tories, as well as Liberals, a general expression of opinion that the great fault of the measure introduced by the Minister for Agriculture is that it contains no provisions for compulsory sale. I find from the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, of the hon. Member for Bordesley, and of some Conservatives, there was unanimity on the point that for England compulsion was necessary. And under what condition? Under the condition that the English County Councils might be allowed to break up the boundaries of existing holdings, and take the land in patches of fifty acres wherever they liked over the whole of the area of a county, and to take these holdings for the purpose of selling them out to tenants whom they were afterwards to find, and who had never been tenants before. If the County Council in England, having a number of landlords to choose from, would be unable to get land conveniently at a fair price, how much more impossible will it be for a poor Irish tenant, who can buy one plot of land, and one only, to make terms with the one landlord, and the one landlord only, who is in a position to sell to him? I cannot understand why this Vote should not be supported by the almost unanimous voice of Liberals and even some Conservatives. There is a precedent in Ireland which comes even nearer the point. We have a system of dual ownership by landlord and tenant. But you have already given the landlord the power of compulsorily expropriating the other dual owner, the tenant, at a price fixed by the Court. The Land Act of 1881 contains provisions for the compulsory sale of the tenant's interest in the land to the landlord on certain conditions. I ask why, if ten years ago you gave one dual owner the right to expropriate the other, you should now refuse to the tenants of Ireland the right to expropriate the landlords at a fair price? There is another point of strong reality. It is impossible in many cases under the present system to arrange, by any voluntary arrangement, to sell holdings at a fair price in Ireland. If it was thought necessary to have compulsory sale before, it is much more necessary now. This argument has occurred to many people, but no one has put it so well as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, who, speaking on the Land Purchase Bill in 1890, dwelt at considerable length upon the fallacy of supposing that a fair settlement could be arrived at by what was called voluntary arrangement. He said—

“As long as you allow these contracts under the name of voluntary engagements, the landlord can screw out of the tenant whatever terms he likes. I do not mean that every landlord will do this, but there are many who would. I am showing what we ought not to permit. We are placing in the hands of the landlord an instrument enabling him to enrich himself, and to obtain an excessive and exorbitant price for his land, in direct contravention of the intentions of Parliament. That is what Ulster is well aware of. Ulster is not deceived. Ulster sees into it. The tenants there are somewhat stronger than they are upon the average in Ireland; their position is a stronger position; but what is the language they hold? The language they hold is that if you want to have a useful Bill it must be not voluntary, but compulsory. The tenants must have the right to require that the purchase should take place. That is a very different demand, and it involves a very serious question. I am not going to give an opinion upon that subject now. I am pointing out by an argument, which I think irrefragable, that the tenants, for the sake of whom we are going to pledge British credit, will be at the mercy of the landlord. After having made this enormous and unprecedented effort and placed ourselves in a position of the greatest disadvantage, it is the landlord who will be master of the position."

May we not use the same argument now that practically the same Land Purchase Bill has passed into law, and ask that the tenant should be taken out of the unfair position in which he is placed and be given the right to compel the landlord to sell at a fair price. The tenants on an estate in my own constituency were going to be evicted, but, though their holdings have not, and never had, any economic value, out of love for their holdings they signed agreements to purchase them and the landlord's interest at a price which is unfair both to themselves and to the British taxpayer, who is the guarantor. That is what is happening day by day. My hon. Friend has also very clearly shown the disadvantage to the tenants where some have been able to buy their holdings while others have not. There were some in that position on the estate of Sir R. Wallace, the Court having refused to sanction the terms in some cases. This is a real grievance to those tenants who have to compete for their living by the sale of their produce, when the difference in their annual payments means everything. There are also tenants on encumbered estates who cannot possibly arrange terms for the purchase of their holdings. The hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell) supports the principle of compulsory sale in such cases. That would affect probably half the tenants in Ireland. A Return, issued about two years ago, shows that there were 2,250 estates under the control of the Landed Estates Court; of these more than half had been in the Court five years looking for purchasers who never came, and several had been in the Court since 1877. At one time the Court was considered the most expeditious way of realising property; now it is the last refuge of spendthrift landlords who want to avoid being sold up. Tenants on these estates cannot buy their holdings, and surely there is no reason in justice or political economy for keeping these landlords in possession of estates they cannot improve, instead of letting them realise the capital value, if any, of the property, and earn an honest living in other countries. If the hon. Member for South Tyrone wants to deal practically with this question, instead of his Amendment he would have put down a rider to the Motion to the effect that the principle should first be applied to the encumbered estates, and that would have been accepted by my hon. Friend, and would have got rid of most of the plague spots which still disfigure the face of Ireland. Again, the present system gives a premium to disorder, and the peaceful tenant who regularly pays his rent cannot get as good terms as the man who does not pay his rent or pays at irregular intervals. I should have thought that the principle of sanctity of contract, which is written deep down in the Anglo-Saxon mind somewhere, would have made the Anglo-Saxon mind revolt against a system which rewarded lawlessness and punished the law-abiding citizen. The tenants of Ulster have seen this point very plainly, and, indeed, the position of the tenant in Ulster is a difficult one, for he sees the tenant who pays his rent irregularly able to get good terms from his landlord while he cannot do so. Is that the last reward that is being given to the tenantry of Ulster for their allegiance to the British law and constitution? If hon. Members do not take care, there will be none left to fight when the time comes in Ulster. Many tenants are being expropriated, and in Monaghan the diminution in population in the last few years has been greater than in any county in Ireland. If the House does not give the Ulster tenants power to purchase in the Court at a fair rent the tenants will find it better to emigrate. I took the best means I could for enabling my tenants to become peasant proprietors, and I ask that other landlords in Ireland should be compelled to do what I have done voluntarily. I ask that justice shall be done to the Ulster men in spite of their law-abiding spirit. They will have their opportunity at the next General Election of asking their Representatives why they opposed this Motion for compulsory sale which would give to them as great benefits as have been given to the tenants in other parts of Ireland. If they find their Representatives, in spite of the repeated demands of the Presbyterian and Protestant tenants in the most law-abiding counties of Ulster, vote against their views, they will consider whether it would not be better to change their political ways rather than send Members to Parliament who oppose the other Irish Members in everything. I ask the House to accept this Motion because it is just, because it is expedient, and specially to accept it in the interest of the tenant farmers of Ulster as well as in the interest of the tenant farmers of the rest of Ireland. On this question Irish opinion is practically united. If there is to be a settlement of Irish grievances in accordance with Irish opinion the principle in this Motion must be carried into law. It is impossible, unless some such principle be carried into effect, to satisfy the unanimous demand of the toiling tenant farmers in the North and South of Ireland that they should be turned into the owners of the land they till.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That, on grounds both of justice and expediency, it is desirable that tenants in Ireland should be enabled to compel their landlords to sell to them their holdings under the Land Purchase Acts at a fair price."—(Mr. Kilbride.)

*(10.15.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): There is one sentiment in which I cordially agree with the Mover of the Resolution; this question undoubtedly excites great interest in Ireland, and especially in the Province of Ulster. That would not be gathered from the appearance of the House. I do not see the leaders of the Irish people below the Gangway, and if I look at the other side of the House I see a remarkable absence of Ulster Members. The attendance of Irish Members would not lead to the conclusion that this is a question of all-absorbing interest in which the country is profoundly concerned. The hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Knox) took pains, however, to let it be known what was the real object of this Motion. Hon. Members below the Gangway have their eye on the General Election and upon the Province of Ulster. They know perfectly well that the flag of Home Rule carried through the Province of Ulster is not likely to win much for them, and still less likely is the tattered flag of Irish Clericalism to do them service. They have, therefore, made up their minds, with a good deal of wisdom, to appeal to the Ulster tenants upon a question that touches their vital interests. The Ulster tenant farmers are, at all events, an exceedingly practical, cool-headed race of men, and the first thing they will be inclined to ask is, what is the record of the gentlemen who propose this Resolution, and urge its acceptance on the House of Commons? The hon. Member for South Kerry (Mr. Kilbride) admitted with candour that the Ashbourne Act had done great good in Ireland, and the hon. and learned Member for Cavan absolutely expressed gratitude to the Tory Government for the Land Purchase Acts. That being so, and hon. Members having clearly admitted the benefits the Irish tenants have derived from these Acts, I want to ask what has been the record of hon. Members below the Gangway in reference to these beneficial Acts? In 1885 the question was first brought to a practical issue, and the House of Commons unanimously voted £5,000,000 sterling for the Irish tenants to purchase their freeholds. In 1888, when that money was exhausted, the present Government proposed to give another £5,000,000 to renew and extend the Act. Hon. Members have admitted that that Act has done good work, and the Member for Cavan (Mr. Knox) blessed the Government for what it had done. On the 22nd November, 1888, when the House was asked to pass the second five millions 67 Members of the Irish Party voted against the Second Reading of the Bill, and if they had had their way half the freeholders created under those Acts would now be yearly or judicial tenants. The second Ashbourne Act was passed in spite of hon. Members below the Gangway. On the 1st May, 1890, the first Land Purchase Bill came to issue in this House. It was a better Bill in every respect than the Bill of last year, but though it proposed to place at the disposal of the Irish tenant farmers a sum of thirty millions of British credit for the purchase of their holdings, 78 Irish Members—practically a unanimous Party—walked into the Lobby against the Second Reading, and sought to deprive the tenants of this great boon. Six months later, on the 3rd December, the Bill which is now the Land Purchase Act was brought before the House, and it proposed to place thirty-three millions of British credit at the disposal of the Irish tenants. Where were hon. Members then? All of them were in London, but they were occupied in Committee Room No. 15, and only 25 of them, headed by the late Mr. Parnell, came down to vote for the Second Reading. The rest abstained from voting. The first thing an Ulster farmer would do, if a politician went to him with a proposal like this, would be to ask for the record of the politician, and the Party which has deliberately, for its own purposes, opposed land purchase throughout the present Parliament, and at the last moment demands compulsory purchase, will find that Ulster farmers will immediately see through that design. But what have these Land Purchase Acts done in spite of hon. Members below the Gangway? Up to the 1st March last, under these Acts, 23,781 loans had been sanctioned by the Land Commission: that means that 23,781 freeholders had been created. A good deal has been said about Ulster, but that Province had had no fewer than 12,554 of these loans, Leinster had had 3,839, Munster 4,496, and Connaught 2,892. Ulster had, therefore, had its fair share in the general division. With respect to the working of the present Act, the Member for Cavan declared it to be inoperative, and the object of the Resolution he said was to make it operative. We were told that the Act was a failure, and the figures referring to the number of applications for loans have been paraded before the House as if they were complete evidence of that failure. But it must be remembered that when that Act was passing through the House there was a surplus of three-quarters of a million under the old Ashbourne Act not disposed of, and the Government at first proposed to amalgamate that surplus with the Land Purchase Bill. But the Member for Longford objected, and it was finally decided to leave the money where it was and allow it to work itself out. What has happened since the Bill became law in August last? In August there were 456 applications for loans, amounting to £189,151; in September there were 982 applications for £343,544; in October 216 applications for £80,981; in November 69 applications for £32,282; and in December 64 applications for £9,101. The total under the Ashbourne Act for the last five months in 1891 was 1,787 applications for a total sum of £653,059. In the last three months under the new Act the applications were: In October 4 for a sum of £943; in November 66 for £35,924; and in December 105 for £42,717. Thus the total for the three months under the new Act was 175 applications for a sum of £79,584, and the grand total under the various Acts from August to December was 1,962 applications for a sum of £732,643. Therefore, I contend that up to the 31st December it is absolutely impossible for anyone to say with truth that the operation of land purchase was not going forward as rapidly as it had done previously. Up to that time the average number of applications per month was 408, and that would give 2,040 for five months, and I have shown that in the last five months of last year the number of applications was 1,962. But I have as well another set of figures. I asked the Chief Secretary yesterday if he could tell me the number of applications which had been made under the new Land Purchase Act up to the most recent date, and he has given me figures brought down to yesterday, and that practically covers three months. These figures show that in that period there have been 1,253 applications for loans for a sum of £444,612; and thus it is seen that this Act, which hon. Members below the Gangway—and I am sorry to say also above the Gangway—wished precipitately to pronounce a failure, has had under it more applications in the time than were made under the Ashbourne Act, and that hon. Members have been too premature in their denunciation.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Do those figures include the large settlement on the Ponsonby Estate?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I cannot say whether they do or not. The settlement on the Ponsonby Estate only included 109 applications, and I do not care whether for the purpose of my argument they are included or not. These are the official figures, and I say that in the face of them it is impossible for any hon. Member to say that the Act has been inoperative. But this question is largely one of finance.

MR. SEXTON: May I ask a question?

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: This is how the hon. Member served me the other night. He told me that he was engaged in a complicated argument, and as I should have an opportunity of following him he preferred that I should allow him to proceed and speak myself afterwards. Now, I am only treating the hon. Member as he treated me. I take it that if you are going to adopt the principle of compulsory sale in Ireland you can have no half-way house. I introduced the question of the compulsory sale of encumbered estates to my constituents, and they promptly told me that if I wish to remain their Member I must stop advocating a system which would confer a benefit on the tenants of badly-managed estates, and would press hardly upon those who lived on well-managed estates. The lowest estimate before the Land Purchase Act was passed as to the amount that would be required for the purchase of Irish land was something like 100 or 120 millions. The right hon. Member for Midlothian estimated it much higher, but I will take 120 millions. You can deduct 40 millions as the amount passed by the Land Purchase Act, but that still leaves a sum of 80 millions which would be required before you could carry out the Act all round. Take, for instance, the County of Antrim, where the principle of compulsion is most strongly advocated. Antrim's share in the guarantee fund is about one million pounds; that would be exhausted in a fortnight, and then I ask hon. Members where should we be? If you propose to limit the operation to the sum stated in the Act you would no doubt increase the number of tenant purchasers, but you would have a clamorous host for whom there was no money. Then hon. Members would have to come to this House and ask for the surplus which I hold to be logically involved in this Resolution. Then it has been said that this is the old leaseholder question over again. Under the Act of 1881 the yearly tenant was allowed the right of fair rent, but it was denied to the leaseholder because he was a leaseholder. The consequence was that a great difficulty arose in Ireland with which at last Parliament had to deal. The leaseholder had a right to his fair rent. But purchase is not a right, and I say that the Irish tenant farmer cannot come to this House and demand money as a right for the purchase of his holding. The fact that one proposal carries money with it and the other does not will, I suppose, have considerable weight with Members on this side of the House who are ready to give Ireland anything and everything but cash, but the moment cash is mentioned they strike. Then, again, I say that the argument for compulsion makes havoc with another argument—the argument against the Insurance Clause. This clause is said to be operating against the purchase of their holdings by the tenants, and you cannot logically hold both opinions; and the proposal to-night is to legalize compulsion, Insurance Clause and all. You cannot hold both these opinions, and, for my own part, I do not believe that the Insurance Clause is the difficulty. But, as I have said, the question is mainly one of finance; and if the First Lord of the Treasury or the Member for the Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman) will reconsider their position of last year, and are prepared to ask the British taxpayer to make good this large sum of money, which I hold will be required, three-fourths of my difficulty will be removed. But I should then have still to consider what the Resolution calls the justice and expediency of the proposal, but what I prefer to call the rival injustices and inexpediences of the proposal. The injustice of the present system to the Irish tenants cannot be denied; but so long as the remedy remains in the region of financial impossibility I do not see that we can get very much further by discussing it. When the financial impossibility is obviated I shall be willing to discuss the rival injustices and inexpediencies that are involved in this Resolution. I think there are injustices on both sides. The injustice to the non-purchasing tenant is clear. But it is now proposed for the first time to sell up a landlord against his will and without any increased price because of the compulsory sale. Hon. Members dare not propose anything of this kind for England, or, indeed, for any other class. Again, it is proposed to sell up the Irish landowner and expropriate him, and yet to compel him to leave behind him one-fifth of the purchase money as a guarantee deposit. You propose to keep as security one-fifth of the purchase money. I do not believe that hon. Members themselves would stick to that; and yet it is involved in the proposal they make to-night. Then there are other difficulties that anyone facing this question seriously would have to consider. You talk of expropriating the landlords, but that would raise a labourers' question in Ireland. The labourers of Ireland are employed to a considerable extent by the landlords in Ireland, and you cannot expropriate the landlords without raising a labourers' question. More than that, when the Irish Church was disestablished, one of the great arguments used was that the Church would be perfectly safe because of her members, because of the landed class, because of the monied class. I say that the moment you propose to expropriate the Irish landlords in this fashion you raise the question of the maintenance of that Church. (Laughter.) I give no opinion about it. I say you will raise the question, and you will have to discuss that question in Ireland. I can understand the hon. Member for Cavan laughing. He first of all got his education in England; he then chose an English profession; and then he sold his Irish estate and bolted with the swag, voting at the same time against the Bill under which he did this. I can quite understand the hon. and learned Gentleman, who has cut his connection with the country, not caring what becomes of either Church or State; but that is not the position of the great bulk of the people who will have to live in the country. And I say all these rival injustices on both sides will have to be fairly considered when this question is faced; and I am bound to add that to face it by an abstract Resolution and a debate limited to three hours is only justifiable on the ground I have stated to the House—namely, that business is not meant in this House, but in the Province of Ulster, where I venture to tell him the proposal will not get a much better reception than it has got here. My position is perfectly clear upon this matter. Alone—and the hon. and learned Member for Cavan has admitted it before now—alone amongst Unionist Members in Ulster I have opposed this proposal. He has quoted my speeches over and over again; therefore I am not doing to-night what I have not done in Ulster. I am pledged to my constituency against this proposal. Even if I was willing to vote for it, I dare not, and I could not. I ask the House to pause and consider what is involved in it. The proposal is an absolutely new proposal. We have heard of compulsion before, I admit, in this matter, but of a very different kind. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian in 1886 proposed compulsion, but compulsion of a very different kind. He did not propose to compel a landlord to sell. He proposed that where landlords, flying from the wrath to come, were anxious to sell, that then the tenants should be compelled to buy at a fixed price. That was a totally different proposal. Then we have had proposals made about compulsion to re-instate the evicted tenants. Nobody will contend that these proposals are on the same lines as the proposal of this Resolution. Then we have had set before us to-night the proposal of the Rent Redemption Act. The hon. and learned Member for Cavan stated that I was one of those who supported that measure, which involved this principle of compulsion. But what the Rent Redemption Act did was this: the perpetuity leaseholders were enabled to give their landlords an option or choice, and if the landlord refused to fix a fair rent or allow a fair rent to be fixed, then he could be compelled to sell at a fair price. This proposal to expropriate a whole class is actually made when these hon. Gentlemen are announcing that they are on the eve of a new birth in Ireland; that they are going to create a new heaven and a new earth there by Act of Parliament; and they are going to commence that beautiful and saving operation by banishing, as far as they can do it, a whole class of Irishmen. Well, that is a most unstatesmanlike proceeding. It is well seen that their late Leader is in his grave. He, at all events, said they could not spare a single Irishman. I know what landlordism is responsible for in Ireland; and I know the bitter memories that cluster round the word; but I think it is not wise, when this House has passed Act after Act to deprive landlords of their power for evil, to say to these men without any distinction, "You must sell and go." The Marquess of Clanricarde has been trotted out here to-night. I am as ready as ever I was to support a Bill to expropriate the Marquess of Clanricarde. That is one thing. It is another thing to say that I am anxious and willing to expropriate and drive out of the country men like the Duke of Abercorn, Lord Belmore, Mr. Hugh Montgomery, and other landlords I could mention. I have no desire to see these men driven out of the country. I have no desire to see men like the O'Connor Don driven out of Roscommon. I believe this is largely a financial question, and until the financial possibilities of the case are proved there is no use in discussing the question. There is no use in sending an Irish farmer to a fair to buy a horse without giving him money to pay for it; and the Irish farmers will see that. I say, until the financial possibilities are made plain, I am not ready to befool or deceive the Ulster tenants. When these financial impossibilities are removed, if they ever are removed, then I say there will be a fair case to consider the hardship of the non-purchasing tenant as regards his purchasing brother. It is because I believe it is useless to discuss the proposal until we have found either the money or the credit to carry it out that

Mr. T. W. Russell

I venture to move the Amendment that stands in my name.

*(10.55.) MR. SINCLAIR (Falkirk, &c.): I shall not detain the House in seconding the Amendment proposed by my hon. Friend. In his speech the hon. Member for Cavan stated that there was practical unanimity on the question of the compulsory purchase of estates amongst the tenantry of Ireland. If that be the case, how does it happen that we have no practical scheme now proposed? The hon. Mover and hon. Secondor of the Resolution both made no attempt whatever to deal with the two questions that are contained in the original Resolution—the question of justice and the question of the expediency of compulsory purchase. Instead of taking up and grappling with the difficulties that undoubtedly underlie the question of compulsory purchase, they left these difficulties severely alone. Indeed, I might say that much of the speech of the hon. Secondor, and almost the whole speech of the hon. Mover, of the Resolution was a speech in defence of the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The difficulties that underlie compulsory purchase are very great, and any of the proposals that have been made in this House, or I believe outside of it, to give compulsory powers under the Allotments Acts or otherwise, were made under very different conditions from those contained in the Resolution before the House. Take, for instance, the Small Holdings Acts which were recently before the House. It was suggested that compulsory powers should be given to the County Councils, who would pay cash for that which they bought; the buyer would have to pay cash, and the seller would have to be paid in cash, for that which were sold. But the proposal here is to compel the landlord to sell his holding and take stock in lieu of it; but it does not compel the tenant to buy, and, indeed, under the proposal it is impossible to compel him to fulfil his engagement even if he entered into one. There is no power to compel him to pay his instalments. I have never heard in any case of compulsory powers being applied except under three conditions: the first is that there should be a special inquiry into the case; the second is that a public necessity should be proved for such compulsory purchase ; and the third is that the purchase money that may be awarded shall be paid in cash. The great safety of the Irish Land Purchase Acts and of all the transactions that have taken place under these Acts has been that before anything can be done, before any sale can be effected, before any advance can be made by the Land Purchase Commission, the buyer and the seller, the landlord and the tenant, shall join together in an agreement as to the fair price at which the holding is to be sold ; and that great safeguard would be entirely taken away under any such proposal as is embodied in the Resolution now before the House. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion in saying, with my hon. Friend, that until a fair and reasonable financial proposition has been laid before the House whereby such a great scheme can be carried into effect it would be unsound and unsafe, alike for the landlord and the tenant, to suggest that the principle of compulsory purchase should be applied either in Ireland or elsewhere.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "whilst anxious for the fullest development of Land Purchase in Ireland, this House cannot profitably consider or assent to any proposal for the application of a general system of compulsory sale which is not accompanied by adequate financial plans for the carrying out of the principle involved,"—(Mr. T. W. Russell),

—instead thereof.

(11.1.) MR. DICKSON (Dublin, St. Stephen's Green) : I confess it was with considerable surprise I listened to the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone, especially that part of it where he referred to my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan having cut his connection with Ireland and sold his property. I think the hon. Member for South Tyrone should remember that he himself cut his connection with his own native land, and that he left Scotland some years ago and chose to take up his residence in Ireland. And I do not see why it should be a cause of reproach against my hon. Friend the Member for Cavan that he acted on the principle contained in the Resolution now before the House and sold his lands to his tenants, making his tenants the owners at a reduction of their rent of more than 30 per cent. The hon. Member for South Tyrone referred to the hour at which this question was brought forward—nine o'clock at night; but he did not explain to the House that when this place was balloted for four weeks ago this Motion would have come on, in the ordinary course even, at four o'clock in the afternoon. But there is one thing, however, in his speech that the hon. Member for South Tyrone made perfectly plain, and that was that upon this question, as an Ulster Member, he only represents here to-night his own views; and I deny that he represents the views of his colleagues or of a single tenant farmer in the entire Province of Ulster. I happen to know something of the Province of Ulster, and I say this without fear of contradiction: that all through the Province of Ulster there is a unanimous desire on the part of the tenant farmers to become the owners as well as the occupiers of their lands. The difficulties in the mind of the hon. Member for South Tyrone are purely financial. In fact, he assumes the rôle of a Chancellor of the Exchequer, and would not vote for this proposal for compulsory purchase until he sees the way financially open; in fact, he says he will not vote for it until both Front Benches have made up their minds.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I said either.

MR. DICKSON : Until either have made up their minds and see their way. All I can say is this: from my experience of this House for 19 years, if he is guided by the Front Benches, he will make a very serious mistake. I know what Front Benches have done in the past, and I know that what Front Benches oppose this year they will support next year, if it be consistent with expediency. I have not the slightest confidence in Front Benches. The hon. Member for South Tyrone, in saying that this question does not affect the tenants of Ulster, utterly misrepresents the tenants of the Province of Ulster.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL : I stated that I was pledged against this question.

K

MR. DICKSON: I say so, but I say that your constituency disagrees with you in your views of this compulsory purchase principle; and you would not get five per cent. of them to vote with you on this question. Then, as to the county of Antrim, which used to be the home of the Liberal Unionist Party; why, I thought if there was a county in Ireland whose opinions were to be fairly considered by this House, it was the great county of Antrim. I think the hon. Member heard of the Ulster Land Committee there. Every Member of this House has received from that Ulster Land Committee resolution after resolution passed upon this very question of compulsory purchase. Who are the Ulster Land Committee? Are they Nationalists, or are they that disparaged class that the hon. Member refers to as his Catholic fellow-countrymen, and the uncivilised, and the bigoted? No. The Ulster Land Committee are almost to a man composed of Presbyterians, and every one of them, with one exception, Unionists. The hon. Member for South Tyrone has said that if the House passed this Resolution, Antrim would apply for these £30,000,000 within 14 days.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: No; what I did say was that the share of Antrim would probably amount to £1,000,000, which would be taken up in a fortnight.

MR. DICKSON: Well, we will say £1,000,000. Does not that prove my case? Yet the law-abiding rent-paying Antrim is to have no more share in the benefits of the Land Purchase Act than the man in the moon. The hon. Member has stated that more than £400,000 has been applied for during the first three months of this year. But what is the rate of purchase under the Ashbourne Act? It is at the rate of £200,000 per month. The hon. Member said in the course of his speech that it would never do to carry the tattered flag of clericalism in Ulster, but I would ask—"who is it that has been carrying the tattered flag of landlordism in Ulster?" The hon. Member poses before his constituents as a great land reformer, but in this House and throughout the country he is known as an out and out supporter of landlordism in Ireland. I want to do the landlords of Ireland no injustice—I want to see them get full value for their estates. But I also want to see those who till the soil become the owners of the soil. Every purchase under the Ashbourne Act makes the position of the landlords more untenable, and this question must be dealt with on a comprehensive scale. It has been said that I voted against the Land Purchase Act of 1891. That is not so. I voted for the First Reading; I voted against the Second Reading because I believed it would not work; but after it had passed through Committee I voted for the Third Reading. If in Ulster the tenant's interest was put up for sale I believe it would exceed the interest of the landlords. I remember giving evidence before Lord Cowper's Commission seven years ago, when I said that compulsory purchase must come if the peace of Ireland was to be preserved. I was asked by Lord Cowper—

"Do not you think there will be in Ulster a sort of indirect compulsion which will gradually work itself out, and that landlords will soon be compelled to sell."

I answered that question in this way—

"Yes, I believe that will happen, but I look upon that as a most dangerous suggestion, and as a suggestion which, if pressed, will give rise in Ulster to very acute agitation."

There was an instance a short time ago of this indirect compulsion in Londonderry, in the constituency represented by the hon. Member for South Tyrone, where the Drapers' Company and their tenants were at war. The tenants wanted to buy at a fair price but the Drapers' Company would not sell, so the tenants ceased to pay rent for three or four years, and more than 208 police were sent down among them. After three or four years the Drapers' Company consented to leave the case to arbitration, and every tenant was made owner, but only after a peaceable district had been disturbed by agitation. A more dangerous element could not be introduced than indirect compulsion. It is the unanimous wish of Ulster that this Resolution should be accepted.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): No.

MR. DICKSON: I say it is, and I ask the House to accept it.

*(11.23.) THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. MADDEN, Dublin University): I must say that when I saw the Resolution upon the Business Paper I welcomed it with feelings of satisfaction and surprise. I welcomed it with feelings of satisfaction because I regarded it as a Vote of Confidence in the policy of Her Majesty's Government. I welcomed it with feelings of surprise, because it was a Vote of Confidence coming from a most unexpected quarter, and upon a subject which I should have thought would be the last to commend itself to hon. Gentlemen representing Irish constituencies and sitting below the Gangway opposite. I have a lively recollection of the introduction of the Ashbourne Extension Act of 1888. How did hon. Members who are now seeking to extend the system of compulsory purchase receive that measure? Why, they divided against the First Reading and the Second Reading, and although it was a one-clause Bill, it took eight nights to pass it through the House of Commons. An hon. Member said in this Debate—

"Fifty millions have been devoted—I say it with gratitude—by a Tory Government for land purchase in Ireland."

I must say that hon. Members concealed with remarkable ability their feelings of gratitude in 1888. I might say on behalf of that Bill—

"It was all very well to dissemble your love, But—why did you kick me downstairs?"

You did your best and you failed. And how did hon. Members opposite treat the Bill of 1890? I have examined the Division List, and I find there the names of every hon. Member who backed the Bill for compulsory purchase which has been withdrawn in order to make way for the present Resolution, as having voted against the Bill. Hon. Members opposite have certainly a most remarkable record upon this question. At the same time, as I have already remarked, the change in their attitude is gratifying to Her Majesty's Government. Hon. Members opposite can hardly ask me to assume that they were in their hearts in favour of land purchase, while they voted against successive attempts to extend that system. I must, therefore, assume that they have been converted to the policy of the present Government. Now, to what can I attribute their conversion? It must be to the success of the Act of 1891—a success so great that they are prepared to apply the measure compulsorily to the whole of Ireland. In addition to the exhaustion of the Ashbourne money there have been 1,253 applications for £444,612, and we therefore find land purchase is progressing more rapidly now than it did under the Ashbourne Act. What greater proof of the success of legislation can you have? Now, there was one kind of contribution to the Debate for which I have listened in vain, a contribution for which the ordinary Ulster farmer will look as he eagerly scans the reports of the Debate of to-night, and that is some practical suggestion as to the means by which this Resolution can be carried into effect. It is all very well for hon. Gentlemen, when they find that the policy of the Government is popular in their constituencies, and that there is a demand for the extension of the policy of land purchase throughout Ireland, to come to the House and demand the extension of the policy which they formerly opposed. The Government would, however, like to hear some practical suggestion made as to how it is to be carried into effect. No suggestion whatever has been made on the subject. Take the County Antrim: the sum available is plainly inadequate for compulsory purchase. The case has been put as if there were £33,000,000 for Ireland generally, or even for Ulster, to have recourse to for the purpose of land purchase. Nothing of the kind. There is a definite sum allocated to each county. The hon. Member has represented this as a demand proceeding from Ulster. It is new to find hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway suggesting that in legislation the views of Ulster should dominate over the whole of Ireland. That is one of the novelties to which this House has been treated in the Debate. And where is the money to come from even for Ulster or for the County of Antrim? If a scheme of land purchase was proposed containing some practical suggestions on that point, it would be the duty of the Government to carefully consider it. If the discussion were a practical one, many important considerations would arise. I am of the opinion that the success of the Ashbourne

Act and of the previous attempts to create peasant proprietors is largely dependent on the fact that the sales have been carried out by free and open contracts. Certain hon. Members below the Gangway have warned us frankly that they could procure repudiation in Ireland in regard to land purchase, and the House will readily understand how much greater would be the danger if contracts were not made freely but were forced on one party or the other by means of compulsion. Sir, some topics are suggested by this proposal. In the Bill which has been withdrawn to put this motion in order it was provided that the price, which was to be left to the Land Commission to decide, was not to include any increased value arising out of the improvement that was not proved to have been made by the landlord, unless the landlord could come forward and prove affirmatively that he or his predecessor in title made that improvement. That means land purchase at prairie value. There are other considerations that would arise if this were a practical scheme—the consideration, for instance, whether it is wise to expropriate the landlord class from Ireland. I do not discuss these points, for the reason that I regard this Bill as a palpable sham; it is an attempt to dangle before the eyes of the constituencies some scheme which is suggested to be to their advantage, but a scheme which has no substantial foundation, and which is merely suggested for electioneering purposes. I believe that those to whom these speeches have been made directly—the tenantry of Ulster—are far too sagacious to be taken in and will ask themselves whether this is an honest attempt to legislate for Ireland, or whether it is a mere delusion and a snare.

(11.40.)* MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I must congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on the lively banter of hon. Members below the Gangway in which he indulged in the first part of his speech; but while his banter was lively and amusing, I am not so sure that it is difficult to reconcile the conduct of hon. Members below the Gangway last year and this year. It is easy to conceive that a Member might approve the main object of a measure, though not at all sure of the methods by which that object was sought to be attained and, therefore, might oscillate and vary according as the hope of improvement or the despair of improvement prevailed in his mind. But, above all, when hon. Members find that a measure passed for their country has produced great grievance throughout that country—even though they think the object of the measure a good one—by the inequality of its application, there is surely nothing inconsistent in their coming forward and asking that the measure should be made universal in its application, so that the grievance may be removed. I cannot pretend to approach this question from the point of view of a supporter of the Act of last year. I voted consistently against it for many reasons, and the strongest of all was because I had no hope that it would conduce to a peaceful settlement of the land question, and to the quiet and contentment of Ireland. What was the position in which the Act left the tenants? Whilst one tenant might be receiving the full benefit of the Act, his immediate neighbour might be denied all its advantages—a reduction of rent and the prospect of becoming the owner of his holding within a few years—and this not on account of any lapse or failure of his own, not on account of his being unfortunate in the lottery of applications under the Act, but more likely on account of his landlord's unwillingness to sell. That is the fact which creates an inequality which no reasonable man can expect to cause contentment among the agricultural population in Ireland. If we had regarded the Bill as a final settlement, we might have looked upon it in a more kindly way. But we have always been haunted, in regard to this question, by the dilemma, that either you must make any system of purchase of land universal and compulsory, and that involves a sum of money exceeding anything that the British people are prepared to risk; or else, if you make it partial, you take a step which would be fatal to contentment, and which does not create a permanent settlement. That was the main reason why I opposed the Bill of last year. I do not think I have had long to wait for a justification of my position, because to-night is made this most natural and reasonable proposal for the application of compulsion. The Resolution is a reasonable and natural proposal from the point of view of the Irish Members. The hon. Member for South Tyrone, it is true, says it is an electioneering movement, but the speech of the hon. Member himself deserved far more the description of electioneering. The hon. Member is always intemperate on one side or the other—sometimes on the side of the tenant, sometimes on that of the landlord. To-night he was on the side of the landlord; but he had failed to make out a case against the proposal of the hon. Members below the Gangway on its merits, and, in fact, he admitted that the present condition of things under the Act of last year was not satisfactory. But the House must consider this matter not merely from the point of view of Ireland and the Irish tenant, but also from the point of view of the British taxpayer. I believe the British taxpayer and the people of this country have the fullest wish to do justice to the Irish community. An hon. Member below the Gangway said we were always very kind to them, except when called upon to give cash. That is not a taunt that can be levelled against us after the experience of the last half-dozen years. I do not believe that the people of this country would be at all disposed to grudge, or that they have grudged, anything which they believed to be necessary for the pacification and contentment of Ireland. But the further pledging of British credit not to the entire community, but for the sake of the individual tenant in Ireland, is a thing hardly to be contemplated with equanimity on the part of the British public. We endeavoured last year, in the discussion of this Bill, to secure that a large part of the advantage of employing British credit should go not to the individual but to the community. If that had been done it would have altered the case. But we should consider it necessary to think twice and even thrice before going forward with a sudden or precipitate extension of purchase by the use of British credit—an extension that might involve an almost illimitable use of British credit. I greatly doubt if public opinion is prepared for an immediate extension of the credit that was pledged last year. I admit that the present condition of things is entirely unsatisfactory. I admit that the inequality pointed out is glaring and obvious. But at the same time I am unable to assent to a Resolution which simply affirms the rights of tenants, until I see my way to doing so without giving a further development to doubtful principles, and without imposing on the British taxpayer an indefinite and, it may be, unnecessary burden. There are difficulties of machinery and difficulties in the application of compulsion. These may be overcome. Let us hope they may be. There are, I believe, cases of landlords who have refused to sell their land to their tenants while willing to sell it to others; and such cases point to some power of compulsion as the cure of the grievance. But I think we are hardly in a position in the first year of the working of the Act to give to it this large development. I greatly doubt whether public opinion is prepared to sanction the extension of the large measure of last year which on its introduction was viewed with grave misgivings by a very large portion of the population. While admitting fully that the present condition of things is very unsatisfactory, and that the inequalities which have been pointed out are glaring and grievous, I am not able to support a Resolution such as that before the House.

Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY (London-derry): I have no fault to find with the right hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I agree with his criticisms on the Bill of last year, but this Resolution of my hon. Friend represents a principle which the Irish people must and will maintain. We hold that its necessity will be proved more and more every day; it is being admitted every day that dual ownership of land in Ireland is a failure, and that some better principle must be maintained. We entirely agree with this Resolution, and are sure that we shall be able to convince the House of the justness of the Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman said the time has not yet arrived for the adoption of such a principle. Well, that may be so, but we have convinced Parliament of the necessity of many a principle for which, when we began to enforce it, the time did not seem to be ripe. I have no doubt we shall before very long, if this land question remains to be solved in the Imperial Parliament, which it may not be; but if it is, we shall convince that Parliament that the principle of my hon. Friend is necessary and is indispensable to the peace, comfort and prosperity of Ireland. Therefore, if we have to wait—if no great Party in this House is willing to go so far as we are willing to go—we can afford to wait a little while with the certainty that before long the principle we are struggling for to-night will be carried to a successful issue.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): This Debate, Sir, is one full of interest for Ireland, but I am sorry to think that the interest has been of a somewhat melancholy character. At first I had difficulty in ascertaining the motives of those who moved this Resolution, because they could not have had any hope of getting the Government to accept the principles contained in the Resolution. The Government have taken up all along such a position that that expectation would have been impossible. But even if accepted, the principle of the Resolution, it is evident, could not have been carried into effect during the present Session. The object of the hon. Member in moving the Resolution was one in which, I confess, I heartily concurred. He desired to elicit from those in a position to give effect to this principle what their views on the matter really are. I confess I feel grievously disappointed with the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stirling Burghs, because I failed to understand from him what policy he has—if, indeed, he has any policy at all—on this land question. The right hon. Gentleman says the settlement of purchase must be universal and compulsory or partial and unsatisfactory. He says the present condition of things is unsatisfactory, but he cannot approve of the Resolution before the House. But he fails to tell us whether he, or those whom he represents, have any policy on the land question at all. One thing is perfectly clear from the Debate that all sections of Nationalist Representatives are of opinion that the land question in Ireland cannot be satisfactorily settled unless the principle of compulsion is applied. We agree with that. The right hon. Gentleman is not in favour of the application of the principle of compulsion, and therefore he is not in a position to apply to the land question those principles that are satisfactory. Therefore he cannot be in a position to settle the land question concurrently with the question of Home Rule. In these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, surely we are entitled to ask the right hon. Gentlemen, is he prepared to hand over to us the settlement of the land question? That is all I have risen to say. Personally I have strong views in favour of compulsion if properly applied; but I do not desire to see any class of my countrymen driven out of Ireland.

MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid) rose to continue the Debate.

MR. KILBRIDE rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question, "That the Question be now put," put, and agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS, at the request of Mr. SPEAKER, took the Chair as DEPUTY SPEAKER, in pursuance of Standing Order No. 1.

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided:—Ayes 86; Noes 177.—(Div. List, No. 60.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

It being after Midnight the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

VESTRYMEN'S QUALIFICATION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. James Rowlands, Bill for the abolition of the Ratal Qualifications for members of Vestries, ordered to be brought in by Mr. James Rowlands, Sir. John Lubbock, Mr. Causton, Mr. Whitmore, Mr. Howell, and Mr. James Stuart.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 243]

BUILDING LANDS RATING AND PURCHASE BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Cameron Corbett, Bill to provide for the Rating and Purchase by Local Authorities of lands suitable for building purposes in and near towns, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Cameron Corbett, Mr. Coghill, and Mr. Hugh Elliot.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 244.]

House adjourned at twenty minutes after Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, 30th March, 1892.

Mr. SPEAKER was in his place at Twelve o'clock, but a quorum of Members was not present until twenty-five minutes after Twelve.

QUESTIONS.

APPLICATIONS UNDER THE LAND PURCHASE ACT, 1891.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give the particulars, up to the latest practicable date, of the number of applications made to the Irish Land Commission under the Purchase Act of last year, showing the number of landlords and of tenants concerned, and the amounts applied for, sanctioned, and issued, and also showing the number of landlords and tenants, and the amounts concerned, in applications under Section 13 of the Act?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I see no objection to giving this information in the form of a Return.

MR. SEXTON: But I should like to have the information now.

*MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I cannot give the hon. Member the information now. Of course, I must telegraph to Dublin for it.

MR. SEXTON: I shall take the first opportunity of showing the House how communications giving information on matters of public interest are privately made by Ministers for partisan use to Members who are confederates of the Government on this side of the House, while the information is withheld from other Members of this House.

*MR. JACKSON: I may be allowed to say that so far has it been the case that I have given information to those whom the hon. Member is pleased to call confederates; that I gave information, in answer to a written application, to the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell); and I should equally have given it to the hon. Member for West Belfast if he had asked for it.

VOL. III. [NEW (FOURTH) SERIES.]

MR. SEXTON: I have put down a question, and I have received no reply.

*MR. JACKSON: This question relates, as I understand, to the number of landlords and tenants and the amounts concerned in applications under a certain section of the Land Purchase Act. I can only give the information after applying to Dublin; and, as the question only appeared this morning, I am not able to give the information.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman can, perhaps, give me a reply to the earlier part of the question—the number of applications made, the amounts applied for, sanctioned, and issued?

*MR. JACKSON: I think I can answer the first part of the question. The information I am able to give is that up to 28th March there has been the total number of 1,253 applications, representing an amount of £444,612.

MR. SEXTON: And the amounts sanctioned and issued?

*MR. JACKSON: That information I am not now able to give.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Perhaps I may be allowed to say, in reference to this matter, that I gave the right hon. Gentleman private notice of a question I proposed to ask him, and he informed me that he had not received the information to enable him to give me an answer at question time; but later on he received the information, and was good enough to communicate it to me.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PURCHASE OF LAND (IRELAND) ACT (1891) AMENDMENT BILL. (No. 30.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.35.) MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I think I need not occupy the time of the House with many arguments to prove conclusively that the Land Purchase Act of last year has been inoperative. I think I need only remind the House of the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the hon. Member for West Belfast (Mr. Sexton) a short time ago—that, although the Act is supposed to have been in operation for some eight months, not a single shilling has been issued to any tenant under the Act for the purchase of his holding. I believe the chief objection—in fact, I may say, the main cause—of the failure of the Act is due to the “Insurance” Clause, and it is to remove this objection the 1st clause of the Bill now before the House is directed. This Insurance Clause in the Act of last year was introduced for the protection of the tenant, not for the protection of the State, and our proposal in this Bill is that the tenant shall have permission to decide whether he will avail himself of the advantage of the Insurance Clause or not—and surely, I think, the Government can have no objection that the tenants, whose interest they profess themselves anxious to protect, should have an option of this kind. The 2nd, 3rd, and 4th clauses of the Bill apply, to a very great extent, to the evicted tenants. The 2nd clause proposes to extend the period for agreements, which was introduced into the Act at the instance of the hon. Member for South Tyrone (Mr. T. W. Russell). It proposes that the time shall be extended beyond the period of six months, and it proposes to meet those cases where landlord and tenant are anxious to come to an agreement, but may be unable to make an arrangement in reference to the price. In those cases we propose that the determination of the price may be referred to the Land Commission to bring about an amicable adjustment of the difficulties. The 3rd clause provides that a grant may be given by the Land Commission from the Irish Church Fund to evicted tenants to assist them in bringing their farms into fair cultivation. I believe I am right in saying that the hon. Member for South Tyrone has stated in this House that one of the main objections to the re-instatement of evicted tenants was the present condition of the holdings from which they have been evicted, and the passing of this clause will get rid of that objection. The 4th clause proposes that in certain cases the Land Commission may stay the sale of any holding; for instance, on such estates as that of Lord Clanricarde, from which a large number of tenants have been evicted, so that a tenant formerly in possession may have the opportunity of purchase if he desires it, and so that the perpetuation of a cause of discontent may be prevented. Clauses 5, 7, and 8 are, to my mind, really more in the interest of the landlord than of the tenant, and I think if they are examined it will be shown clearly and conclusively that we have no mere class object in the Bill, but that our wish is that the Act of last year may harmoniously work. We provide for the removal of the restrictions on the exchange of Guaranteed Stock for Consols. I believe I am right in saying that the Chief Secretary stated in the House a short time ago that this was provided for in the Act of last year, and we really provide for that which the right hon. Gentleman thought had already been provided for, and which, therefore, cannot be very objectionable to him. Clause 7 is intended to cut down those absurd expenses which attach to the proving of title to an estate, and which in so many cases prevent sales to tenants. If a tenant is satisfied with a title from the Land Commission I fail to see what objection the Government can have to the passing of such a clause. Clause 8 proposes that in certain cases and under proper safeguards abatements shall be made in charges pending the completion of a sale. Clause 6 is one of the most important in the Bill, and it has reference solely to labourers. I think it will be admitted on both sides of the House that no body of men in Ireland are more worthy of the benefit the Act confers than the labourers of Ireland. I believe that under the Act £40,000 a year for five years is set apart for the purposes of a Reserve Fund, and £30,000 of that we propose shall be expended annually for the benefit of labourers in Ireland. I think, in view of the fact that the Act is working so slowly,—in fact I might say scarcely working at all—it is difficult to see what object or interest is served by piling up this amount of money for the next five years. Clause 9 provides that mortgagees shall have the power to sell to tenants as they can sell to other individuals. I need scarcely say that the only way in which such sales can now be effected is through the medium of a third person, and this encourages a class of speculators who buy from the mortgagees and then sell to the tenants at an enhanced price. We propose that the mortgagee shall have the same power of sale to a tenant as the landlord, that he may sell immediately without the interposition of the speculator. In Clause 10 we deal with the speculative purchaser, and a short time since a case came within my knowledge which proves conclusively the necessity for legislation in this direction. A landlord had a small estate adjoining that of Lord Clanricarde, and a couple of years ago he offered the holdings at 13 years' purchase on the Government valuation. Unfortunately he had mortgaged it, and in consequence the Land Commission would not make the advances to the tenants. I regret this for the sake of the tenants, and for the sake of the example, though I do not know that the example would have had much effect on Lord Clanricarde, whose last offer of sale was 25 years' purchase. Such is the Bill we commend to Members on either side who desire to see the Act, passed last year at the expense of so much time and trouble, made a working measure to carry out the purpose for which it was intended. Speaking for myself, I confess I do not think the Act can have full effect, and cannot do justice to the large body of the tenants in Ireland until this or a future House of Commons passes a measure which shall compel such men as Lord Clanricarde to sell to his tenants, or, at all events, offer such terms as will enable them to live on their holdings in some comfort and respectability, instead of being slaves of the soil, as, to a great extent, they now are. I will not trespass further on the time of the House. I shall be followed by Members of our Party more capable of dealing with the question than I am, and who will explain this measure more clearly and fully than I have. I commend the Bill to the acceptance of the House as an effort to do justice to the tenants, while it inflicts no injustice on the landlords.

(12.53.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I beg to second the Motion for Second Reading. My hon. Friend has explained the provisions of the Bill at no great length, but in such a manner that the object of the measure must be clear to every hon. Member. As to the 1st clause, I find that the hon. Member for South Londonderry (Mr. Lea), who has given notice of an Amendment to the Motion for Second Reading, seems to agree with that clause. He expresses a willingness to re-consider the Insurance Clause and other clauses. When the Purchase Act was under discussion last year the Government were warned that this Insurance Clause would go far to make the Bill inoperative. To-day we have had from the Chief Secretary the information that 1,200 odd applications have been made under the Act up to the present, and that these applications cover a sum of £400,000 odd; but the right hon. Gentleman was not able to tell us, or he has not told us, what amount of money has been sanctioned for advances to tenant purchasers. On that point I think we have reason to complain that official information should be furnished to one Member of the House and denied to other Members. The Chief Secretary has explained that he gave the information in response to a written application, and equally he would have given it in reply to an application from my hon. Friend the Member for West Belfast. But we prefer to communicate with Ministers across the floor of this House.

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member for South Tyrone has already explained that notice of a question was given to me in the hope that I should have been able to give him the information across the floor of the House. The information did not reach me until after Question time, and then I forwarded it on to the hon. Member.

MR. FLYNN: All I say is that the answer was not given in the usual Parliamentary manner, across the floor of this House, and in the hearing of the House. However, we shall soon know what we are not now in a position to know, whether the Land Purchase Act has become operative or not. It is perfectly useless, for all practical purposes, to say that 1,200 applications have been made until we know how many of these have been sanctioned. The Government were warned from these Benches that the Insurance Clause would operate against the Act, and up to the present the Government do not find themselves able to traverse the assertions we then made. Speaking from knowledge of transactions within my own constituency, I know that the Purchase Act of 1891 has not been availed of in consequence of this Insurance Clause, because, practically, for the first five years after purchase the tenant receives no alleviation at all; he is subject to the same charges, but what he wants is present relief owing to the increasing competition of foreign countries. A certain number of tenants in my constituency informed me that their landlord's solicitor had made overtures to them for the sale of their holdings to them at a certain number of years' purchase—16 or 18 years. The offer was fair enough. I worked out the figures for these tenants, showing how the future payments would compare with the present rent, and it was found that in the first five years, adding the liabilities for county cess and poor rate, there was little or no difference—such a small difference that the tenants preferred to remain as they were, and not to incur the additional responsibility. This Insurance Clause undoubtedly operates as a deterrent to purchase, and so far I think we ought to have the support of the hon. Member for South Londonderry. I will give you a case within my own experience of two farms rented at £40. Application was made in one case to the Fair Rent Commission, composed of men more or less impartial and not disposed unduly to favour the landlord. In that case the old rent was reduced to £25, but in the other case, which was considered by the Walpole Commission, the old rent of £40 was only reduced to £35. Those judicial rents are not regarded as a sacred thing in Ireland. The tenants do not regard them as fair or as binding, and in one way or another in large parts of the country landlords are obliged to reduce. We were told on the highest authority in connection with the Government that to reduce the judicial rents would be almost a breach of contract, would be something iniquitous and unheard of. But the reply to that is that the following year the Government were obliged to bring in a measure to reduce these judicial rents, and they were reduced in the poorer parts of the country. A large portion of the tenants of the country felt themselves in a safer position by bringing pressure so as to reduce the judicial rents rather than by purchasing under this Bill with the Insurance Clause. As to the Bill now under consideration of the House; Clauses 2, 3, and 4 refer to tenants formerly in possession. The position of those tenants is one of very great urgency. It is a position that largely affects or is likely to affect, the cause of peace and order in Ireland, and upon that ground, for the sake of the tenants, for the sake of the landlords, for the sake of peace and prosperity; we press upon the House that they should accept these provisions of the Bill. The 2nd clause is simply an Amendment of the provisions relating to tenants formerly in possession; in other words it extends Section 13 of the Act of last year up to the 1st January, 1894. I believe the Government are in favour of that principle, at any rate they have expressed their willingness to extend the term from six months after the passing of the Act of 1891 up to the 1st January, 1894. I regret that up to the present that Act has been practically a dead letter in Ireland. Whether we regard the tenants on the Plan of Campaign estates, or the still larger numbers who were evicted years earlier, owing to the great fall in prices, and causes over which they had no control, those tenants were looking for relief under that Section, and they have failed to obtain it except to a very small extent indeed. Upon a former occasion, when the Bill of the hon. Member for Roscommon was before the House, the Cork Evicted Tenants' Association collected statistics in regard to the Province of Munster, and I regret to inform the House that, although that Association is a very numerous body, composed of evicted tenants—and not one of them belonged to the Plan of Campaign estates—as far as I can learn, not one single landlord has been willing to permit the tenants to avail themselves of Section 13 of last year's Act. This Association approached the landlords in the most mild and conciliatory spirit, asking them to set up an Arbitration Board, before whom there might be an opportunity of consulting the landlord and the tenant and arrange a fair price, and thus bring about a mutual arrangement between landlord and tenant. These tenants were not the naughty Plan of Campaign tenants, they were tenants evicted either for poverty or for causes over which they had no control, at a time when the Legislature afforded no relief to the tenant of Ireland. As far as that portion of Ireland goes, the disposition of the landlords has been of such an unsatisfactory character that they have refused in every case to approach the tenants and Section 13 is an absolutely dead letter. The extension of the period to January, 1894, will give the landlords time to think and reflect whether they should not pursue a different course of action. The proposal is to place the tenants in the position of negotiating with them, and I therefore hope to hear from the Government that they are prepared to extend the time to January, 1894. Sections 3 and 4 also deal with tenants who have been formerly in possession. The Government must be in possession of this fact that if the landlords who have evicted tenants, such as Lord Clanricarde and scores of others, make application to the Land Commission, and sell their tenancies to men who were not formerly tenants in possession, you will have a scene of disorder in that part of the country which it will take the whole British Army to quell. It was hoped the Land Acts of 1881-85 and 1887 were to give us peace and order in Ireland; but, if that takes place in Ireland which I have just mentioned, the last state of things will be far worse than the first on these estates, unless you can, by an Act of the Legislature check such a man as Lord Clanricarde from dealing in what would be large bogus operations. One of the members of this party has some correspondence on this subject, which can be produced when opportunity offers, and the outcome of the entire controversy between the hon. Member for South Tyrone and one of the Directors of the Freeman's Journal, was to show that the hon. Member's claim was without foundation, that the majority of the so-called tenants were planters and emergency men who had no bona fide intention of tilling the land. These so-called bona fide tenants of Lord Massereene are hungry for purchase under the Act, and have sent letters to his former tenants saying they will re-sell.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: To what correspondence does the hon. Member refer?

MR. FLYNN: I say there are members of this party who at the present moment have plenty of correspondence in their possession with regard to cases of that kind.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The hon. Member has alluded to a controversy in the Freeman's Journal.

MR. FLYNN: There was a controversy.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I took no part in it.

MR. FLYNN: Did not the hon. Member write to the Times and other papers making certain statements with regard to those planters, and how prosperous they were, and did not they send a Commissioner to investigate the case, the result of whose investigations was to prove that those so-called tenants were mere planters?

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I understood the hon. Member to say that I had a correspondence with a director of the Freeman's Journal about these tenants.

MR. FLYNN: The hon. Member has misunderstood me; I know he has no desire to misconstrue what I say. I referred to the controversy about alleged tenants, and then, with regard to the correspondence, I say there are members of this Party who have at the present moment correspondence which they can produce in due time, which will prove to a demonstration that a certain number of these planters are anxious to avail themselves of the Land Purchase Act in order to subsequently clear out of the place and sell once again. Why not do this in a proper way instead of by bogus transactions of that kind. Instead of allowing those so-called tenants to go off with a certain amount of swag, why not insist that all transactions shall be bona fide, and that the Land Purchase Commissioners shall not sanction any purchase which has not been made by bona fide tenants. With regard to Clauses 5, 7, and 8, they are drawn largely to the advantage of the landlords, for, in the first place, they guarantee the land and stock shall be exchanged for Consolidated annuities, and I believe the landlords have expressed a preference for that. I hope those who represent them will see their way to take advantage of those clauses of the Act. Clause 7 deals with proving titles to estates. That is a matter in which the landlords are greatly concerned at the present moment, for there is great difficulty just now in regard to proving titles. I could give two cases in the neighbourhood of Cork in which applications were made to the Land Purchase Commission for sale. The landlord and tenant agreed as to the price, the Land Purchase Commission sanctioned the security as an admirable security, and though the landlord had been receiving rent from the tenants all along, still there was some defect or flaw in the title, and the landlord and tenant were not able to carry out the sale. Any arrangement in the direction of simplifying the proof of title ought to meet with the approval of the House generally. Clause 9 is one of the most important in the Bill, whether with a view to cases of ordinary titles or cases of estates in the Landed Estates Court. And there ought to be no opposition to it from any side of the House. There is no question that at the present moment a large number of the landlords of Ireland are merely owners in name. A deadlock has been created owing to the action of the mortgagees or perhaps owing to the action of the landlords, and you have practically a deadlock in thousands of estates in Ireland. The last Return of the Landed Estates Court showed that there were 2,258 properties under the control of the Land Court, representing one-fifth of the rents of Ireland. But that is not a desirable condition of things, it is bad for the tenants and the landlords as well, and it must be disastrous for the mortgagees. It works evil all round, and, I fail to see why the Government should sanction a system by which this immense amount of property is kept practically locked up, by which the tenants are in a dreadful state of uncertainty, under which Receivers are appointed whose power of dealing with the question of fair rent is so far restricted that you have constant cases of contempt of Court, and one thing and another occurring in Dublin. I say the power of compulsion should be introduced, and, where the landlord is hopelessly encumbered some way out of this deadlock should be found. I learn that an Insurance Company, the Scottish Equitable Life Assurance Company, is mortgagee of a certain estate, and the date of filing the petition was three years ago. That estate has never been offered for sale. The number of tenants is 558, and there is no landlord who can be interested in them, because, in a case like this, a corporation or company has no body to be kicked or soul to be damned. If this Company and companies like it had power to sell, I believe a large number of them would prefer to realise their money rather than carry on as they at present are doing, with interest running up and very little hope of receiving the principal until they are able to sell their estates. Another important clause in the Bill is that with reference to the contribution for labourers' cottages, and anything which tends to improve the position of those labourers should be cordially welcomed by the House. As to the purchase insurance claims, this matter, at any rate, ought to be optional with the tenant, for the guarantee fund and other funds provide ample security for the State. We hope the Government will consent to the Second Reading of this Bill. It is a Bill which is desired by the tenants and will improve their condition. It will not injure; but, on the contrary, serve the landlords and tend to produce peace and order in Ireland.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."
 —(Mr. Roche.)

*(1.20.) MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): The hon. Gentleman who moved this Bill says it is an unimportant measure, and the hon. Member who seconded or supported it used these words—

"that they are not yet in a position to know if the Land Purchase Bill is inoperative."

Yet those hon. Gentlemen in their Party arrangements when they brought in their Bills at the commencement of the Session have actually put it in front of the Compulsory Purchase Bill which they could not get into a sufficiently good place, and which they withdrew in favour of the Resolution last night. It seems to me, if they were in earnest in dealing with the question of land purchase in Ireland they would have had their Compulsory Purchase Bill instead of this small measure which the hon. Gentleman who introduced it described as an unimportant measure. Why do they attempt to bring it in with such evident lukewarmness? I listened to the Debate last night in the hope of hearing the hon. Members for Mayo, Longford, or Belfast, or some of those hon. Gentlemen who are recognised as leaders, and who take a very active and earnest part in land legislation, give their views on the subject. But not one of them said a word in favour of the Bill, and very few of them sat in the House at all. The hon. Member for West Belfast is, I think, the best attender in this House. He listens more than almost any other Member, he speaks well, and I have never known him absent from a Debate on Irish affairs as he was last night.

MR. SEXTON: I was present in this House during the greater part of the Debate. There was no opportunity for speaking. The chairman of the Party was only able to get five minutes.

*MR. LEA: I carefully watched the hon. Member in the hope that he would give us a speech last night, and was greatly disappointed that he did not do so. It seems to me that this is a very early date at which to amend an Act which can hardly have been in operation for three months. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Bill did not seem to know the circumstances of the case. Last night it was pointed out that there were 1,253 applications already under the existing Bill. Practically that Bill has not been in operation for three months, and it does seem to me that a case has not been made out for the Second Reading of the Bill to-day. There is no doubt the pith of the Bill lies in the 2nd and 3rd clauses. That is my chief objection to it. I admit that with regard to the Insurance Fund if the Bill had simply that one clause I would give it hearty support, and during the Debate of last year I said I believed this clause with reference to insurance would tend to restrict land purchase. But that has not been proved to have been so. But as I believed it would be so, then I opposed it; but I am now prepared to accept an Amendment on that clause. Farming is not a very paying game at the present time, and the Irish tenant has hard work to make both ends meet either for paying rent or for paying instalments under the Land Bill. Under such circumstances it was a misfortune and a mistake to make him pay for the first five years a good deal more than he would pay hereafter, for the purpose of creating an Insurance Fund which was quite unnecessary and unneeded. It seems to me a most absurd thing that you should create an Insurance Fund that would make the tenant pay 10, 15, or 20 per cent. more than his instalment would be for the sake of creating an Insurance Fund when he has already property in the soil equal to that of the landlord. If it were only that, I should be willing to support the Second Reading of the Bill; but the pith of it lies in the clauses with regard to evicted tenants. And it would have been more correct if this Bill had been called a Dillon and O'Brien relief Bill, because those hon. Gentlemen have got into a good deal of trouble with regard to evicted tenants. I admit that I would like to see the trouble and difficulty got over simply for the sake of peace in Ireland, and if it only needs an extension of time for the clause of my hon. Friend behind me to be brought into fuller operation I should be content to wait. Hon. Members want to place these evicted tenants in a better position than the honest tenants, and I cannot understand them persistently bringing this question repeatedly before the House, unless they know that the trouble is extreme and that they must get out of it some way or other. They speak of the present tenants as "bogus tenants," and desire to turn them out for the purpose of replacing the evicted tenants, and the Bill proposes advances for that purpose. I think if the Government had seen their way in the Bill of last year to give small loans for the improvement of holdings it would have been a good thing and could have been done at small risk. But those loans should be given to the ordinary tenants and not specially to the evicted tenants who have gone out or been turned out when able to pay. I have the strongest objection to the proposal to take £100,000 or whatever may be required from the Irish Church surplus, which was made by the glebe land purchasers on the disestablishment of the Irish Church. The purchasers of the glebe lands had to pay 25, 26, and 27 years' purchase, and were only advanced three-fourths of the purchase-money—not the whole as in the case of the present tenants—and had to borrow the other fourth from usurers at very high rates of interest. They purchased, too, on the high rents then existing; no fair rents having been fixed by a Land Commission. These people honestly paid their instalments and created the surplus, and it is proposed to appropriate that money for the benefit of tenants who will not have to pay half the amount for their holdings. If ever there was a case of using honesty to relieve dishonesty it is here, and I shall oppose the clause to the best of my ability on behalf of the glebe tenant purchasers of Ireland. This is a disappointing Bill. I expected this would be a comprehensive measure, which would include a clause to induce the landlords to sell. When, last year, we proposed Amendments to the Land Bill which tended to benefit the landlord, we were called landlord's representatives; but I held then, as I hold now, that while we have a voluntary system of purchase, we must give the landlord every possible inducement to sell. If the clause proposing that the Guarantee Fund should be exchanged for Consols could be adopted most of the unwillingness of the landlord to sell would be got rid of. There seems to be some misapprehension as to this Stock. It is Two and three-quarter Stock which the Government gives, and it ought to be worth the same in Consols, and it is simply a question of changing one Stock for another. If we could hold out the inducement to the landlords that they could have £100 in cash or value in Consols for what they have to sell it would have been better than this proposal in the Bill.

MR. SEXTON: It would be out of order.

*MR. LEA: I have never known any form of the House prevent hon. Members proposing what they desire. Last year there was a limitation with regard to the amount for counties, and I expected that this Bill would deal with the question. If you are to deal with that question as hon. Members desire, you must have free purchase, no limitation as to counties, and no limitation of £25 or £50, so that whole estates can be bought. The hon. Member referred to the cases in Court. I think a little management would have brought about a settlement between landlord and tenant, and nothing would have been of more use for that purpose than the Arbitration clause of the Bill of 1890, which was omitted in the Act of last year. We asked the Government to accept that clause, and if we had been supported by hon. Members below the Gangway, I believe the Government would have accepted it. This Bill deals chiefly with the evicted tenants, and therefore I am not prepared to support it. I am prepared to support the Amendment of the Land Act if improvement is wanted to make it work. It is not working so fast as I could wish, but it is working faster than the Ashbourne Act when it first came into operation. Hon. Members say that the sale of the Ponsonby estate accounts for a large portion of the applications under the Act. One of the earliest applications under the Ashbourne Act was in reference to the Marquess of Bath's property in Monaghan, involving 700 applications, beside which the 109 applications for the Ponsonby estate sink into insignificance. If hon. Members would use their influence to promote the settlement of the land question they would do more for the peace of Ireland than by any proposal for self-government or any similar proposal they choose to adopt. I wish hon. Members would treat the land question seriously and earnestly, instead of bringing forward Bills which they say are not important. It seems to me that they are not serious when they oppose the various Land Purchase Acts of 1888, 1890, and 1891, and, in the face of a General Election propose a Bill which the introducer says is not important.

MR. ROCHE: I have not said that the Bill is not an important one at all. I said that I regretted that the Bill did not go further, and that there was not some compulsory clause in it.

*MR. LEA: The hon. Gentleman used the words "not important," as I took them down at the time, but I am willing to accept his definition of what he intended to say. But if they think this Bill is not important, and the Seconder says that he is not in a position to argue that the Land Purchase Act is inoperative—

MR. FLYNN: I said the Government did not put the House in a position to say whether the Bill was operative, and were not in a position to say themselves.

*MR. LEA: If that is the way hon. Gentlemen introduce and second Bills of this kind, it is not treating the question so seriously as it deserves. It is too early to consider any Amendment of the Land Purchase Bill, but if they bring forward any Bill which it can be proved would be beneficial, and make the Act more operative and work better, I shall be happy to support it. I do not think this is such a Bill, and therefore I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

*(145.) MR. BARTON (Armagh, Mid.): I beg to second the Amendment of my hon. Friend. The discussion to-day differs from that of last night; it is a real discussion, while that of last night was a sham discussion. This Bill differs from that of 2nd March in a rather curious way, which has not been explained. That Bill dealt candidly with the evicted tenants, and put their case simply before the House. This is an omnium gatherum Bill, which collects all the Amendments to the Land Bill that have been from time to time suggested from different quarters, and couples them with the case of the evicted tenants. This is, I think, a course injurious both to the Land Act and to the evicted tenants. If there are Members on this side who would like to see the Act amended, they are prevented from voting for the Bill because it is identified with the evicted tenants; and I think the evicted tenants would prefer to have their case put simply and candidly as by the Bill of the 2nd March. The 1st Clause of the Bill deals with the Insurance Fund. If I had been in Parliament last year I would have opposed the introduction of that Fund, as it is my desire that all Land Purchase Acts should be facilitated, and not rendered difficult of operation. However, my opinion on that question expressed in the Debate on the Address has been modified, for I find that hon. Members opposite have misrepresented the meaning, object, and effect of the Insurance Fund, and I cannot identify myself with that misrepresentation. The hon. Member for East Mayo (Mr. Dillon) described it as a Fund for giving two years' arrears to the landlord; I cannot accept that. Another hon. and learned Member described it as an Insurance Fund, not for the relief of the tenants, but of some spendthrift, useless or drunken man at the other end of the county. The only person who has anything to do with the Fund is the owner for the time being of the holding concerned. The object of the Fund is a good one—to provide a Fund in case of arrears due to distress or agricultural depression. And if it be not required to meet those cases it will be available to reduce the annual payments, so that the tenant would, after some years, have to pay less than he would even under the Ashbourne Act. While I object to anything which clogs the Act I cannot vote with hon. Members who attack the Fund on grounds which I cannot think other than misrepresentation. Another reason for the modification of my original view is that the Act is working better than we were led to believe was the case. I am also influenced by the rapid demoralisation on the Front Bench opposite. When we find Ministers, who, if they come into power at the next Election, will be responsible for the administration of the law, and in a position to introduce new legislation, voting on the 2nd March to indemnify the tenants evicted under the Plan of Campaign, and pursuing a policy which can only lead to a general repudiation by the tenants of their obligations, I am less inclined than I was to disturb any guarantee. Clause 5 seems an excellent clause in itself, and I wish hon. Members had given me an opportunity of voting for it. Clauses 6, 7, and 8 also seem good clauses, if they are practicable. Clause 9 I object to. This clause shows the desire of some hon. Members to confine the operation of the Purchase Acts to unburdening the Landed Estates Courts and selling the inferior estates in Ireland. That is not what the tenant farmers and others in Ulster desire; they desire the Act to work on the best estates, between the best landlords and the best tenants. This clause would favour inferior estates, and I shall oppose it in the interests of both landlords and tenants in Ulster. I come now to the clauses which I regard as the real heart of the Bill—Clauses 2, 3, and 4. In Ireland this Bill is regarded merely as an evicted tenants' relief Bill, and as a bid higher than that in the Bill of 2nd March. That Bill proposed that rights of reinstatement and compulsory sale should be given to the evicted tenants, and this Bill offers a bid over that of £100,000 from the Church Surplus Fund. I admit that these tenants have claims on some persons and some funds, but the persons are not the representatives of British taxpayers in this House, and the funds are not public funds belonging to any part of the Empire. The persons on whom they have a claim are those who said, "The tenants left their homes on our advice." The evicted tenants also have strong claims on hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House; claims which become evident in the light of the statement of the hon. Member for Waterford (Mr. J. Redmond), that the Plan of Campaign was not an agrarian but a political agitation.

MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): That is a misrepresentation, no doubt unintentional. I said with reference to the origin and inauguration of the Plan of Campaign that I could not speak, as I had no share in its origin. What I said was that in any part I took in that Plan, I regarded it primarily as an agrarian movement, and also as a political movement and as an engine for discrediting the Government of the day.

*Mr. BARTON: I accept the hon. Gentleman's explanation, and his statement, as he has now explained it, is quite sufficient for my purpose. I say these tenants have claims on hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, if it was a political agitation with the object of putting right hon. Gentlemen opposite in office. Any subscription list for evicted tenants might appropriately be headed by the names of right hon. Gentlemen who usually sit on the Front Opposition Bench, but who are conspicuous by their absence to-day. Hon. Members opposite have often declared that these tenants would be supported and maintained by the Irish nation and the Irish National Party. I say that after using words like these—we may call them brave words—they have no right to come and ask Parliament to sanction this application of public money to the use of persons whose only claim is that they have openly violated the law. But we hear that there are funds both in Ireland and Paris for the benefit of these evicted tenants. The Irish National Fund was subscribed partly for the evicted tenants and partly for electioneering and party purposes. I submit that if this money which is asked for is subscribed by Parliament you will be practically subscribing to an election fund for hon. Members opposite—not indeed for the Irish Party, but for one part of the Irish Party. You would not only be subscribing to that fund for election purposes against the Unionist Party; but also against the other section of the Nationalist Party, for it would be used against them just as much as against us, and I protest against any public money being granted for the use of a political Party or a part of a political Party. I should like to call the attention of hon. Members opposite to the report of a meeting of the Evicted Tenants' Association in Cork on the 19th March. This is an important Association, which has been in communication with Ministers and with the Leaders of the Opposition, and is the only Association in Ireland which has not declared itself on either side. The proceedings of that Association, and the statements made at that meeting, afford strong confirmation of what I said. I have no curiosity as to the manner in which this fund has been employed; but when

hon. Members come to this House and ask for £100,000 we are entitled to say to them—How can you ask this House for money which is either to swell the fund which you have, or to enable you to devote that fund to purposes to which this House could never consent that public money should be devoted? I am entitled also to comment upon the fact that this Bill, taken in connection with the Bill of 2nd March, shows a complete change of front. Speaking on the former Bill, the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) argued that it was the duty of the Opposition to do what Liberals had often done before to make compulsory in one year a measure which had passed as a voluntary measure the year before. I ask the House to contrast that with what occurred last night. When a measure affects the whole body of the tenants of Ireland they refuse to make it compulsory, but when it affects the evicted tenants who have broken the law, the measure must be made compulsory. Furthermore, we have it on the authority of the late Mr. Parnell that the policy announced from the Front Opposition Bench on 2nd March by the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) has not always been the policy of the Liberal Party, and that they have made a complete change of front. I should like to know from the Front Opposition Bench when they come in—for, though that Bench is absolutely empty now, I cannot think that right hon. Gentlemen will desert their allies—what they have to say about this matter? When the right hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Morley) was asked by Mr. Parnell what was to become of the evicted tenants he made, we are told, a gesture of despair, and could offer no hope of direct relief. How can that be reconciled with the attitude of the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division on the 2nd March, and what is the meaning of this sudden change of front? Whatever the explanation may be, what has been the result of the promises made from the Front Opposition Bench on the 2nd March? The result has been disastrous, and has had a most evil effect in Ireland. It has given new life to the Plan of Campaign. The Front Opposition Bench have virtually encouraged agitation, for when the fire was going out they added fresh fuel. It did not suit them, on the eve of a General Election, that the one black spot in Ireland should be removed by means of a mutual agreement between landlord and tenant. But what is the attitude of the Front Opposition Bench, and how do they reconcile their absence now with previous pledges? Have his colleagues told the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division that he went too far? Have they heard the cry of exultation when it was declared by the Irish Press that the great Liberal Party had bent the knee to the Irish Members below the Gangway? Have they repented? I think it is very likely and very probable the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division had a very disagreeable quarter of an hour with the right hon. Member for Derby when they talked over the subject afterwards. Cool as was the proposal of the 2nd March, I think this is cooler still. For what purpose was the Irish Church Surplus originally intended to be used? The right hon. Member for Midlothian, in his speech on the Irish Church Bill, declared that the surplus was to be devoted to the relief of unavoidable calamity and suffering which was not provided for by the Poor Law. The late Mr. John Bright uttered eloquent words with a similar meaning, but what is the case of the evicted tenants for whom this money is asked? Do they suffer from an unavoidable calamity? Have they in any way shown themselves deserving of any help? They are the victims not of misfortune but of miscalculation. The evictions were a matter of deliberate calculation, and the tenants left their farms in obedience to advice that it was to their interest to get out of their holdings. They have found out their mistake. I believe it would be a gross misappropriation of that fund if any portion of it were given to these people who have defied both the laws of the land and the laws of their Church, and I appeal to the Government and to hon. Members who occupy an independent position not to sanction a proposal to devote a large sum of money, which was subscribed for a noble purpose, to what would practically be the endowment of a sordid conspiracy.

(234.) Mr. KNOX (Cavan, W.). We have had, during the course of this Debate, some interesting lectures on Parliamentary tactics from the hon. Member for South Derry and the hon. Member for Mid Armagh. As a young Member of the Irish Parliamentary Party, I think that the methods pursued by the Irish Parliamentary Party in this House, and out of this House, have been instrumental in getting more benefits for the tenants of Ireland in the past ten years than the methods which have been pursued by the hon. Member for South Derry would be likely to attain in two centuries. The hon. Member for South Derry tells us that we should have put our Compulsory Sale Bill first, as the Compulsory Sale Bill was the more important Bill. Well, we know that in all probability, having regard to the state of business, it would be impossible to get an opportunity for discussing any one Bill dealing with the Land Question at any considerable length, and we thought it better, under these circumstances, to put a Bill which there was a chance of carrying, in the best position. The hon. Member for South Derry admits, I suppose, after the Division of last night, that compulsory sale is not likely to pass in this present Parliament. It is, no doubt, a somewhat sweeping proposal. I do not desire to minimise its importance. It is a proposal which will in time be carried into law, whether by an English Parliament or by an Irish Parliament; but it is a proposal which it is impossible to expect to be carried into law by a Tory Parliament, and therefore we considered it hopeless to put a measure for compulsory sale in the first place. Last night we were told our Motion was an electioneering Motion. I do not complain of the imputation for one moment; it was an electioneering Motion. It was brought forward for the purpose of ventilating an important question, which will be the most important question in many elections in Ulster, to enable the tenantry in Ulster to see what are the views of their Representatives on that question, and to give them an opportunity of sending to the next Parliament men who will represent their views better than the men who represent them to-day. I think it served its purpose. Though compulsory sale may be an impracticable proposal in a Parliament constituted as this Parliament is, after the General Election, when the constituencies of Ulster have an opportunity of speaking, I venture to think that it will be found that there is such an almost unanimous expression of opinion in one direction that in the next Parliament it will not be as hopeless as it is in this. But this Bill was drawn up having regard to the conditions in this present Parliament; moderate in all its provisions and not too sweeping in its scope—essentially an amending Bill to remove imperfections in the Act of last Session which the Government might admit without in any way abandoning their main contentions during last Session. And, within these limits, I hope the Government, in spite of the speeches which have been made against this Bill, will give it a careful consideration; and if there be in this Bill any provisions which they are in favour of, I hope they will not refrain from allowing it to pass a Second Reading, even if there are a few other provisions which, in Committee, they would not accept. I venture to think that the Bill is drawn in such a moderate spirit that the Government can, without any lack of self-respect, accept it. Why, the Times newspaper even has admitted that the Land Purchase Act requires amendment in some particulars, and it is no insult to the right hon. Gentleman and the others who acted with him in pushing the Land Purchase Act through last Session to say that it requires amendment. We do not repeal the provisions relating to the Purchasers' Insurance Fund, but the Purchasers' Insurance Fund was considered not a guarantee for the British taxpayer, not a guarantee even for the county, but a guarantee for the purchaser individually; and if the purchaser, being a wise and prudent man, thinks that he can do better by putting his money into his farm, by increasing his stock, by improving his land, I venture to think the purchaser ought to be allowed to do so. The Irish tenant farmer is sometimes pointed to as an example of thriftlessness. He is not always a thriftless man. The vast majority of them are the very hardest-working men in the three Kingdoms, and they are always proud to put their labour and what money they can scrape together into their holdings, and the real security of the British taxpayer is the work and the money which a tenant has put into his holding. Of course, that applies especially to Ulster; but it does not apply only to Ulster—it applies in a large measure to all Ireland; and money invested in the holding would be more advantageous to the Government and to the tenant than money hoarded up in the Purchasers' Insurance Fund. At any rate, let the tenant judge; he ought to be the best judge. You do not direct by Bill how the tenant is to stock or farm his holding, and I venture to think if you leave him this discretion, you ought to leave him a discretion as to the particular form of saving he is to adopt. However that may be, there can be no doubt as to the opinion of the tenants throughout Ireland. There can be no doubt that a very large number of sales are hampered by the provisions relating to the Insurance Fund. We do not try, at any rate, to misrepresent the purpose of the Purchasers' Insurance Fund, and I venture to think the statements attributed to my hon. Friends on the subject were not made by them, or were made by them by an oversight. The tenants of Ireland know perfectly well what is meant by the provisions of the Purchasers' Insurance Fund, and they know it prevents these sales. There are other parts in favour rather of the landlord than the tenant. The fifth clause provides that the guaranteed Land Stock should be exchanged for Consols under all circumstance. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant stated, no doubt by an oversight, on the Address moved by the hon. Member for West Belfast, that this was so already. As a matter of fact it is not so. It is only under limits prescribed by the National Debt Commissioners that this exchange is to be made, and that limitation is one which decreases the value of the stock. I am told many people have considered that limitation is a dangerous one; and the right hon. Gentleman actually did not know the limitation existed.

MR. JACKSON: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon; I pointed out the section of the Act which provides for the limitation.

Mr. Knox

MR. KNOX: Yes; but my recollection is that though the right hon. Gentleman pointed out the section, he did not quote it, but stated that the effect of it was to make these securities exchangeable on demand by the holder. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman did not say so I would beg to apologise; but I may remark that in saying it I am only following a leading article in the Times the day after, which corrected the right hon. Gentleman's statement. According to a well-known legal principle a statement in the Times would not be evidence against us, as it is hostile to us; but as it is the organ of the right hon. Gentleman it would be taken as evidence against his Party. However, the provision which we propose is not one very difficult to carry out. Section 7 is, I believe, a section which would enormously facilitate sales. I do not wish to condemn the Land Commission in this matter; but the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland knows that the procedure of the Land Commission in the matter of proof of title is not as satisfactory as it might be. The fact is that one of the Land Commissioners, having been trained in the Landed Estates Court, has to a large extent transferred the procedure of the Landed Estates Court to the Land Commission Court, and that procedure, it is well known, is not by any means very simple or intelligible. The most vexatious delay and extra costs are caused by the present system of requiring proof of title. Why should the Landed Estates Court or the Land Commission Court demand a longer title to be shown by a vendor in that Court than any ordinary purchaser has a right to demand elsewhere? I remember the hon. and gallant Member for North Down saying that he would not sell to a tenant unless he came to him with two years' rent at least in his pocket.

COLONEL WARING (Down, N.): That was when the limit was supposed to be 20 years' purchase.

MR. KNOX: I do not know whether the hon. and gallant Gentleman expects to get 20 years' purchase now; I hope he may. At present the delays in the Land Commission Court, owing to the long title required to be proved, are such that for two years the landlord is likely to get nothing, but is likely to have expenses out of pocket. That being so, I do not quarrel with the hon. and gallant Gentleman; I only quote his opinion as a practical man anxious to protect his own interest. If that be so, is it not necessary to cut down these proofs of title to some extent? No ordinary sale in England takes two years to complete, and I fail to see why it should take so long in Ireland. Then Section 8 also provides under certain strict conditions, with the permission of the Land Commission Court, to allow certain charges on an estate to abate during the process of sale. Sections 9 and 10 propose to give to tenants on mortgaged and encumbered estates a chance of buying their holdings on as good terms as any outside purchaser could buy them at. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh quoted another opinion upon this clause; and he seemed to think that by it we intended to do some injustice to the North of Ireland. There are nearly as many encumbered estates in Ulster as in any other part of Ireland. One of the worst cases of abuse of the Land Purchase Act, owing to the present state of the law, occurred the other day in respect to the Ballyhillville Estate in the County Down. And in Ulster, just as in other parts of Ireland, tenants who happen to be under encumbered landlords cannot get as good a chance of buying as tenants who are under landlords able to pay their way. At present a mortgagee with power of sale can sell to anybody else, but he cannot sell to the tenants under the Land Purchase Act. I venture to think that that is a provision which is not just. It is not to the advantage of good order in Ireland that there should be a new race of speculative purchasers coming in to own the land of Ireland, and cut out the tenants who would be the best owners of the land. The present race of landlords gain nothing by it. These are the main provisions which deal with the amendment of the law affecting existing tenants; and I do not think there is anything revolutionary in them. They are drawn not in a class spirit, but to give justice, fair play, and good administration to landlords as well as tenants, and to the mortgagees as well as landlords. Then there are other provisions dealing with the evicted tenants. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh told us that however good might be the provisions relating to tenants in possession, he could not support the Second Reading of this Bill, because the Bill also proposed to confer some benefits on evicted tenants. What are the benefits which we propose to confer? The first is, I admit, a very slight benefit; it is an extension of a longer period of time for the sale, which is generally associated with the name of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. I fail to see why it is necessary, when a moderate and reasonable proposal such as that is made, to go through the whole history of every fund, apparently, which has been raised for political purposes in Ireland in the way the hon. Member for Mid Armagh has done. This is only a slight amendment of the clause of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. He must know that in these cases there is great difficulty in bring landlord and tenant together. We propose in this Bill that in these cases the landlord and tenant should go and refer the terms to be settled to the Land Commission. We did not introduce the word "compulsion," and for this reason—that when the Motion of the hon. Member for Roscommon was submitted the other day, although supported by the Irish Representatives, it was opposed by the Government. We thought it necessary to draw a clause which would be moderate enough to be acceptable to the Government, and in accord with their expressed views. It is proposed by Clause 3 that a sum of money shall be set apart for the purpose of enabling these holdings to be brought again into cultivation. The hon. Member for South Tyrone will admit that the second great difficulty, after you have brought the landlord and tenant together in effecting a settlement, is to get these holdings back into a state of cultivation which will enable the Land Commission to advance the money. We propose to deal with that, not by means of Imperial money, but by taking a small and limited sum out of an exclusively Irish fund—the Irish Church surplus, and thus to enable these men to become as they were before their eviction—useful cultivators of the soil. The Irish Church surplus is a national fund, and I venture to contend that there is no purpose to which it could be more fittingly applied than the restoration of the evicted tenants from their holdings. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh and the hon. Members who supported him on the other side of the House are very anxious to dissociate themselves from the evicted tenants, but I have not heard of any tenants in the North of Ireland who have refused to take advantage of the Act of 1887 because it was won by the Plan of Campaign. I, therefore, ask whether there could be a more religious purpose, in the best sense of the word, to which this Fund could be applied than the restoration of peace and tranquillity to the Clanricarde, to the Ponsonby, to the Alford, and to the other estates where disorder and suffering now prevails? I hold that, on every ground, it is the proper source from which this boon should be given to the Irish tenants. The hon. Member for Mid Armagh told us that there are other Irish funds to which we might first look. He said there was an Irish Tenants' Fund, which was the only Association in Ireland which did not take sides in the controversy. He stated, however, that this money was collected on false pretences.

MR. BARTON: I should be very sorry to suggest that the money was collected under false pretences. I said I had no right to inquire. I only called attention to the fact that hon. Members were asking for public money when there was an existing fund which could be utilised for the purpose.

MR. KNOX: The hon. Member certainly seemed to me to insinuate that the money had been subscribed for the purpose of the evicted tenants only in Ireland, and that it had been applied to other purposes by hon. Members sitting opposite to him. Well, I say that is not the fact. The money was subscribed for national purposes—for the purposes of the evicted tenants, and for other purposes. It was subscribed directly in accordance with the resolution that was passed; and if the hon. Member wishes to know, a very large sum has been paid over and applied out of that money for the purposes of the evicted tenants. Whatever differences of opinion there may be amongst the Nationalist Members in Ireland on the question, the evicted tenants will not be stinted, but that is no reason why the work of restoring peace in Ireland should be thrown entirely on the funds of a political Party. In many cases, as in the case of the Clanricarde Estate, there has been a serious conflict, and there are likely to be conflicts which will disturb the peace for many a long year. Some previous Chief Secretaries have done something towards trying to restore peace there—the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade tried to do something. The present Government seem, however, to have abdicated their functions to do anything to restore peace on this estate, and the supporters of the present Government tell us that the functions of Government in restoring peace to the country should be thrown on a political Party. I venture to think that while right hon. Gentlemen are on the Treasury Bench they are responsible for the Government of Ireland, and they should do their part towards restoring peace on those estates. This Bill, drawn moderately as it is, drawn not in the interest of one class but of every class connected with the soil of Ireland, should be carefully considered by Her Majesty's Government. I venture to hope that whatever their opinion may be as to the origin of the Plan of Campaign, and the justification for it, they will allow the Bill to pass its Second Reading, because its object is an honest one.

(5.13.). MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): It is only to be expected that the Land Purchase Act will need amendment at some time or other. Every Act of such importance and magnitude must require such amendment, but hon. Members opposite have not shown any substantial reasons for the Amendments they have proposed. What experience have we had of the Land Purchase Act up to the present time? I am prepared to say that neither on this side of the House nor on that side of the House is anyone in a position to say that the Act is an absolute and convincing success; but the short experience that we have had of it goes to prove that there is every reasonable expectation of its proving a success. Statistics show that there is a great desire on the part of the tenants to avail themselves of its provisions. I have heard tenants discussing this Bill, and looking at it from all points of view; but I have never heard that the Insurance Clause has been the means of preventing them coming to an agreement with their landlords, and I submit that the argument put before the House to that effect is not a substantial argument. I should be utterly misrepresenting the views of the Irish tenants whom I represent if I were to accede to the provisions of this Bill as to the relief to be given to them out of the National Insurance Fund in Ireland. They believe that the responsibility which has grown up, consequent upon the action of hon. Members opposite, both above and below the Gangway, must be borne by those hon. Members at the present time. They have led these men out into the wilderness, and it is their duty to do what they can to extricate them from the difficulty in which they now find themselves. The hon. Member who moved this Bill based his claim to the support of the House by a reference to the Clanricarde Estate. I say that neither on that nor on any other estate can there be found any reason for supporting this Bill. On the Clanricarde Estate the Plan of Campaign has broken down. Negotiations have been successfully carried out between the evicted tenants and the landlord, and I have heard that 30 tenants have been re-instated in their former holdings during the last year. In each of these cases the tenants have paid a substantial portion of their rent which was due and all the costs, and have given an undertaking to make a further payment at the end of six months. In addition to that the agent for the Clanricarde Estate has been able to dispose of upwards of 26 other farms.

MR. ROCHE: I have not referred to the Clanricarde Estate at all.

MR. MACARTNEY: If hon. Members will allow natural causes to have their effect and permit the evicted tenants to come to terms with their landlords the whole difficulty with regard to the tenants would speedily disappear. I can say from my own knowledge that the spirit which has existed among the Irish some years ago, and of which hon. Members opposite have taken advantage, is rapidly vanishing. Hon. Members opposite can no longer rely upon the credulity of the tenants. The responsibility for the present condition of the evicted tenants rests upon them. They have advised these men to leave their farms rather than pay the rent which they were perfectly well able to pay, and they are now seeking to restore those unfortunate people to their former position at the cost of the Nation. What are the causes which have withdrawn from the hon. Members opposite the financial support of the people of Ireland. There was a widespread feeling in Ireland that the money subscribed by the people of that country for certain purposes has not been applied entirely to those purposes, but has been used for other purposes, which were for the pecuniary advantage of those who have made political agitation in Ireland the most profitable business in that country. I will read a passage from a remarkable letter which was written by the rev. Canon Doyle in reference to both secretaries of the Irish Party. In that letter the rev. Gentleman said :—

"I say the lawyers we have now in the House, and some out of it, acted scandalously on the trials under the Coercion Act: that they actually transferred them into a milch cow; that they fattened on the sufferings and miseries of the poor persecuted people. The guilty are to be found in both wings of the disrupted Party. The fact—the disgraceful fact—is notorious. It is the business of the people to inquire into the characters of the men they return as their Representatives. If they return a gang of political adventurers, whippers from newspaper offices, sharpers, chevaliers d'industrie, and understrappers of every degree, what can they expect but to be sold to the highest bidder."

Now that is the deliberately expressed opinion of one of the leading parish priests, himself a Nationalist; and can hon. Members opposite be surprised that after such a condemnation their milch cow has failed them, and that there should be some reluctance in the minds of men to contribute their half-crowns on Sundays as before when they find that the funds to which they have subscribed are used not only for the purpose of the evicting tenants but for other purposes. I ask whether they will publish a statement showing how the funds have been distributed, and whether they will tell the people of Ireland which has supported them how much has gone for other purposes. If they will do that and submit their accounts to a proper audit, then I daresay they will find that the subscriptions that will come in on behalf of their cause will be much larger than they are at the present time. My constituents complain that three-fourths of the fund have not been applied to their proper purposes, and they would certainly strenuously object to see even the sum of £100,000 further applied to the use of men who have brought themselves into their present condition by having followed the advice of the leaders of a political agitation which is believed to be disastrous to the best interests of Ireland. If hon. Members really want to assist the evicted tenants, let them remove the ban which has been placed on these men. Let them direct Father McFadden, of Gweedore, to cease to interfere between landlords and tenants. The Irish people are told that the best way to heal their differences is to re-unite in the fight with landlordism, but if the tenants are allowed to come to terms with their landlords, they will be re-instated in a very short time. There is no use in hon. Members coming to the House and asking for funds to relieve distress and to cure disorder, when that disorder can be removed and that distress relieved by one word from the leaders of the agitation in Ireland. Now, a speech was made in the month of November last, which was reported in the National Press—a speech of great importance, not because it was made by an Irish Member of Parliament, but because, in addition, it was made by a gentleman who is now director of the literary activity of the National Press and the Freeman's Journal. He told the people at Longford that the best way of re-uniting the people was to re-unite them in the fight against landlordism. After that speech I certainly thought something more approximating to the ideas of the general Plan of Campaign would have been contained in this Bill. But hon. Members now come forward as the benefactors of the Irish landlords. I have looked at this Bill, and from that point of view I do not think they have justified their claim. The hon. Member for Cavan dealt with Clause 9, which would place mortgagees in the same position in Ireland under the Land Purchase Act as the Irish landlords. I altogether object to that. If a mortgagee wants to be placed in the shoes of a landlord, let him foreclose his mortgage, and then he will be in a position, if he chooses, to deal with the tenants. But I altogether object to a mortgagee coming in and squeezing the landlord into terms which may cover the mortgage but which may leave nothing to anybody else. Now, Sir, as regards Clause 10, which deals with the case of the speculative purchaser, I must say that I do not see that the speculative purchaser is a man who would do any great injury in Ireland; perhaps he might facilitate operations. There might well be cases in which the landlord had his estate encumbered in such a way, and to such an extent, that he could not come to an agreement with his tenants as to the terms upon which he would sell his property. But supposing a speculative purchaser walks in and says to the landlord, "I give you so much down in cash," the landlord might accept from the speculative purchaser his terms, leaving the speculative purchaser to make terms with the tenants. Having paid the landlord in cash the speculative purchaser would be entitled to make something out of the transaction, but he must make reasonable terms with the tenants, because those terms would be subject to the approval of the Land Commission. Therefore, Sir, the only effect of this provision would be to retard and to obstruct the operation of the Land Purchase Act. That being so, I shall oppose that clause. Now, Sir, as regards Clause 6, although I admit it is intended to operate for the benefit of the agricultural labourer, it does not confer upon him any benefit at all. At present, under the Land Purchase Act, he not only shares in the distribution of the county percentage but in the share of the Exchequer's contributions. As regards the proving of titles, I would be glad to do anything to shorten the time, as I think there is great hardship in the present mode. Sir, looking at this Bill in its wide and general application, having regard to the fact that it is really a Bill for the relief of the evicted tenants and to apply to them a share of national funds, I am bound to say, for myself and for those I represent, that I shall have to give it my strongest opposition.

(3.40.) MR. SEXTON: Men of public spirit in or out of the House will be disposed to agree that this Debate would have lost nothing, and might indeed have gained much, if hon. Members who have spoken in opposition to the Bill had been content to address themselves in a spirit worthy of a deliberative Assembly to the merits of the case and to the provisions of the Bill, and had not made the Debate the occasion of importing prejudice and passion, and making offensive insinuations and leveling intolerable insults. It would have been well for the character of this Assembly and the relations between its Members, if Members generally had been content to discuss the question in the spirit of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cavan—a spirit of calm and reasonable argument upon the provisions of the Bill of last year, and the Amendment now proposed. But, Sir, hon. Members, and amongst them the hon. Member who has just spoken, have chosen, with a questionable sense of the nature and the limits of the subject, to make this Debate the vehicle for insult and insinuation against certain Members sitting on this side of the House. The hon. Member who makes these imputations—

MR. MACARTNEY: I only quoted speeches to show the views which certain Nationalists belonging to the hon. Member's Party entertained.

MR. SEXTON: The hon. Member quoted speeches and drew inferences. He is one of those who take upon themselves the rôle of political scavengers and who search—and I regret that the hon. Member for North Armagh has inaugurated his career by following so vicious an example—who search throughout the Press for any speech, or letter, or phrase which might be held to convey an insult against any Member of this House, in order to introduce it into a Debate in this House to obscure the issues. I say to such men that though they may gratify an unmanly passion for the moment, they will not achieve an honourable position in this House. The hon. Member who last spoke belongs to, and is the spokesman of, a class that has plundered the people of Ireland for generations. The legislative results of our action have been that a million and a quarter sterling of money that was formerly taken annually from the people by these landlords now remains in their pockets. The hon. Member is, I say, the spokesman of a class that made life miserable for the Irish people until they were handcuffed by force of law—a class more responsible than any for offences against Christianity and civilisation—and yet the hon. Member comes forward to make imputations against a body of men who came into public life for honourable motives, and who have kept themselves free from dishonour, and of whom I say that their motives for coming into public life and remaining in it are more honourable, more free from selfishness and from personal gain than can be claimed by hon.

Gentlemen opposite. We are the only Party that come to this House from motives that are impersonal, and it is intolerable that a Debate on the Irish Land Purchase Act should be turned into an arena for the dissemination of insult. Reference has been made to the National Fund. I think I have already explained that the great bulk of that Fund is devoted to the relief of the evicted tenants and is applied to no other use; that Fund is in the hands of men who hold themselves responsible for every penny that is received and spent; the accounts audited and published in due course; and I shall be extremely glad to lay a copy on the Table if the hon. Member for South Tyrone will lay on the Table a copy of the receipts and expenses of the Secret Fund he administers for the sustentation of the planters, and if the Chief Secretary will give us an account of the receipts and the expenses of the Carlton Club. I make that challenge, and until that challenge is answered I defy hon. Members to repeat these insults.

MR. BARTON: The hon. Member has misunderstood me. I never made any personal reflections. What I said was that this Evicted Tenants' Fund was a Party Fund, and that we were asked to supplement it by public money.

MR. SEXTON: Yes, Sir; but there was a certain under-current of imputation running through the speech of the hon. Member, and I say that if that is continued the dignity of the House will suffer. The order of Debate will not be advanced, and the pacific relations and the existence of good feeling between different parts of the House will be rendered impossible. The hon. Member did make reference to the existing public fund as a reason why our claim should not be met. I make bold to say that a more despicable policy never was announced in this House. It amounts to this—that those evicted tenants now constitute a charge upon the Irish people, and that you will not allow a grant of public money to be made for their relief, because the people would thus be relieved of the burden and would be able to make use of that money for political purposes. That is a deliberate avowal that the Government refuse our demands, so that the people of Ireland may be embarrassed at the forthcoming General Election in the exercise of their constitutional rights.

Mr. Sexton

Was ever a more disgraceful policy announced? When the people of Ireland know the policy they will see its baseness. Now, Sir, we are asked to reject this Bill, on the ground—

“That this House, though perfectly willing to consider a reasonable Amendment of the Land Purchase Act of 1891 . . . declines to re-open the question of the evicted tenants, it having been previously decided this Session.”

Those who agree with that Amendment are bound to support this Bill, because it contains clauses which it is admitted are worthy of being considered. In the second place, the question of the evicted tenants has not been decided this Session, and for these two reasons I claim that the Bill should be read a second time. No doubt certain propositions connected with land purchase have been rejected this Session, but none of them were identical with the clauses of the Bill now before the House. The position taken up by the hon. Member for South Derry is one which is neither justified by his experience nor by his authority. This Bill deals with people out of their homes. It is, therefore, urgent. Secondly, we believe that no system of land purchase will succeed whilst the present system of insurance stands. Even compulsion would be of no service. The hon. Member for South Derry has taken upon himself to criticise the conduct of the Irish Members in the Debate last night. He developed a spirit of rancour, and spoke of this as an O'Brien and Dillon Relief Bill. He would reject this Bill not because of the dispossessed conditions of certain people, but because certain other people took an interest in them. The question before the House is whether this Bill is for the public benefit and in the interests of public order. The reason why these evicted tenants have an unimpeachable claim is this—that it was they who induced the House to pass remedial legislation. By resisting unjust demands, by going out rather than pay exorbitant rents, these men obtained all the reforms of the law that have taken place during the last ten years. The justness of the claims of these men have been admitted in the most solemn form in Acts of the greatest importance, and a moral obligation lies upon the Government and the House to see that the men who first applied the levers of justice should not be left out in the cold. There was nothing more amusing than the speech of the Attorney General for Ireland last night. He spoke of our conversion to the policy of purchase. Sir, we are the originators of the policy of purchase, having been prosecuted for it. We forced it upon this House. We compelled one Party after another to accept land purchase; and if the right hon. Gentleman will ask at Dublin Castle for a copy of the card of membership of the Land League in 1879 he will find that the second of the ten objects of the League was to make every tenant in Ireland on fair terms the owner of his holding. This latest neophyte official of the Tory Party stands up in the House of Commons, in the face of us who have gone through the desert for the sake of the cause, and have brought it down to the threshold of success, and waves the torch of the true faith of our fathers. There is another question to be considered, and that is whether or not the Act of last year has succeeded? That is the fundamental question here to-day. If the Act of last year has been a splendid success, of course there is no need for amendment. But I claim with confidence that not only has the Act of last year not succeeded, but that up to the present moment the course of transactions under it may be pronounced a failure. The Attorney General said the success of the Act was so great that we were compelled to apply it compulsorily to the whole of Ireland. But we think the success of the Act was so little that it is necessary to apply compulsion in order to make it a complete success. I believe the Chief Secretary gave particulars up to the 28th March to the hon. Member for South Tyrone; but when I applied for particulars of the sums applied for, sanctioned, and issued, the right hon. Gentleman could only give me the sums applied for, but not those sanctioned and issued.

*MR. JACKSON: I think it a little unreasonable to press this. I did not see the question until I reached the House at twelve o'clock. It only appeared on the Paper for the first time this morning, and the information could not possibly be given without communicating with Dublin. I ask, is it reasonable to press such a point when it really would not have been possible to get the information, and when, as a matter of fact, I had not seen the question?

MR. SEXTON: Of course, I accept the statement of the right hon. Gentleman. All I can say is that the hon. Member for South Tyrone appeared to revel in the information.

*MR. JACKSON: He applied to me in writing, and gave notice that he intended to ask the question. I was unable to get the information by Question time, or I would have given it in answer to a question across the floor of the House. When I did get it I sent it to him in the ordinary course, as I should have sent it to any other hon. Member.

MR. SEXTON: I put my question down last night, and the right hon. Gentleman had it this morning. There is a wire from the Irish Office to the Land Commission in Dublin, and I think it would have been reasonable if the officials of the Land Commission had this morning, in ordinary course, supplied the information by wire. They could have wired the information as they do every day. The Commissioner, who has no less than £3,000 a year—Mr. Trench—might have wired the intelligence.

*MR. JACKSON: They could not know of it until they were communicated with.

MR. SEXTON: What in the world is the Irish Office for? The Votes and Proceedings were delivered at the Irish Office this morning at ten o'clock.

*MR. JACKSON: Not in Dublin.

MR. SEXTON: The clerks could have wired the question in the ordinary way, and a reply might have been sent to the message, as is usual in such cases. However, we have to seek out the information as best we can; we have to take it at second hand, and fall back on the speech of the hon. Member for South Tyrone. But the hon. Member for South Tyrone fell into the grievous error of supposing that the success of the Land Purchase Act had been shown by coupling together the transactions under the Ashbourne system and under the Act of last year.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I gave the operations under the Ashbourne Act for the five months from August to December, 1891, and then I took the new Act, which, for all practical purposes, came into operation on the 1st July, and gave the Returns separately.

MR. SEXTON : That is precisely what the hon. Member did not do. On the contrary, he treated the cumulative operations under the Ashbourne Act of last year as a proof of the success of the Land Purchase Act. The grand total under the various Acts from August to December, the hon. Member said, was 1,962 applications for £769,510; therefore, he had to give the transactions under the Ashbourne system last year and the transactions under the Land Purchase Act, and he cited the cumulative facts as a proof of the success of the Land Purchase Act. But that is exactly our position. Our contention is, that the transactions under the Ashbourne Act have been more numerous than they would be under the present Act, because the former gave the tenant the full benefit of the bargain; and under the Ashbourne Act in six years there have been applications for £6,000,000. What were the applications under the new Act? Though the figures were few and slight, the hon. Member for South Tyrone was not able to carry them correctly. He told us that in October the amount applied for was £943; in November, £35,000; and in December, £79,584. But, as a matter of fact, the hon. Member gave as the transactions for December the transactions which had taken place during the whole of the three months. The hon. Member, as another argument that the Land Purchase Act had succeeded, stated that "for a period of practically three months there had been 1,253 applications for the amount of £444,612." What does he mean by practically three months, when the period he took was actually seven months? The Land Purchase Act was passed in August last year, and it was open to any tenant and landlord to agree at any time from the month of August up to the present day. And in the whole of those seven months the transactions under the Act have been something over 1,200, and the amount applied for £444,000. And it is owing to the Evicted Tenants' Clause, inserted by our pressure, that you are able to prevent the miserable appearance of the course of transactions under the Evicted Tenants' Act. How many voluntary and free transactions have occurred with evicted tenants? I should think very few. I therefore say that the great part of those 4,000 applied for is due to the clause we had inserted in the Bill of last year, and if you consider the transactions which are absolutely free in regard to tenants in possession of their holding, the Act is an absolute and miserable failure. I will not go into the details of the Bill, but will say it is a Bill which proposes to benefit every class in Ireland. There is a clause for the benefit of the labourers which will give them £30,000 a year under the Land Act. Why should £40,000 a year be locked up for five years in a reserve for which there is and can be no need, whilst the labourers in Ireland, to whom this money might otherwise be applied, are living in a state of misery and in unsanitary houses? Three of the clauses are for the benefit of the landlords. I have to say, in reply to the hon. Member for South Derry, that if we had proposed in this Bill that the landlords should have cash, that would not have been allowed, because no Member of this House is allowed to propose a charge upon the Public Revenue. And I would counsel the hon. Member for South Tyrone to counsel his friend the Member for South Derry not to run into the adjudication of those matters, which are already in the hands of competent authorities. The Chief Secretary says that the landlords may have Consols instead of cash if they desire, but the National Debt Commissioners are only empowered to issue a certain amount of Consols instead of Land Stock, and no landlord would be sure that any would be available for him. This Bill would make it plain that any landlord could have Consols if he pleased. I will not deal with the clauses benefiting the tenants in detail. The Insurance Fund in many cases works unevenly and oppressively. The insurance should be voluntary, and then I believe that many of the tenants would be willing to insure; but there is something abhorrent in compulsion, and it creates a prejudice against the system which would not exist if there were no compulsion. This Bill is intended to make the Act of last year work. If you pass it, it will confer benefit on the labourers, on the tenants, and on the landlords; it will make the policy of purchase—what it is not now—a practical and workable policy. If you refuse to accept it, in the name of common sense and decency do not persist in the nonsensical argument that the men who offer such Bills to you to make your policy effective are enemies of land purchase.

*(4.18.) MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyronne, S.): I do not intend to deal with the earlier portion of the hon. Member's speech, but we must all recognise that hon. Members below the Gangway have become very thin-skinned and are greatly concerned about the dignity of debate. With regard to the working of the Land Purchase Act I wish to be very clear and very distinct. What I said last night was this, and my words are correctly reported. I said that for the five months from August to December last year the new Act was in competition with the surplus of the old Act, and that, inasmuch as the terms of the old Act were better for both buyer and seller, purchasers and vendors naturally went to the surplus of the old before going to the new Act. For those five months there were practically only something like 200 applications under the new measure. I admit that I summed up in the working for the five months the proceedings under both Acts, making a grand total of 1,972 applications, and my object was to show that during that period land purchase had been going on as rapidly as before. Then I turned to the three months, January, February, and March of the present year, bringing my figures down to the day before yesterday, through the kindness of the Chief Secretary, and I stated that during those three months, the only three months during which the Act can really be said to have been in operation, there had been 1,252 applications for £444,000.

MR. SEXTON: That is not the fact. That is the number of applications for the whole of the seven months.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Accepting the hon. Member's statement, that only reduces the number of applications by 200, but my figures were clearly understood by the House. The hon. Member said, what he does not know, that many of these applications were by evicted tenants; if so, he is forced to the conclusion that they are coming in under the 13th section of the Act. Then what is the use of this Bill? If the old Act is sufficient, and these applications represent the evicted tenants, there is the less necessity for this Bill. When I came to look at the Bill the first question I asked myself was, What is the principle of the Bill? Is it a Bill to amend the Land Purchase Act of last Session, or a Bill to restore the evicted tenants? Both these ideas are in the Bill. Hon. Members opposite shut out Members like myself and my hon. Friend near me and the hon. Member for Mid Armagh (Mr. Barton), who are anxious to vote for any reasonable amendment of the Land Purchase Act, by bringing in a Bill to amend it, and putting in three or four clauses dealing with the evicted tenants, which they know that the Government and we cannot accept. And then the hon. Members pose as the tenant's friends, bringing forward impossible Resolutions one night and absurd Bills the next day. This is more an Evicted Tenant's Relief than a Land Purchase Act Amendment Bill, judging from the speech of the Mover of the Second Reading. He devoted exactly two minutes to the first clause, which deals with the Insurance Fund, and then tumbled into the question of the evicted tenants, with which he is specially acquainted and upon which he feels deeply. Judging from that speech, the Bill is one for the restoration of the evicted tenants, and for handing over to them public money to start them afresh in business after they have failed. On the question of the evicted tenants I want to ask this frankly and plainly, Who is responsible for the position of these tenants? Mr. Speaker, this is not a case of men being unjustly evicted, though everybody will admit that there may have been such cases. The Bill proposes to deal with the men who were evicted in the old Land League days, under the "No Rent" Manifesto.

MR. ROCHE: Before it and under it.

*MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Under the Manifesto, for signing which hon. Members were put into prison by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench. It deals with the tenants evicted under the Land League and the Plan of Campaign. These were grown men, who elected whom they would serve, and they took the bad advice tendered by hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway. They deliberately elected to follow that advice, and in hundreds, if not in thousands, went out voluntarily on the arrival of the Sheriff or were forcibly evicted. Under these circumstances, what right have hon. Members to come to this House, whose laws they broke, having given that advice, and try to throw on the House the responsibility of doing what they call justice to these men? We have heard a great deal of Lord Clanricarde, but the hon. Member for South Antrim (Mr. Macartney) has dealt effectively with that. We were also told that on the Olphert Estate there were starving men and that destitution was prevalent. Mr. Olphert had 350 tenants, and they, acting under the advice of hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway, were nearly all evicted. They suffered nameless hardships, and 120 went back twelve months ago. I have had two letters during the last three or four days from that estate, from which I shall read extracts. In one, dated 26th March, the writer says—

"You will be glad to hear we have made another breach in the Plan of Campaign; about 60 tenants have accepted our terms."

These are the men for whom relief was asked—

"These terms have been three years' rent paid down and half the legal costs, and they have gone back and are rejoicing. The most of them paid during the last two days, so we may safely suspect that a number will follow their example. Many would have paid a fortnight ago, but were invariably turned back either at Gortahork or Falcarragh. This thoughtful action on the part of their leaders has thrown miserable dupes back in their crops and wasted a week of the finest weather we have had for a long time in this country." Last night I received another letter which says—

"Just a line to tell you 34 more evicted tenants paid up yesterday, including three of Father MacFadden's parishioners."

The gentlemen who have these agents waiting at the corner to turn back tenants who have a desire to get back to their holdings and the money in their pockets, have no right to come and ask for public money to carry out their policy. These gentlemen are responsible to the evicted tenants; they made their beds for them, and the pity is that the men who made the beds have not to lie in them. The Irish Church Surplus was never intended for a purpose of this kind. I remember the Irish Church Debates, and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian gave a hint that this surplus might be devoted for the relief of distress, for the blind or insane. I almost think these tenants were insane, and a case might, perhaps, be made out on that ground. But I say that so long as hon. Members prevent these tenants from going back to their holdings and settling with their landlords they have no right to come here and ask for £100,000 in order to put these men back. With respect to the Insurance Clause, I hold that it was brought about by the action of hon. Members below the Gangway. It is all very well for them to complain of it now, but there was no Insurance Clause in the Ashbourne Act. What made right hon. Gentlemen opposite insist on security? It was the threat of repudiation from hon. Members below the Gangway, and because of the open promulgation of that monstrous system of robbery, the Plan of Campaign. I was in favour of the Insurance Clause on its merits. The State, in this great transaction, is called upon to run a risk; the landlord is called upon to run a risk; and is it to be said that the man who is to get the whole benefit is the only man who is to have no responsibility, and to do nothing for his own salvation? It is not too hard to ask the Irish farmer to pay higher for the first five years, in order to make an Insurance Fund which is for his own benefit and not for the benefit of other people. I was going to make an appeal to the Front Opposition Bench, but it is unoccupied. It is the most extraordinary Front Bench I ever saw. It is always one wide expanse of green leather when it ought to be filled. The hon. Member for Northampton is also absent, or I would appeal to him as a locum tenens. But if the British taxpayer sees no good in this Insurance Clause I will not plead for it. If they are willing to relinquish their security I will not insist upon it. But what I say is that this Bill has two objects. One is perfectly legitimate and perfectly necessary, and I sympathise with it, and on that ground would support the second reading and discuss the matter in Committee. But when hon. Members mix up land purchase with the case of the evicted tenants, upon which this House has already given its verdict, I agree with the hon. Member for South Antrim that it is impossible for any man representing an Ulster tenant farming constituency to vote for a measure of this kind. If we made these tenants a present of this £100,000 we should do a grievous wrong to our constituents, and I do not think we should be allowed to do that more than once. I shall vote for the Amendment, and now, as before, I shall resist any proposal to re-instate men who have no claim on the sympathy of this House and far less on its generosity.

(4.36.) MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): I contend that the English farmer has certainly had as many troubles as the Irish farmer, and I cannot say that I think the Irish farmer, though we hear more of him, has more claims upon this House; and, therefore, I am anxious that when the case of farmers is considered that an equal claim should be put forward for all, and that one class of farmers should not be benefited at the expense of another. I understand that this Bill is not considered by hon. Gentlemen from Ireland as a very important measure, and I gather from the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading that he himself did not attach much importance to it. I also note from speeches delivered on the other side of the House that they considered there were considerable benefits to be derived from the Act which this Bill was designed to amend—the Land Purchase Act of 1891. I was very glad to hear that, because we have been in the habit of hearing quite another thing; but as these benefits are now admitted, I ask is it worth while that that Act should be interfered with by proposals which cannot certainly be considered fair to all the parties concerned? We have heard a good deal about the evicted tenants, but I question whether we have ever had a proposal made in this House which is so unfair as this one. How would a proposal of this kind act in England? How would an English farmer like it when he had been in possession, say, two or three years, to be all of a sudden turned out because a man who, by the machinery of the Plan of Campaign—the most dishonest machinery that was ever introduced between landlord and tenant—had been compelled to give up the farm, was now to be re-instated? There is nothing fair in that proposal, and the English farmers will see that proposals of this kind are nothing more than obstacles in the way of the legitimate grievances of the English farmers being dealt with. I do not wish to speak in any spirit but one of kindness to the Irish Members, whose constituents, doubtless, have grievances as ours have; but I say to them that if they bring forward proposals of this kind, which are not supported by any of the principles of justice or fair play, they not only damage themselves, but do an injustice indirectly to the English farmer. I think also that the powers conferred on mortgagees by this Bill are absurd. I am certain that they are unheard of in this country; but what guarantees have we that if this principle is adopted in Ireland it may not be brought over to England? Nothing is said in the Bill about the power of foreclosure, but the mortgagees can do anything he likes. I have every respect for the position of a mortgagee, but I would not give him such powers as are here conferred, and I am bound to ask if there is anything peculiarly exceptional with regard to the owning of land in Ireland that would make the conditions so different from what are laid down as to the conditions of owning land in England? It seems to me that some such procedure as the provision in the Land Purchase Act of 1891, relating to the insurance of the small holders who buy under that Act, is perfectly fair either in England or Ireland, because nothing is more precarious than the business of a farmer; and I think that, speaking of small farmers with farms of from 30 to 40 acres in extent, it is for the interest of the farmers as well as for the interest of the ordinary taxpayer—who I suppose has to provide the money—that a system of insurance should be set up. I see no grievance whatever in connection with that matter. My apology for interposing in an Irish Debate like this is that I take an interest in the subject. I do not think that the interests of the farmers, either in Ireland or in England, would be advanced by accepting a measure of this sort.

(4.48.) MR. J. E. REDMOND (Waterford): I think nobody could complain of the tone or spirit of the hon. Gentleman who has just addressed the House. I am one of those who regret very much that the opponents of this Bill on both sides of the House did not speak in an equally calm and moderate tone. I regretted very much to hear the bitterness which was imported into the Debate by some of the speakers, and I can assure the House that I will not lend myself to any attempt to import into a discussion on the subject of the evicted tenants in this House, or out of this House, any of the questions which for the last year have been dividing the different sections of Irish Nationalists amongst themselves. I only rose for the purpose of making it perfectly plain, although I scarcely think a word on the subject is necessary from me, that there is absolute unanimity amongst all shades of Nationalist Representatives in this House as to the necessity which we believe exists for some measure to give relief to these evicted tenants. The responsibility for these evicted tenants, I admit, to some extent, does rest upon the shoulders of the Nationalist Members. I am not at all inclined, for my part, to attempt to shift off my shoulders whatever share of that responsibility rests upon them. But, of course, the main responsibility for the existence of the evicted tenants rests upon the land system in Ireland, which for so long has been the cause of misery, and oppression, and eviction amongst the tenant farmers. At the same time, I admit that responsibility rests upon the leaders of Nationalist opinion in Ireland, who have placed themselves at the head of the tenants in the agitations which have taken place in that country. It must be perfectly plain, however, to every man, that there cannot be a settlement of the Irish Question, that there cannot be a restoration of peace and order, and contentment and goodwill in Ireland, except some means are found for restoring the bulk of these tenants to their homes. I believe that the gradual process of restoration which has been going on from one cause or another may continue, but that is a slow method and an uncertain one; and I believe it will be necessary for any English Government which tries to settle this Irish Question to deal with the question of the evicted tenants. Allusion has been made during this Debate to the state of the Front Opposition Benches, and it would be easy for me to take advantage of the deserted state of that Bench to found certain arguments thereon, but this much, at any rate, must be said: that so far as this Bill deals with the evicted tenants the Front Opposition Benches are pledged on this question without coming here at all, because my hon. Friend the Member for Roscommon introduced a Bill on the 2nd of this month of a more sweeping character for the evicted tenants than the one under discussion—a Bill which called in not only the aid of the Legislature for the purpose of assisting in the restoration of these tenants to their homes, but it actually proposed to take the planters by the neck and compulsorily put them out of the farms they had grabbed—that measure was supported in the Lobby by the full force of the Liberal Party and by all the Members of the Front Opposition Bench. So that for my part, so far as the question of the evicted tenants is concerned, I do not care very much—I am not very much concerned for the fact that the leaders of the Liberal Party are not here, because they are already pledged upon this question. So far as the remaining portion of the Bill is concerned—namely, that portion of the Bill which deals with the amendment of the Act of 1891, with the Insurance Clause, with the question of the particular kind of Stock and other subjects, I regret, I frankly say, that we have not had the assistance and advice of the right hon. Gentlemen upon the Front Opposition Bench; but I think their absence is probably natural, because I am one of those who recognise that the ultimate solution of this land question must be for them an exceedingly difficult matter. This land question was sought to be dealt with by them in a heroic spirit in 1886, but apparently the whole Liberal Party in the country revolted against the proposal to pledge British credit for the purpose of buying out the Irish landlords; and the policy of the leaders is plain. It is manifest on this subject they are not prepared to deal with this land question in a heroic manner—they are not prepared to propose a settlement of the land question based upon purchase; and I have not heard that they are prepared to settle the land question on any other lines. Therefore, they are in this position, they are without a policy at all. I do not object to that. I am one of those, I admit, who would be glad to see this land question settled concurrently with the Home Rule question, if possible. I cannot disguise from myself that if an Irish Parliament is created, to turn our attention immediately to a subject like this, which has kept classes apart for generations and centuries in Ireland, it will be very difficult indeed for us to succeed in achieving that without which we cannot succeed in the Government of Ireland at home—namely, the union of different classes in Ireland in a combined effort to promote the social, and commercial, and political prosperity of the country. Therefore, I should be glad if it were possible that this Parliament and the Liberal Party, in their wisdom, could see their way to deal themselves with this question, before or concurrently with the settlement of the Home Rule question. But if the Government Party which I hope will come into power after the next Election is not prepared to propose a policy of their own, and this matter must be relegated to an Irish Parliament, it cannot be left in its present position; it must be given to Irishmen in their own Parliament to settle this question in accordance with what their own judgment and conscience may seem to direct. I would urge upon the House that every day that passes with these tenants left out of their homes the difficulties of the Irish question must increase, the danger to the peace of Ireland must continue. The state of things in Ireland at the present moment may be deceptive to those unacquainted with the country; but it cannot be deceptive to the First Lord of the Treasury, who has boasted that he has restored order in Ireland. But he must know that order cannot be perfectly restored or put upon a satisfactory footing in Ireland so long as there are thousands and thousands of families out of their homes. It is nonsense, with great respect, for the hon. Member for South Tyrone to try to lead the House to believe that when we speak of the evicted tenants we mean the men who have two or three years' rent in their pockets, and who are able to pay their rent. There may be such men, but I am not aware of their existence. Of the evicted tenants there are 5,000 families at least altogether all over Ireland—some of them out of their homes since 1879—and there may be some tenants scattered here and there able to do what the hon. Member says has been done in one instance to his knowledge. But it is nonsense, and he knows it is nonsense, to allege of the vast majority of these 5,000 tenants that they are in a position to pay two years' or even one year's rent at the present moment. They are not; they are there out of their homes. The vast majority of the homes have not been taken by new tenants. The vast majority of these farms are idle; they are going to waste there, a scandal to the country side, a source of loss and a disgrace to the landlords. And I do think, whether the particular proposals before the House now are perfect or not, that for the sake of the credit of the country, for the sake of the peace of the country, all parties in this House ought to unite to devise some means whereby, justice being done to the landlords as well as the tenants, these men might be restored upon fair and equitable terms to their own homes.

*(5.0.) THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): I may perhaps be permitted to join in the regret expressed by the hon. Member for Waterford, who has just sat down, that we have not had the advantage to-day of the presence of Members on the Front Opposition Bench to hear what he had to say, and to be ready to answer some of the questions which he has put to them. It is true that on a recent occasion when a Bill of this description was before the House there were certain votes given in favour of that Bill; and in some respects that Bill even went beyond the Bill now before the House. I confess I heard the speech of the right hon. Member for Bridgeton on that occasion with much surprise, but the hon. Member for Waterford must not deceive himself by hugging to himself the belief that if the Party opposite comes into power after the General Election they will introduce measures similar to the present or the other Bill to which he has alluded. We have heard something about being in a position of greater freedom and less responsibility; but if right hon. Gentlemen on the other side were to get into a position of greater responsibility and less freedom, hon. Members would probably find that these right hon. Gentlemen will not follow up by legislation the promise of their votes. It is no doubt very desirable to encourage as far as possible the evicted tenants in coming to terms with their landlords. I am not sure that the introduction of a Bill of this kind will not tend, and has not tended, seriously to delay many settlements which would otherwise have been made. It is true that there are a good many of these farms lying derelict in Ireland; but it is true also that during the last year there has been a distinct movement in the direction of evicted tenants coming to terms with their landlords, and being restored to their holdings. It has been forcibly pointed out by the hon. Member for South Tyrone that a great deal of responsibility rests upon hon. Members in regard to evicted tenants. It should be borne in mind that a very large number of the evicted tenants cannot truthfully state that they were evicted because they were unable to pay unjust or excessive rent. It was open to all of them to go into Court and to demand that a judicial rent should be fixed. It has been avowed over and over again that a great many of these evictions were carried out in consequence of men trying to break down the law and to ruin the property which had been let to them. I am afraid the real truth is that the money which has been necessary, and which is necessary, to maintain their families, has for some time past been running short. The hon. Member for West Belfast attacked my hon. Friend the Member for Antrim for having used strong language and for having gone into matters which, he said, had no reference to this particular Bill. He hardly fulfilled the promise in his earlier sentences that he would proceed to discuss the provisions of the Bill in that calm and judicial manner which he desired to see in the hon. Member for Antrim. The hon. Member for West Belfast charged the hon. Member for Antrim with a desire that what he called the burden imposed upon the people of Ireland in relation to the tenants evicted under the Plan of Campaign should be borne in such a way as to diminish the Fund at the disposal of hon. Members opposite for election purposes when the day of election came. My hon. Friend might possibly have retorted that the object of bringing in this Bill is to give a promissory note in lieu of cash, in order to save that Fund for election purposes. The Bill is one, I think, which can hardly be accepted by this House. Reference has been made to the various clauses of the Bill, and attention has been directed to the fact that the Bill proposes to make a reduction in what is called the Purchasers' Insurance Fund. Now, it turns out that the Purchasers' Insurance Fund may operate in three ways. In the first place, it is unquestionable—although it seems to be rather doubted by some speakers—that it is a security to the State, because

to the extent that the purchaser pays a larger instalment in the first five years he reduces the balance due to the State, and to that extent the State is left in a better position at the end of the five years than it could be if there was no such Fund. It operates also in the direction of encouraging thrift on the part of the tenant purchaser. It may likewise operate in another way. It will be in the recollection of hon. Members that when this question was being discussed, the Government were warned of the responsibility they were accepting by putting themselves into the position of landlords who might have to evict their tenants. This Insurance Fund, to a certain extent, operates in the direction of enabling a tenant to call upon its resources in the event of bad seasons coming upon him, and so protecting him against the Government having to take measures for recovery by process of eviction. I think we cannot be too careful in preserving to the utmost extent all the securities that have been given by the Land Purchase Act to the British taxpayers and to the State, and also in preserving them in their several proportions. Now, Clause 2 has been referred to. It proposes to extend the time within which arrangements may be made and bargains entered into by the evicted tenants under Section 13 of the Land Purchase Act to the 1st January, 1894. Well, in my opinion—and I speak with great diffidence on the subject—to adopt a course of that sort at the present time is rather to delay than to promote the settlement between the evicted tenants and their landlords. This clause must be taken with other clauses of the Bill, which would practically prevent dealing with the land from which tenants have been evicted. There is another clause which seems to be a very innocent one, and which is described as a clause to prevent speculators from making a profit by the sale of the estates. I think it is a clause calculated—and I presume it is intended—to restrict competition on the part of outsiders, and to prevent anyone from competing with the evicted tenants. I do not think that a Bill of this kind is one which the Government can for a moment sanction. Something has been said about Section 5, and the hon. Member for West Belfast referred to some statements of mine on a former occasion with reference to the exchange of Land Stock for Consols. It is true that there is a restriction in the clause dealing with the subject which gives power to the Treasury to fix the limit within which that exchange may be made. I think that it is a perfectly reasonable power to give the Treasury, so as to protect it from being called upon to any unreasonable extent. But the position is this: The Treasury have, as a first step, authorised the National Debt Commissioners to give Consols in exchange for Land Stock to the extent of £5,000,000 a year. Now, I say that, in the present condition of things, and certainly with the number of applications already made, that that is practically giving a free hand for the exchange of all Land Stock that may be offered to them within a considerable period of time. The Treasury have distinctly stated that, whilst giving that authority for the exchange to the extent of £5,000,000 to the National Debt Commissioners, they will be prepared to give further authority should it be required. I think that I am justified in assuming that the exchange of Consols for Land Stock is unlimited for all practical purposes, and that landlords can have no doubt as to the certainty of getting Consols in exchange for Land Stock if they desire it.

MR. SEXTON: I accept that statement.

*MR. JACKSON: I am obliged to the hon. Member for so kindly accepting that. My own impression is that the Land Stock will be the more valuable of the two, and that there can be no doubt that for the purposes of investment it will be worth the higher price in the market. The other point is the question of the Exchequer contribution. The House is aware that under the Land Purchase Act the Exchequer contribution of £40,000 a year has to be handed over as part of the Reserve Fund for a period of five years, or until the Reserve Fund reaches the sum of £200,000. The argument used to justify the proposal that this sum shall be reduced is the argument that according to present experience it will be a long time before such a Reserve Fund could be justified by the number and the extent of the applications made under the Act. Sir, I decline altogether to accept that as being either a sound or a reasonable view. I hold strongly the opinion, and I think it is a reasonable opinion to take, that owing to many causes, partly to the fact of the non-issue of rules by the Treasury, partly owing to the fact that the Act was new and in some respects complicated, partly and largely from the fact that there was still a considerable balance under the Ashbourne Act—the transactions or applications under the new Act have been comparatively limited for the earlier months, but there is distinct evidence at present that there is a large movement under the new Purchase Act, and I believe it will go on at an accelerated pace within six months of the passing of so great a measure. It is altogether too early for this House to come to the decision that the applications under the new Act would not be sufficiently numerous and sufficiently important to justify the amount of the Reserve Fund. But, Sir, even if I were convinced that the operations under the Land Purchase Act would not be so numerous as I think they will be, I should still decline to be a party to tampering with or altering in any way the security that the Government and Parliament have pledged—the security upon which Parliament authorised the Government to lend £30,000,000. As a matter of principle and precedent it would be a fatal example if at this period of time we attempted in any degree or to any extent to tamper with that security. Now, Sir, there has been something said with respect to the cheapening of the conveyance and the simplifying of the procedure connected with the transfer of land. Well, Sir, I would point out to the House that there is this very important question that should be borne in mind. A Vesting Order under this Act gives to the person receiving that Vesting Order an indefeasible title, and it would be in my opinion a great mistake that the Land Commission, in dealing with property for which they are bound to give an indefeasible title, that they should slacken in any degree the necessity which they now recognise of a careful perusal of the titles, so as to avoid their accepting bad titles with regard to the property inspected, to which they are bound to give the purchaser indefeasible titles. Something has been said about placing mortgagees in the position of landlords. I would point out that the mortgagee has the power at present to go to the Court and to ask the Court to sanction a sale of the property, and I do not think it would be fair, either to the second mortgagee or to persons otherwise interested, to give that power without some investigation by the Court, and without giving an opportunity to those interested in the residue of the estate—I do not think it would be fair or just to give the powers proposed in this Bill to mortgagees, and, therefore, I do not think that that clause ought to be accepted. I would beg the House to consider how serious the position is of those who hold out false hopes to the evicted tenants. It is a great responsibility, and one which I would not venture on myself. There is a power at present enabling every landlord to deal with every evicted tenant if he chooses to do so. There is no difficulty if the two parties come to an agreement. At present all the landlords have to do is to agree with the tenant as to the terms on which he will be reinstated, and when the tenant is reinstated the Land Purchase Act comes into operation as regards those tenants. Sir, I say that this Bill if passed into law in the form in which it is drawn would give no more power to the evicted tenant to make terms with his landlord than he has at present; but if the Bill becomes law it will give the evicted tenant power to harass his landlord, and give to him and to those associated with him increased power of keeping derelict farms in a derelict condition, and will give increased powers to those who may desire to maintain boycotting and intimidation, and who have in a great many instances prevented a settlement being arrived at. I may go further and say that in a great many instances those evicted tenants were not evicted because they could not pay their rents, or even because they did not desire to pay their rents, but in a great many instances they were tenants who were evicted because they dare not pay in consequence of the intimidation which prevailed.

The House divided :—Ayes 144 ;
Noes 220.—(Div. List, No. 61.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

It being after half-past Five of the clock, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed to-morrow.

PILOTAGE PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.

Read the third time, and passed.

Mr. Jackson

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Fifth report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

MOTIONS.

CORONERS IN BOROUGHES BILL.

On Motion of Sir Albert Rollit, Bill to amend the Law in relation to the appointment of Coroners in Boroughs, ordered to be brought in by Sir Albert Rollit, Mr. Roe, Mr. Kimber, Mr. Chance, and Mr. Summers.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 245.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Will the Leader of the House be good enough to say what business is proposed to be taken to-morrow and on Friday?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): To-morrow, I may inform the hon. Member, the first three Bills on the Orders of the Day will relate to Scotland—first, the Scotch Equivalent Grant; second, the Roads and Bridges Act Amendment Bill; and, third, the Burgh Police and Health Bill. On Friday morning Supply will be taken—probably Civil Service Estimates; but of that I shall be able to speak more definitely to-morrow.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when the Ordnance Vote will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: As the hon. Member knows, the Vote was nearly finished the other night when the Committee adjourned. I will put it down for Friday, in the hope that it will be reached then.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Can the right hon. Gentleman say when it is proposed the House shall adjourn for the Easter Recess?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: There is a good deal of business to be got through first. Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to defer an answer to that question.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Has the Scotch Burgh Police Bill been distributed?

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): It has been, or it will be.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 31st March, 1892.

SAT FIRST.

The Lord Methuen, after the death of his father.

CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES.

Moved, "That the Lord Foxford (E. Limerick) do take the Chair in Committees of the Whole House this day in the absence of the Earl of Morley."—(The Lord President [V. Cranbrook.] Motion agreed to.

SMOKE NUISANCE METROPOLIS
BILL—[H.L.]
COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

VISCOUNT MIDLETON: My Lords, after the observations which fell from my noble Friend the Prime Minister upon the last occasion when this Bill was before your Lordships' House, I should like to say a few words before your Lordships go into the Committee stage of the Bill. My Lords, I am afraid that the Committee which my noble Friend was kind enough to promise to support is not likely ever to come into existence. It was not the inquiry which I ventured to suggest to your Lordships or which I hoped to obtain; but I have done my best to adopt the suggestion of my noble Friend and to get such a Committee together. I find however, my Lords, that I am met at the outset by the very serious objection that your Lordships did appoint a Committee not above four years ago to inquire into a kindred subject, if not the exact subject with which I proposed to deal: that that Committee has reported after a great deal of valuable evidence, all of which I have read very carefully, was taken; and that the outcome of the deliberations of that Committee is the Bill of which my noble Friend opposite (Lord Stratheden and Campbell) has taken charge. That, my Lords, is a very fair objection to make to your Lordships being asked to go over the same ground again with very little difference. But another objection which is even more fatal is that since that Committee sat the whole subject has been, I think most unwisely, delegated to the London County Council. Now my experience of the London County Council in the past (and I very much fear it will be the same in the future) is that it is engaged in discussions as it seems to me very unprofitably on many subjects with which the Legislature has not empowered it to deal, and that it entirely neglects a great many of those subjects with which the Legislature has especially entrusted it. The London County Council is very largely represented in this House. I have a strong impression that if a crucial Division were ever challenged by the Opposition, they would draw at least one-sixth of their support from the ranks of the London County Council. However that may be, the opinion of the London County Council, or of those members of it in this House, was distinctly challenged by the Prime Minister when I first mentioned this subject, and no member of the London County Council has risen in his place to say whether they have taken any account of this matter, or propose to do so,—the oracle has been dumb, and I must suppose that at present, at all events, other subjects occupy the minds of members of the London County Council, and that they do not intend to turn their attention to this subject. Then, my Lords, there comes the question of the Bill now before your Lordships. I confess I object to it in one sense, because I believe that since the Committee sat over which my noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Westminster) presided, further light has been thrown by science upon many of the points which were suggested before that Committee; and that we might have been able, either through a Royal Commission or through a Committee of the two Houses of Parliament, to throw more light on the subject than we have got now. Another objection which I have to the Bill is that I am not perfectly certain that the machinery provided by the Bill will work smoothly. But, my Lords, as I have no better plan to propose myself, or, at all events that I can give effect to, I feel that half a loaf is better than no bread, and I shall certainly give my humble support to the measure of my noble Friend, hoping that in some shape or another it may shame, either the London County Council or the Local Authorities, to take some effective action in the matter which is their special province and with which it is their duty to grapple.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, in moving that the House go into Committee I should not add a single word but for some peculiar circumstances which have recently arisen, and to which the noble Viscount in his statement has referred. Her Majesty's Government leaned to the opinion some weeks ago that there ought to be a fresh inquiry under the auspices of the noble Viscount, but, as he has ingenuously explained to us, he has not felt disposed to give any notice for the appointment of a Committee. He is fully justified in so repudiating his intention because Her Majesty's Government discouraged the two methods of inquiry that he proposed, and suggested one which it would not be easy for him to initiate. My Lords, I make no reflection of any kind either on the noble Viscount or upon Her Majesty's Government. I wish only to deprecate obstruction to the measure. The noble Viscount, as he has himself declared to-night, and on previous occasions, is an enthusiast for the object of the measure. The noble Marquess, the First Minister, and his friends long ago supported it in a critical Division by which for the first time its principle was ratified. Since then a Select Committee of the House has examined amended and indorsed it, and the shape which it now assumes approximates as far as possible to that which the Select Committee had so authorised. The actual clauses, as the Bill now stands, have been sifted by a distinguished barrister and well known draftsman, who has this year for the first time, assisted me in framing it. There is only one further point that I wish to mention. The London Public Health Act of last Session gives the Bill a more impregnable foundation than it would otherwise possess; for that Act, which is the entire emanation of Her Majesty's Government, adopted Vestries as the agency for sanitary purposes like the Bill before us, and also designates the Local Government Board as the machinery for supervising Vestries in the way that this Bill has done. Indeed, my Lords, I may add—and it ought I think to be a conclusive vindication of the Bill, and to smooth the way to all its clauses passing—that there is not a single one that may not be defended, either as to authority or analogy, by reference to the London Public Health Act, 1891. Should the Bill pass this stage, it may reach the House of Commons before Easter, and there, I perfectly admit, some new inquiry in the shape of a Select Committee may be possibly legitimate; but, as the noble Viscount has explained to us this evening, here there is not any scope for it. We have, as he has candidly admitted, sufficient evidence before us to show that domestic smoke and industrial smoke must both be combated together, in order that London may reach at least as much daylight as other capitals enjoy, the point to which the framers of the measure had confined their aspirations. I will not detain your Lordships, as there are some clauses to go through, although I trust it may not be necessary to defend them. I now move that the House go into Committee.

Moved, "That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill."—(The Lord Stratheden and Campbell.)

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): My Lords, in not opposing this Motion I trust I shall not be supposed to subscribe to the remedies the noble Lord proposes; but, as everybody agrees that the evil is a very great one, I think perhaps it would be an extreme measure to refuse the Motion of the noble Lord to go into Committee. What the fate of his Bill will be in the Standing Committee I will not venture to prophesy.

Motion agreed to; House in Committee accordingly.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: There is no doubt that this is an extensive power committed to the Sanitary Authority, and I would invite the attention of the Chairman of the Standing Committee to it, because I am going to submit that perhaps the best way of dealing with it will be to send the Bill to the Standing Committee, to see what their view of it is, before we deal with it in the House.

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I quite feel with the noble Marquess that the matter can be best dealt with in the Standing Committee; but I would call the attention of the noble Lord in charge of the Bill to this: that on the last occasion when a Bill of this kind was before the Standing Committee they spent two Sittings upon it, and put it into shape, upon which the noble Lord abandoned the Bill, and it went no further. That of course is not very encouraging to the Standing Committee to take trouble on another occasion with a Bill if that is to be its fate.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: Perhaps I ought to remark in reference to this clause, first, that it may be entirely defended by referring to Section 24 of the London Public Health Act of last Session, extending it only so far as to include the smoke of private dwellings. With reference to a remark which fell from the noble and learned Lord, I have already in a previous Session thoroughly explained my view of what occurred before the Standing Committee to which he alludes. I regret that any reiteration of the subject should be forced upon me. The circumstances were, briefly, that the Standing Committee, misapprehending their position, as I hold, eliminated all the clauses bearing upon domestic smoke, and thus entirely reversed the decision at which the House had previously arrived upon the Second Reading. But I need not dwell further upon that subject, which might lead to acrimonious contention. The wish of the noble Marquess that the Bill should be referred to the Standing Committee is not a wish with which I can at all sympathise; but the question before your Lordships now is merely whether Clause 4 should be adopted,—Clause 4 being the essence of the Bill, viz.: that bye-laws shall be within the power of Vestries to arrange. And I would here remind the House that the alternative suggested is between the Vestries and the London County Council. If the House concurs with, or participates at all in, the strong impression as to the deficiencies of the London County Council that we have heard to-night from the noble Viscount, your Lordships will agree with me (although I pass no judgment on the London County Council) that on the whole it is more desirable to entrust the authority to Vestries, as you have done, by the Public Health Act, 1891, than to any other imaginable power.

Clause 8.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Viscount Cross): I think, my Lords, Clause 8 ought not to be allowed to pass, even at this stage of the House, in its present form. It seems to be a very strong measure, to give this enormous power to the London County Council. I hope the noble Lord will be content to leave this clause out at the present stage, and to bring it up before the Standing Committee at some future stage. I cannot think that this House will pass this clause in its present form at this stage of the Bill; therefore I shall move the rejection of the clause.

Moved: That Clause 8 do not stand part of the Bill.—(Viscount Cross.)

THE DUKE OF WESTMINSTER: This clause, my Lords, is of course a permissive clause; it gives permission to the London County Council to do this, that and the other; and the object and reason of putting it in is perhaps to stimulate invention. Now inventions are being made every day; people are trying, in every way they can, to devise and invent some simple remedy for consuming smoke in domestic grates, and in some cases that has already been done. As it is a permissive clause to the London County Council I hope it may be allowed to stand. I do not think their action will be of a very despotic nature.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: If it was permissible with the householders I should appreciate the argument of the noble Lord more; but if it is permissible on the part of the London County Council to put what fire place they like into my house for the purpose of stimulating invention, my experience may be exceedingly various and disagreeable. We shall have people in the street meeting each other and saying that they are unable to get their dinner or to live in their houses because their chimneys smoke. "What is the difficulty with you?" "Oh! the London County Council is stimulating the invention of Captain A. in my house," or "Oh! the London County Council is stimulating the invention of Mr. B. in my house," and so on. I am afraid with that strong sympathy with intellectual experiments that the London County Council has shewn, we may be in a very terrible condition with the various grates which in various parts of London we shall use. The noble Lord of course has other sympathies with London property than those which are experienced in the use of a grate; and I daresay he does not feel so keenly as the ordinary householder will feel if he is handed over to the London County Council in this summary way by your Lordships' House. I would urge therefore that the clause, at all events, be struck out now. If the Standing Committee can think of any other way of introducing a reformed kind of grate, with due consideration for the liberty of the subject, I will not offer any objection.

*THE EARL OF SELBORNE: My Lords, I cannot help observing that this clause as it stands is anything but permissive. The only thing it permits is that the London County Council may make bye laws. When made, those bye laws will be absolutely compulsory. And there seems to be an inconsistency between such a clause and the proviso at the end of Clause 4 which your Lordships have passed, that they may not go into any dwelling to see whether the bye laws are complied with or not. How you can observe from the outside whether a particular form of grate is in a fire place or not I do not know.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I am a great advocate of the Standing Committee; but the questions raised under this Bill are really hardly questions for the Standing Committee to deal with. They are questions of policy and questions of knowledge of what can be done, and, without any evidence on the subject and more information than we possess, which I am sorry to hear we are not likely to get in the form of a Committee, I am rather at a loss to know how the Standing Committee can effectually deal with such a Bill as this. We can practically destroy the Bill by omitting all the stringent provisions in it; but that will not be a very satisfactory operation; and I do not think anyone has yet suggested a practicable means by which the thing can be done. If anyone can suggest such practicable means I suppose there is no noble Lord in this House who would not be eager to adopt and facilitate the passing of the Bill. But in our present state of knowledge on the subject I think we should be exceedingly ill-advised if we get into the Standing Committee.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I must apologise to your Lordships for speaking again; but I want to explain why I think the whole Bill should go to the Standing Committee. This clause, at all events, I think we had better reject; but, apart from this clause, the Bill is wholly a Bill directed against black smoke: and I should be very glad that the Courts should exercise their ingenuity upon a discovery of what black smoke is. But I do not believe that there would be much interference with the ordinary householder who emits grey smoke and not black; and those powerful manufactories that drive black smoke into the London air may I think be fairly required to consume their own smoke.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I have not looked recently into the matter; but I thought that manufactories and steamers were dealt with by an Act already existing; but that is not what my noble Friend behind me aims at. I do not say it is not a proper subject to be considered. What the noble Lord aims at is the black smoke that comes out of large institutions like clubs and large hotels.

*LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: My Lords, although I hope to be able to concur with the view of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, I should wish the House to be under no misapprehension as to this clause. It relates merely to future constructions; it will give no right by any bye laws to the London County Council to enter an existing domicile. It is merely to give them supervision over houses in the course of being erected: and that is the answer to the charge of inconsistency suggested by the noble and learned Lord (Lord Selborne). I wish merely to explain to your Lordships that this clause originated in one by which it was proposed to give a power of that sort to the Metropolitan Board of Works. During the existence of that Body it was thought that they might, without much hazard, exercise a function of this sort upon buildings in course of construction, and, when the Metropolitan Board of Works wholly disappeared, the power was merely transferred to the London County Council, which I think was originally created, not for some of the great purposes it aims at, but simply to replace the vacancy caused by the disappearance of the Metropolitan Board of Works. I concur entirely with and accept the language of the noble Duke; but in spite of doing so, as I certainly never held that this clause was essential to the purpose of the Bill, which is to restrain the smoke of actual houses, I will not venture to divide the House against the conclusions of Her Majesty's Government upon it.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 8 negatived.

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTIONS BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, the object of this Bill is to facilitate the acquisition of sites for institutions which are now commonly known as Polytechnics, by enabling limited owners to convey settled land for the purpose, either by way of sale or free gift. My Lords, I think I can best explain the character of the measure, and the necessity for legislation on the subject, by referring very briefly to the circumstance which has given rise to the introduction of this Bill. A Member of this House is desirous of giving an acre and a quarter of land at Clerkenwell, held under a settlement, for the purpose of founding an institution to be attached to, and form part of, a larger institution known as the City Polytechnic, for which the Charity Commissioners have already settled a scheme. It has been found impossible to carry out the generous intentions of the donor, either under the powers of the settlement under which the land is held, or under any existing Act of Parliament. As regards the defect in the powers of the settlement, I do not think that is to be wondered at. Settlements of large estates in London very commonly contain powers enabling limited owners to give plots of land for public purposes, or quasi-public purposes; but Polytechnics are institutions of such modern growth that they have not found their way into settlements, at least to any large extent. The same observation applies to legislation. There has been no legislation upon the subject of late years. The only Act that touches the question is the Literary and Scientific Institutions Act, 1854, which was passed nearly 40 years ago; but it has been found impossible to proceed under that Act. In the first place the purposes to which that Act are directed are not sufficiently extensive,—and it will be sufficient for me to say that they do not include technical training; in the next place the area is too small,—it is only an acre, and, although it is nearly large enough, I am told it is not quite large enough for all the purposes which are comprehended in a Polytechnic institution; and, lastly, that Act contains a clause of reverter, providing that, where land has been acquired by gift, in case the land should not be used for the purpose for which it shall be given it shall revert to the donor or his representatives. That clause of course would prevent public money from being spent in the erection of buildings upon the site, and it also would prevent the large London Companies, who take a great interest in this movement, from giving sums of money for the purpose. Under those circumstances it became a question whether an application should be made to your Lordships by way of a Private or a Public Bill; and those interested in the movement have thought fit to take the latter course, relying on the deep interest which your Lordships always take in the welfare of the poorer classes, and in anything that tends to make their lives happier and brighter. My Lords, I trust you will give a favourable consideration to the Bill; it is an extremely simple Bill. In the first place it defines those objects which are usually comprehended in a Polytechnic; then it provides for the Governing Body; and then it incorporates those clauses of the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act which are not compulsory. The area with which the Bill deals is two acres, and the Bill from first to last is wholly a permissive measure. With these remarks I move that the Bill be now read a second time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Macnaghten.)

LORD THRING: My Lords, I certainly approve of the object of the Bill, and I have no doubt that the noble Lord has brought it in with the best possible intentions; but I submit to your Lordships that it would require most careful revision in Committee. There is one clause which I must give notice to the noble Lord that I shall move to have struck out,—that is, the clause that enables the lord of the manor, as I read it, to give away either waste land or commonable land, thereby destroying and extinguishing the rights of the commoners. I cannot conceive that such a clause is in the slightest degree necessary for the objects of the Bill; and it is really one of the most unjust clauses that I can imagine. The Bill uses the term "commonable or waste lands"—what will be the effect? There are waste lands by the sides of the roads, on the borders of commons, which add extremely to the amenity of the common or road; yet these are to be given up by the lord of the manor, who really has no pecuniary interest in them at all. And then, my Lords, imagine what will be the case in villages! This clause will enable the lord of the manor to give up the village green, and to have a swimming bath or a gymnasium erected; for the terms defining what is meant by an "institution" are so wide, that they include almost every description of building connected with trade or science. Surely the noble Lord does not intend to give such a power? And then again, with regard to two acres, there is no limit whatever. Conceive what it is! An old man like myself has property in London; I can give away at my age, to the detriment of my successor, two acres of land in London, worth a vast amount, for the purposes of a Polytechnic! Surely, my Lords, there ought to be some restriction upon so large a measure as this. I fully admit that the intentions of the noble Lord are extremely good; but I submit to him that this Bill will require very great revision, and I trust he will allow the clause with respect to commonable land and waste lands to be struck out.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Before the noble Lord answers, might I ask a question for better understanding exactly the effect of the Bill? I see that it incorporates the Lands Clauses Consolidation Act; but I see that in the Act of 1854 (I am expressing no opinion upon the policy of that Act) the rights of the remainderman are absolutely guarded; because the words are in the first clause: that no such grant shall be made by any person seised, only for life of and in any such manor or lands, unless if there be any person next entitled to the same in remainder, in fee simple, or fee tail, and if such person be legally competent, he shall be a party to and join in such grant. I merely wish to know whether the effect of this Bill will be to remove that condition. If it does remove that condition, it is an enactment as compared with that of 1854 that is entirely novel. If it contains the same condition the precedent of the Act of 1854 is followed. But I should like to know what is the intention of the Bill.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: In that respect I think the Bill does go considerably beyond the Act of 1854; but it has become more and more the practice now to consider the tenant for life as in point of fact representing the whole inheritance. Of course the subject will be for your Lordships' consideration in Committee. But with regard to the matter to which my noble Friend (Lord Thring) referred, I may say that that very clause to which he has taken so much objection is to be found in the Act of 1854. At the same time, I do not know that it is by any means a necessary provision of the Bill; and I should be very glad to omit it.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Perhaps I may be allowed, as I only asked for information before, to make some observation now upon the subject. No one can be more desirous than I am to relax in any reasonable way the fetters which entail presses upon life owners and settlement; wherever it is necessary there should be full power to part with land for a consideration, I am, as much as any man, in favour of relaxing those fetters, and enabling land to be dealt with in the same way as it might be dealt with by an owner in fee. But it certainly becomes a very different thing indeed when you are going to allow an owner for life, who may be only owner of a certain portion of what I will call the value of the estate, to give away a large portion of that value without consideration, because in that way he is dealing with property that is not his own. If he sells a portion of the property on grounds of public policy, I think he might rightly disregard the wishes of the remainderman, that is to say, that the remainderman, because he wishes the property to be preserved in a particular form should not be allowed to stand in the way of that property being used for some public purpose, due compensation being given, as in an ordinary case of an owner of a fee simple, for the value of that property, and that property being thereby preserved for the person entitled to it. But it is a very different thing indeed to allow the owner of what is only a particular portion of the value of the property to give away a considerable portion of it which belongs to another man. This is not a slight matter, my Lords, because four acres (and this Bill provides that as much as four acres in any one city may be given away) may represent property of very great value indeed, and it might easily happen that the owner of the life estate might be on bad terms with the remainderman and might think it a very nice way indeed of, in fact, defrauding the remainderman of all his property. Four acres might in a town like this represent £40,000 or £60,000, or a great deal more; in an ordinary town it would represent very nearly £10,000; it may be in point of fact the whole of the remainderman's property. But supposing the owner of the life estate wishes to deprive the remainderman of his property, he has only got to make a present of four acres to some institution: And the institutions which are included in the Bill are also so numerous that he would have no difficulty in giving an acre here, an acre there, and two acres in another place until the whole of the property was exhausted. As I have said, I do not in the least desire that the rights of property should stand in the way of property being used for public purposes; but I think it is necessary to pause before we give such very extensive powers as this Bill proposes. Might I add one single word to say that I am very glad that the noble Lord is ready to make a concession about commons. It is true that there is such a clause in the Act of 1854 as the clause in this Bill; but since 1854 the public feeling with regard to commons has entirely changed; what in 1854 would have been thought a most harmless clause would now be thought by the public a most injurious clause; therefore I am very glad that clause is to be omitted.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, I quite admit the force of what my noble Friend has just now said. And with regard to the other criticisms, with which I sympathise to a great extent, I think there would be no great difficulty in introducing some provision that would guard against the powers of the Act being improperly used to the detriment of the remainderman.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

EASTBOURNE IMPROVEMENT ACT,
1885, AMENDMENT BILL.

*(3.8.) ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I do not want to take up the time of the House unnecessarily, neither do I wish to move an unnecessary Instruction—

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I rise to order, Sir. I understand this is an opposed Motion, and if so should it not be put off?

*ADMIRAL FIELD: It came on last Thursday.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: It was fixed last Thursday, by Order, for to-day.

*ADMIRAL FIELD: If I get a definite assurance that this Instruction is not required I will not proceed. I have done my best to ascertain from the authorities of the House a definite opinion, but I have found differences of opinion. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) tells me in consultation that he thinks the Instruction unnecessary; but, Sir, I make bold to say that we cannot act on thought or supposition in these matters; we must have a definite statement that the Instruction is necessary or it is not if the Committee are to direct their inquiry to this point. Now, I think it will be seen that this House, having read the Bill a second time by a large majority, referred it to a Special Committee. The Bill proposes to repeal a clause giving the Eastbourne Authorities power to prohibit bands and Sunday processions. If that clause is repealed something must be inserted in order to regulate these processions if they are to be allowed—as to when they shall take place, when the bands shall play, and for what duration of time. Of course, I am aware that it has been said that the Municipal Corporations Act gives ample powers to frame bye-laws; but the Eastbourne Authorities have already framed bye-laws, and they have been disapproved. It appears to me that some Instruction is necessary. I have consulted with the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. H. H. Fowler), and he made a suggestion which I want to embody in an Instruction, not the words as they stand on the Paper, but simply these:—

“That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Bill is referred that they have power to inquire and report whether any further or other special provision with respect to processions on Sunday in Eastbourne should be inserted in the Bill.”

Now, if the instruction is not necessary, I do not want to move it; but, at all events, it can do no harm, it only suggests inquiry. If the Committee say nothing more is required, then there is an end of it; but if they find that something more is required, then they have power under the Instruction to insert a clause. All I ask is that it shall be placed beyond doubt that the Committee have the power, and that I think is a very modest request. The right hon. Gentleman has a giant's strength. I ask him to use it with some consideration. He has an enormous majority in numbers, though the strength of logic is on our side, and I think he can afford to use his strength with a little mercy and consideration towards the feelings of other people. We desire nothing extreme; we only ask that the Committee may, if they think fit, give some power of control over these processions in the Bill.

MR. H. H. FOWLER: Does the hon. and gallant Gentleman strike out the last words?

*ADMIRAL FIELD: Yes. I substitute the words I have read. I meet the right hon. Gentleman's views; he sugrested the words after provision "with respect to processions on Sunday in Eastbourne." If the right hon. Gentleman accepts this, he will save a lot of trouble and another Division, for I shall be forced to divide. The Instruction can do no possible harm, while it will resolve a doubt which the right hon. Gentleman admits does exist, whether the Committee will consider this within the scope of their inquiry. With all his Parliamentary experience and his honourable position as Privy Councillor, the right hon. Gentleman can only say he thinks the Committee will have the power, but I say we cannot act upon that thought. I applied to the Chairman of Committees, and he could not give me a definite, positive, downright answer, and I have had a consultation with you, Sir, to which I have no right to refer. I once more appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to accept the instruction which I now move in the amended form.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee to whom the Bill is referred that they have power to inquire and report whether any further or other special provision with respect to processions on Sunday in Eastbourne should be inserted in the Bill."

(3.13.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): This is practically a question of form; it has nothing to do with the right, or what the hon. and gallant Gentleman calls the strength, of a majority. We want the Bill to go to the Committee to be dealt with in the regular and usual manner. Of course, when I came here to-day I had simply to deal with the Instruction in the Paper by which the Committee were to "secure the peaceful observance of Sunday in Eastbourne," and that instruction I should have offered the most decided opposition; for if the Committee were to be set the task of inquiring how the Sunday should be observed in Eastbourne, that would mean a very protracted, and however interesting, a profitless inquiry. Now, the simple question is whether the instruction is necessary or not. I perfectly agree with my hon. and gallant friend that it will be the duty of the Committee to go into the question of Sunday processions in Eastbourne, for that is the object of putting in the Bill before them the repeal of the clause by which processions on Sunday in Eastbourne are prohibited. Therefore, it appears to me, unless a higher authority tells me it is not so, that it is the absolute duty of the Committee to consider the whole question of procession on Sunday in Eastbourne. There is no difference of opinion between us, and I say that what my hon. and gallant Friend wants is already referred to the Committee as a matter of Parliamentary procedure. I am very much of the opinion expressed by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. Chamberlain) last week in reference to the multiplication of Instructions to a Committee where they already have the power. It is getting in an indirect way the expression of an opinion from the House on a matter before the inquiry is held. I wish to keep nothing from the Committee. I believe my hon. and gallant Friend and myself are Members of the Committee, and we are anxious that the inquiry shall be as full and complete as possible. I am perfectly willing to be guided by the Chairman of Ways and Means. If he says the Committee without it cannot entertain this question, then I will most reluctantly consent to the Instruction. But if he says it is unnecessary, and that all my hon. and gallant Friend desires can be obtained without it, then I hope he will not put the House to the trouble of dividing.

(3.20.) THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall Bodmin): After the appeal made to me I am bound to say a word, although my authority has been overrated. I cannot control the Committee; I can only express an opinion as to what the Committee ought to do. The Committee is charged not only with the duty of deciding upon the Bill as it stands, and whether the Preamble is proved, but with inquiry into clauses. They are charged with the greater question: whether the present power in the Local Authority should be preserved, and if charged with that greater question surely they are charged with the lesser question whether the power should be preserved under limited conditions. I am clearly of opinion that the Instruction is not necessary, because it is within the power of the Committee to do what the hon. and gallant Gentleman desires they should do.

*(3.21.) MR. J. G. TALBOT (Oxford University): But I would ask, what can be the harm of sending the Instruction? This, remember, is not a Private Bill of an ordinary kind; it is a Bill to repeal a single clause, and I can quite understand the Chairman of a Committee ruling that the Committee have no right to go into extraneous matter. It might be urged that the Committee had no power to go into other matters, such as whether the bands should be allowed to play in some streets and not in others, which, I believe, is the present state of things in Brighton—a parallel case to Eastbourne. I can quite imagine that with such a peculiar Bill as this is the Committee might so strictly interpret its duty that the matters my hon. and gallant Friend wishes to introduce might be excluded from consideration. I cannot quite understand the right hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Fowler's) objection. He says it can be done without an Instruction. My hon. and gallant Friend doubts that, and I understand he has appealed to the highest authority in the House, and the highest authority stated—I am not violating any confidence—that it is, at least, a doubtful matter. Well, if that is so, why not agree to the Instruction? I do not wish to make any unpleasant suggestion, but it looks as if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. H. Fowler) is afraid of what might be done under the Instruction. I shall certainly support what I consider a most reasonable Instruction.

*(3.25.) MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): The Chairman of Committees has stated with authority the general practice, but this Bill appears to me to present a very special case. In general it is the duty of a Committee to go into the whole question to find if the Preamble of a Bill is proved, and, à fortiori, they may go into minor questions and say if other provisions should be introduced. But the present Bill is one of a very peculiar nature. It is to repeal a clause in a Private Bill, and, looking at the very large majority by which the Second Reading was carried, no Committee would feel itself entitled to do anything at all approaching to a reversal of the decision of the House. I think, therefore, that Members of the Committee would feel some difficulty as to whether they were really at liberty to consider an alternative provision against noisy processions. They may remember what the Home Secretary has said as to the sufficiency of the ordinary law. Yet, looking at all that has happened—the amount of public opinion excited and canvassed, looking at the Public Petitions presented, and I may mention one from the Town Council of Perth, in favour of some means being given to the Corporation to maintain quietude on Sunday—I think Members will feel—even those who voted for the Second Reading of the Bill—that it is desirable that the Committee should go into this question. The only doubt is whether they can do so without an Instruction, and, that being so, the right hon. Gentleman might, after the concession made in the form of the Instruction, agree that it shall be sent to the Committee.

*(3.27.) MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): As one of those having the doubtful distinction of being a Member of this Committee, I should like to have some definite Instruction. If we prove the Preamble we simply pass the clause; and if we do not prove the Preamble, we upset the decision of the House expressed by an overwhelming majority. It therefore seems to me it is an exceptional case, remembering also that this has not been treated as an ordinary Private Bill, but has been referred to a Hybrid Committee for special consideration. Since, therefore, there is this doubt it should be set at rest by some such reasonable compromise as is presented by the Instruction in its amended form.

(3.27.) ADMIRAL FIELD: Perhaps, Sir, by the indulgence of the House, I may be allowed to appeal to you to settle the matter. The whole thing is in a nutshell. May I ask you to express your opinion upon it?

*MR. SPEAKER: With unqualified respect for the opinion expressed by an authority in the House, I think, after hearing the doubts expressed on both sides of the House, it will be far better to send the Instruction to the Committee.

The Bill repeals a clause in the Eastbourne Act in reference to processions on Sundays; and if the Committee or Chairman have any doubt as to whether their power extends to making any regulation on the subject for the peace of the borough, I think it would be far better that there should be an expression of the opinion of the House that they have that power to inquire into the question. It is not a mandatory Instruction; it is only a declaration that the Committee have the power, and, under the circumstances, I think it is expedient that the Instruction should be given.

(3.28.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: After that expression of opinion, Sir, I do not hesitate to say I do not feel justified in opposing the Instruction.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to the Committee on the Eastbourne Improvement Act, 1885, Amendment Bill, that they have power to inquire and report whether any further or other special provision with respect to Processions on Sunday in Eastbourne should be inserted in the Bill. —(Admiral Field.)

LOCAL AUTHORITIES AND TRAMWAYS —STANDING ORDER.

(3.29.) THE CHAIRMAN OF WORKS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): The proposition I have to submit to the House deals with a matter of some importance, and it is well that I should state its object and effect; after which the Debate can be adjourned if desired. Under the Tramways Act of 1870 there are, as is well-known, ample powers given to Local Authorities to take over tramways after they have been in operation 21 years. But that power is accompanied by the provision that no Local Authority shall place carriages on such tramways or demand the payment of rates and tolls for the use of such. Although there is no express prohibition, we may conclude, from the words of the Statute, that it expresses the mind of Parliament that Local Authorities shall not work tramways. Standing Order 171 goes further, and prohibits powers enabling a Municipal or other Local Authority to work any tramway. Now, several Authorities have come to the House this Session with a desire to make and work tramways, and the House will remember we discussed the question of such a tramway on Westminster Bridge. But it was said by the representatives of the London County Council that the Council had no intention of working the tramway; but they felt it necessary to ask for the power in order that they might be in a position to make a proper bargain with the Company to whom they proposed to lease the tramway. I believe the other Authorities applying for powers are of the same mind. They do not wish to work tramways, except in far as may be necessary to enable them to bargain freely with Tramway Companies. It has been represented that without such power the Local Authority would be at a disadvantage in negotiations with the Tramway Company, for the latter might say, "Unless you agree to our terms your capital invested in the tramway will remain unproductive, for you cannot work the line, and it cannot be used at all." Corporations, therefore, have urged that there should be power, at all events, for the Local Authority to say they will work the tramway themselves, failing to come to reasonable terms with any Company that they may keep the latter at arm's length, so to speak, in carrying on negotiations. I therefore propose to the House that the Standing Order which prohibits the working of tramway by a Local Authority shall be amended, so that a tramway may provisionally be worked by such Authority, adding, however, a provision—

"That if at any time during such working by the Local Authority any company make the Local Authority a tender in writing to take a lease of and to work the tramways for such period (not being less than seven years unless the Local Authority shall otherwise agree) at such rent and upon such terms and conditions as shall in the opinion of the Board of Trade be adequate and proper,"

then the working of the line by the Corporation shall cease. This will release Local Authorities from all difficulty they find themselves in from the present restrictions, and enable them to conduct a free and open bargain.

Standing Order 171 read and amended by adding at the end thereof the words:—

"Provided that where any tramways have been constructed or acquired, or are authorised by the Bill to be constructed or acquired by the local authority, the Committee on the Bill may, if they think fit, under the special circumstances of the case insert a clause to the following effect:—

If the local authority are unable to demise the tramways upon such terms as in the opinion of the Board of Trade will yield to the local authority an adequate rent therefor, the Board of Trade may grant a licence to the local authority to work such tramways, and the local authority may thereupon work the same, and may provide such plant, materials, and things as may be requisite or convenient therefor; and in such case all enactments relating to the working of the tramways and the taking of tolls and charges therefor shall extend and apply mutatis mutandis to, and in relation to, the local authority: Provided that if at any time during such working by the local authority any company make to the local authority a tender in writing to take a lease of and to work the tramways for such period (not being less than seven years, unless the local authority shall otherwise agree) at such rent and upon such terms and conditions as shall in the opinion of the Board of Trade be adequate and proper, and such company at the same time offer to purchase the horses, cars, engines, and fixed and movable plant of the local authority not included in such lease, at a price to be fixed, unless otherwise agreed on between such company and the local authority, by a competent valuer, to be appointed by the Board of Trade; then upon payment of such price, the local authority shall demise the tramways to such company at such rent and upon such terms and conditions, and the powers of the local authority to work the tramways shall cease and determine.

And the Committee shall report the circumstances specially to the House."—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

BILLS FOR INCORPORATED RAILWAY COMPANIES.

(3.35.) Mr. COURTNEY: My next proposal deals with a very different matter. Under the existing Standing Order 166A, every Committee to which a Railway Bill is submitted is required to incorporate with the Bill a clause providing that the rates and charges shall be subject to the Railway and Canal Traffic Act, 1888. Now, as is well known, these rates and charges have been subjected to much examination and revision during the last two years. The rates for several leading companies have been thus revised, and it has been thought it will be more convenient if the Committee, instead of adopting the clause under this Standing Order, adopt the rates and charges scheduled for the principal railway in the area into which the promoters intend to carry their new line. It will be observed that this is proposed experimentally for the Session, and the Committee will depart from the Standing Order 166A only when they think fit to do so.

Ordered, That it be an Instruction to Committees on Bills of the present Session for Incorporating Railway Companies, that they be at liberty, if they think fit, to omit the Clause required by Standing Order 166A in any case where they shall be of opinion that rates and charges in respect of merchandise traffic can be conveniently and properly fixed by reference to any Schedule already sanctioned by a Rates and Charges Order Confirmation Act.—(The Chairman of Ways and Means.)

QUESTIONS.

SCOTTISH BOARD SCHOOLS.

Dr. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether any, and, if so, how many, School Boards in Scotland, besides the Port Glasgow School Board, were appointed under Article 13 of the General Order of the Scottish Education Department, dated October, 1890, recently declared by the Court of Session to be ultra vires of the Department, and illegal; and, in case of the existence of any such School Boards, if he would state which they are, and what steps the Department proposes to take with respect to them?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I understand that 68 School Boards, besides that of Port Glasgow, were appointed under Article 13 of the General Order, and the Department have issued, or are about to issue, orders of nomination in all these cases under the powers conferred upon them by Section 13 of the Education (Scotland) Act of 1872.

Dr. CAMERON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last part of my question, which are the School Boards appointed under Article 13?

*Sir C. J. PEARSON: I have not the list with me, but I shall be happy to supply the hon. Member with it.

Dr. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether, since he announced the intention of the Scottish Education Department to nominate as a School Board for Port Glasgow, in place of the School Board declared illegal by the Court of Session, the members of that Board and persons nominated by them, he has received any remonstrances from Port Glasgow, through its Parliamentary Representative, against the proposed course; and whether it is proposed still to adhere to that course, or to order the election of a new Board?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: Since making the announcement referred to, I have had a conversation with the hon. Member for Kilmarnock Burghs, and have seen a letter from him to the Secretary of the Department to the effect referred to. The order of nomination has now been issued.

DEATHS OF NUNS IN CONVENTS.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can state how many deaths of nuns in convents in the United Kingdom have been registered by the Registrar General during the last 20 years; how many of those deaths have taken place in convents whose inmates never are outside their walls; and whether any, and, if so, how many, inquests have been held in the convents of the United Kingdom during the same period?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The Registrar General informs me that he has no means of supplying the information for which the hon. Gentleman asks. Deaths in convents in England and Wales are required to be registered under precisely the same rules as all other deaths which occur in private houses, and are not distinguished from such deaths in the statistical records of the office. I am unable, also, to answer the third paragraph of the question.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): With reference to the extraordinary form of this question, and the sinister suggestion contained in it, I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware of any reason for thinking that there are more deaths in convents requiring inquests than occur outside?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have absolutely no reason for thinking so.

ROYAL NAVAL ARTILLERY VOLUNTEERS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether any decision has been arrived at as to the conditions under which it is proposed to employ the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers in connection with harbour, coast, and river defence and if, having regard to the effort made by this force to bring themselves to a high state of efficiency, and the sacrifices to that end of the officers and members, every effort will be made to utilise them in connection with some existing corps, without compelling them to abandon the ships and quarters they have fitted for their training at such considerable cost?

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Where possible an offer will be made to the Royal Naval Artillery Volunteers to allow them to join, as complete companies with their own officers, existing Military or Volunteer Submarine Mining organisations. The number of companies which can be so accepted is, however, limited; and the details as to them will be notified very shortly. As the Naval Artillery Volunteers who accept this offer will become integral parts of the corps they join, they cannot retain separate headquarters from the rest of the corps; but it may be practicable to retain some of the present quarters as company or detachment headquarters.

APPOINTMENT OF SOLICITOR, INLAND REVENUE, EDINBURGH.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will explain on what grounds, on the retirement of Mr. Crole, late Solicitor, on 31st December, 1891, who had graduated in the office, the appointment of Solicitor, Inland Revenue, Edinburgh has been conferred upon Mr. Hamilton Grierson, advocate, who was called to the Scottish Bar in 1880, appointed Sheriff Substitute of Banffshire in 188 and transferred in 1890 to Aberdeenshire; whether, in making this appointment, regard was had to the representation to the Treasury by the Board of Inland Revenue, dated 27th December, 1890, that the Solicitor "be a lawyer who is in practice, and has been so for the preceding ten years," and the reply of the Treasury on 13th February, 1891, that the appointment "be confined to lawyers in actual practice, and of ten years' standing;" and whether, in view of the fact that Sheriff Substitutes are either expressly prevented from practising, or in fact cannot practise their profession owing to their compulsory residence within their Sherifffdoms, he can explain how, considering the disappointment of the reasonable expectations of promotions on the part of the staff in the Solicitor's office, this appointment has been made?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The appointment of Solicitor to the Department of Inland Revenue at Edinburgh was conferred upon Mr. Hamilton Grierson because very careful examination showed that he was, in the opinion of those most capable of judging, better qualified for the post than any other candidate. The greatest possible pains were taken to discover the best man for the post, and I have no reason to doubt that our efforts were successful. The hon. Member quotes certain extracts from Departmental correspondence. The letters from which he quotes have not, I believe, been published, and I am not aware in what manner the extracts have been communicated to the hon. Member, and by him to the public. The words which he quotes were not intended to exclude from this appointment lawyers engaged in legal employment of a judicial character. It is certainly not the case that any reasonable expectations of promotion to the post of Solicitor have been given to the staff of the Solicitor's office, either by the letters to which the hon. Member refers or in any other manner.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): May I ask if any Sheriff Substitute ever has been appointed to an office of the kind, and is it possible for the Sheriff Substitute in Aberdeenshire to do duty for the Inland Revenue in Edinburgh?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I am not able to say if there is any precedent, but I may say that I and my colleagues have taken great pains, and every point has been carefully considered in making the appointment.

DR. CLARK: In Committee on the Estimates I will call attention to this appointment.

DISTRESS IN INNISBOFFIN.

MR. CRILLY (Mayo, N.) (for Mr. FOLEY, Galway, Connemara): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that great distress prevails at present in the island of Innisboffin; that 20 or 30 families there are in actual want; and if, in view of this lamentable condition of affairs, he will urge the Congested Districts Board to undertake the completion of the pier in the east end of the island which was begun last year?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): No information has reached the Government of alleged distress on Innisboffin Island, but the Local Government Board have directed their Inspector for the district to inquire into the matter. Works at Rusheen Harbour on the island have, in completion of those undertaken for the relief of distress in 1891, been for some time in progress under a contractor.

MR. CRILLY: I may be allowed to say that we have it on the statement of the parish priest that certain families are in a state of want. Will the right hon. Gentleman suggest to the Department the necessity of inquiry of the parish priest?

MR. JACKSON: Whatever steps are necessary will be taken to ascertain the facts by the Inspector, who, as I have said, has been ordered to proceed to the district.

CLARE SLOB LANDS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he is aware that the high tide on the night of 18th November, 1891, made a large gap in the Clare slob land reclamation embankment, causing serious danger to the navigation of the River

Fergus; and whether it is the intention of the Board of Works to repair the embankment, and complete the reclamation of the slob lands, on which a sum of £175,000 has already been expended?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): I am aware of the breach made in the embankment of the Clare slob reclamation by a storm which occurred on the 18th October, 1891. The Government, having carefully considered the matter, have decided not to incur further expenditure upon the undertaking. I should add, perhaps, that the outlay up to date has been £134,053, not £175,000.

MR. COX: Are we to understand that after an expenditure of £175,000, which the Board of Works bungled as they have bungled everything they have set their hands to, all this money is to be derelict, and be thrown away?

SIR J. GORST: Yes; I confess this money, £134,000, may be considered as thrown away, and it is not intended to spend any more in the same direction.

ENNIS POST OFFICE.

MR. COX: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received an influentially signed memorial from inhabitants of the town of Ennis, pointing out the great inconvenience to which a large number of the towns people and the travelling public are subjected to in consequence of the recent removal of the post office from the centre of the town to the outskirts, and asking to have a sub-office opened in some position near the site of the old one; and whether he will grant the request of the memorialists?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSSON, Manchester, N.E.): Yes, Sir; and I am glad to inform the hon. Member that the need of such a sub-office is recognised, and it will be supplied as soon as possible.

WEYMOUTH TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, when the Weymouth Trustee Savings Bank closed recently, any representative of the Post Office Savings Bank Department was allowed by the Trustees of that bank to be present to advise the depositors; whether the books of the Trustee Bank were handed over to a private bank at Weymouth, the deposits being transferred to such bank; whether he is aware that a man named Scorey claims the sum of £51 5s. 1d., deposited by his deceased wife so long ago as 1850, together with the interest accruing since that date, supposed to amount altogether to about £100; whether the manager or some other person in authority at the bank has declared that the money was long ago paid; and whether such sum or any sum could be legally so paid without the production and presentation of the deposit book of the depositor; and, if so, what security is there for the rightful disposal of the unclaimed sums in the hands of the Trustees of the Weymouth Bank at the time of its closing, or of any such bank in the United Kingdom?

MR. GOSCHEN: The Trustees of the Weymouth Savings Bank notified to the National Debt Commissioners on 30th November, 1888, their intention to close the Savings Bank. The bank was finally closed on 12th February, 1889, by a transfer of the deposits then remaining to the Post Office Savings Bank. On the list of deposits so transferred, amounting to £162 10s. 8d., there is no mention of any deposit in the name of Scorey, and the Commissioners have no knowledge of the facts contained in the question respecting this account; nor is it within their knowledge that the ledgers were handed over to a private bank at Weymouth. It is true, however, that the assistance of the Post Office Authorities was declined during the closing, and that in a circular to the depositors dated 15th November, 1888, it was stated by the Trustees that the depositors might (1) receive their money in cash after 14 days' notice, or (2) have the same transferred to the Post Office Savings Bank, where 2½ per cent. per annum is allowed, or (3) have the same invested at the Savings Bank Department of Messrs. Elliot and Co.'s bank, where 3 per cent. per annum will be allowed from the date of deposit. On 20th November, 1888, the number of deposits remaining unpaid was 1,203, and the amount £46,902 11s. 1d., and of these, 65 deposits in all were transferred to the Post Office Savings Bank, amounting to £4,125 18s. 5d.; but the Commissioners are unable to state how the remainder was disposed of. If there be any dispute between the Trustees and a depositor, or any persons claiming to be entitled to a deposit, the Barrister appointed under the Savings Banks Act of 1863 (for this purpose the Chief Registrar of Friendly Societies) is empowered by the 48th Section of the Act to decide upon the matter in dispute, and he would doubtless take into consideration the legality or otherwise of the payment of a deposit without production of the pass-book.

MR. HOWELL: May I ask whether the books when closed were handed over to the National Debt Commissioners? Is there any means of ascertaining what the outstanding liabilities may be?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I understand the books were not handed over to the Post Office Savings Bank. If the hon. Member wishes for further information I will give it to him privately or across the floor of the House, as he pleases.

AMERICAN MAILS CONTRACT.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that on each alternate Thursday, from 30th April, 1891, to 26th November, 1891, a steamer not carrying mails by contract left Queenstown at the same time as the mail steamer, and arrived at New York on every passage from 28 to 48 hours earlier; whether the same system of sending the mails every alternate Thursday by a slow steamer has already begun this year with similar results; and whether, in the interest of the public, and especially of the commercial classes, he will endeavour to arrange that Her Majesty's mails from Queenstown shall be sent in all cases by the fastest steamers?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The contract was approved by Parliament, and was the best obtainable at the time. If the public desire to use exceptionally fast steamers put on the line on the same day as the contract mail steamers, they have only to address their letters accordingly.

LINE-THROWING GUNS.

MR. LENG: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether reports have been brought under his notice of the wreck in December last of the Benvenue, off Sandgate, with the drowning of the master and four of the crew; and also of the wreck of the Enterkin, on the Galloper Sands, when 30 out of 31 of her crew were drowned, only an apprentice boy being saved; whether he is aware, in the case of the Benvenue, of three rockets that passed over the vessel, only one had any cord attached, and the crew discovered, to their dismay, that the other end was not secured to the shore; whether the Board of Trade has power to order that all sea-going vessels shall have amongst their life-saving appliances line-throwing guns, seeing that, firing with the wind, it is much easier to throw a line on shore, than firing against a gale, to throw it on board a vessel; and whether the Board of Trade has ordered, or will order, inquiries to be made into the losses of both the vessels named; and, if so, will, in accordance with the official notice issued by the Marine Department in April, 1884, direct attention to the question whether they were sufficiently manned?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): I have received reports with regard to the wrecks of the Benvenue and the Enterkin to which the hon. Member refers. In the case of the latter vessel 28, and not 30, lives were lost. I ordered a special inquiry into the failure of the rocket apparatus to save life from the Benvenue, and it is reported to me that the vessel was too distant from the shore for communication to be effected by its means. I believe that the extra strain on the lines due to the endeavour to reach the vessel caused them to break as they did. The Board of Trade have no power to order all sea-going vessels to carry line-throwing guns among their life-saving appliances. No formal inquiry has been held in either the case of the Benvenue or in that of the Enterkin, because the loss of life that occurred has rendered it impossible to obtain sufficient evidence to afford any hope of a useful result.

MR. LENG: Will the right hon. Gentleman say if the Department have made any inquiry into these line-throwing guns, and are they prepared to make any recommendation respecting them?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: They have been continually before the Department, but we are not prepared to make any recommendation regarding them.

THE GREAT SEAL FOR IRELAND.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether a new Great Seal has been provided for Ireland; what has become of the old one; and whether, considering its historical interest, he will have it handed over to the Royal Irish Academy?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that a new Great Seal is being made, but it is not yet completed, and so the question of the disposition of the old one does not yet arise.

REGIMENTAL CANTEN STORES.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the canteen committees of the various military stations in Ireland advertise for tenders for grocery and dry goods supply before giving the contracts to the Army and Navy Stores, London; and, if so, whether he can give the prices at which local traders were willing to supply, and the prices at which the contracts were given to the Army and Navy Stores Company; is it usual to take the opinion of the men before giving contracts for supply; and, if so, is it done in Ireland, and how is it obtained; and whether, quality and price being equal, he will see that a preference is given to local traders when the next contracts are closed?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid I can only repeat the answer already given. The canteens are managed by committees, and the committees are free to obtain their supplies where they please.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the second paragraph of the question, whether the men are consulted before a contract is given?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No; it is left entirely to the committee to manage as they think proper.

THE DEATH OF P. W. NALLY.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Coroner was informed by the Governor of Mountjoy Prison, before the close of the inquest on the late Mr. P. W. Nally, that the five prisoners named by Mr. M'Auley in his letter published in the Western People, of the 12th inst., were anxious to be examined, and to give material evidence as to the cause of death, and the prison treatment of Mr. Nally; and, if not, will he allow the evidence which those prisoners were ready to give to be taken by some person independent of the prison authorities?

MR. JACKSON: The General Prisons Board report that the Governor of Mountjoy Prison did not inform the Coroner that five prisoners desired to give evidence at the inquest on the body of P. W. Nally; but the Governor informed the Coroner that any person under his control was at the Coroner's service as a witness. He did not specify any particular persons. Two of the convicts referred to in the question have since been released from prison.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman consider it a satisfactory state of things that the Coroner should be told this? How could the Coroner know that evidence would be forthcoming?

MR. JACKSON: So far as I am able to judge, it would be an unusual or an improper thing for the Governor to suggest that prisoners desired to give evidence.

MR. SEXTON: To make the matter clear I may say the man died, and five prisoners said they had material evidence to give. Why did the Governor not inform the Coroner that this evidence was available? How could the Coroner know unless informed? Does the right hon. Gentleman approve of the suppression of the fact that these five persons had evidence to give?

MR. JACKSON: I do not think I can find fault with the Governor. I do not think that it is desirable, because prisoners desire to give evidence, they should therefore necessarily be called as witnesses.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is it not the usual course in Ireland if the police have any evidence to inform the Coroner, and, shut up in prison, how could these men make known the fact that they had evidence to give?

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): Is it not the invariable practice in this country for the police to put the names of witnesses before the Coroner?

MR. JACKSON: That is a question for the Home Office.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I must press for an answer to my question.

MR. JACKSON: I have already answered the hon. Member.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I respectfully submit my question has not been answered. How was the Coroner to know of this evidence when the fact was suppressed by the Governor? I shall take another opportunity of calling attention to this.

FEVER IN ST. JOHN'S WOOD BARRACKS.

MR. W. LOWTHER (Westmoreland, Appleby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether there have been any cases of typhoid fever amongst the officers at the St. John's Wood Barracks within the last three weeks?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I regret to say that Second-Lieutenant Viscount Sudley was reported on 12th March as sick with enteric fever. There does not appear to be evidence that the disease was contracted in barracks, and I am glad to hear that the case is proceeding favourably. I may add that these barracks have been recently examined and no insanitary conditions have been detected.

WESTMEATH CONSTABULARY.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the total force of the Royal Irish Constabulary for the County Westmeath; how many men are doing duty there at present; and how many extra men are still chargeable to the county?

MR. JACKSON: The total authorised force of the County Westmeath is 289 men, consisting of 266 free quota and 23 extra force, the latter being appointed on the requisition of the magistrates. There are at present serving in the county 278 men, who, in calculating the charge against the county, would be apportioned free quota 256, and extra force 22.

EXPRESS LETTER SERVICES.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that the officials in the various post offices are required to fill up long and elaborate forms in connection with each express letter, and that the messenger delivering an express letter is required to obtain a receipt for it at the residence of the addressee; and whether he will provide for a simplification of the system, which shall save the time of the officials and obviate the necessity of giving receipts for express letters, so that the procedure shall be assimilated as far as possible to that observed with respect to telegrams, for which, on delivery, no receipt is demanded? I may add, is it not a fact that there are some 13 entries before the transaction is completed?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: One form only is used in connection with each express letter, and in it the following entries are necessarily made:—(1) of the address of the letter; (2) of the distance and the fee due for the same and for weight (if necessary); and (3) of the number and time of starting of the messenger taking the letter. The name and address of the sender are also entered, if he has no objection. These entries need not be either long or elaborate. The messenger is not required to obtain a receipt for the letter on delivering it. He is instructed to ask that the time of delivery may be entered in the form and attested by the signature of the recipient or of someone else at the place of address merely as a check against delay or dishonesty on his part; but the recipient need not, of course, do this unless he likes. The check is useful both to the public and the Department, and no single person has ever complained of it; on the contrary, it is believed that tradesmen and others appreciate it as affording proof of delivery.

THE CASE OF JOHN DALY.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether John Daly, who is under sentence of penal servitude for life at Portland Prison, has been suffering for many months from a painful and wasting complaint; whether the medical treatment to which he has been subjected has failed to afford him any relief; whether he has applied, by letter, to the Home Office praying that he may be permitted to receive a visit from an independent medical man; whether he has asked his friends and relatives to endeavour to obtain such a visit for him; and whether, considering the long duration of his illness, his request will now be granted?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the medical officer of Portland Prison that Daly has not suffered, and is not now suffering, from any wasting or painful complaint; and that medical treatment has invariably afforded him relief from minor ailments which from time to time have induced him to make application for medical aid. His present health is good, and he has gained in weight while at Portland. Daly has not within the last two years made any application to the Department to see an independent medical man. The Governor informs me that Daly has during his imprisonment asked his friends to obtain such a visit for him. He was visited by an independent medical man in March, 1887, and again in March, 1890. There appears to be no grounds at the present time for allowing a special medical visit.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: In reference to the last question, may I ask the Home Secretary whether he was not suffering from an entirely different complaint when he was specially visited by a special doctor on two former occasions; and whether, in consequence of the fact that this man had been poisoned by the medical treatment of the prison, this is not a case for exceptional treatment, and in which the request made by the relatives might be granted?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have already told the hon. Member that there has been no complaint. If the hon. Member refers to the administration of belladonna, the effects of that were extremely temporary, and have entirely gone away.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman consider such a request if it is addressed to him?

MR. MATTHEWS: If there are any grounds for the request I will take it into consideration.

APPOINTMENT OF MEDICAL OFFICER TO THE ISLINGTON VESTRY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the Islington Vestry has, contrary to its own bye-law, appointed Dr. Wynn Westcott to the office of medical officer of health, Dr. Westcott having been, until 2nd March, a member of the Vestry and of the Public Health Committee; whether this appointment was made without previous advertisement, and against the votes of many members of the Board, including the Chairman of the Public Health Committee; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made before confirming the appointment?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I understand that the Vestry of the parish of Islington have appointed Dr. Westcott as medical officer of health as a temporary arrangement for six months, and that he was a member of the Vestry and of the Public Health Committee of the parish until the 20th February, but then he sent in his resignation. The bye-laws of the Vestry provide that no person shall be eligible for election to any paid office under the Vestry who is a vestryman within six months next before the election, but this bye-law, it appears, was suspended by another bye-law, which allows of such suspension if two-thirds of the vestrymen present vote for it. The appointment was made without previous advertisement, and 45 members voted in favour of it, and 22, including the Chairman of the Public Health Committee, against it. I am in communication with the Vestry with reference to the proposal to make an appointment for six months.

THE BORROWING POWERS OF LOCAL AUTHORITIES.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether in any and what cases under "The Public Health Act, 1875," "The Local Government Act, 1888," or "The Allotments Act, 1887," a Local Authority has power to borrow money upon the rates of a larger area, such as a County or a Sanitary Authority, for the purchase of land or other purposes affecting a smaller area, such as a parish or contributory place, and to allocate the repayment of any instalments or balance of any such loan by charging the rates of such smaller area?

*MR. RITCHIE: The only cases of the class referred to appear to be those where moneys required to defray private improvement expenses or to execute works, for the purpose of which the Local Authority, under the Public Health Act, 1875, have divided their district, are borrowed on the security of the district fund and general district rate of the whole district, and when a County Council borrows on the security of the county fund for a purpose the expense of which must ultimately be borne as a special expense.

PUBLIC HEALTH AMENDMENT ACT.

MR. SEXTON: On behalf of my hon. Friend (Mr. JUSTIN MCCARTHY, Londonderry), I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Regulations made by the Board relating to Section 52 of "The Public Health Amendment Act, 1890," will be printed?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Regulations referred to were printed in July of last year, and were confirmed by the Queen in Council in September last. Copies are furnished to Local Authorities when they are required.

Mr. Ritchie

INFECTIOUS DISEASES.

DR. TANNER (Cork, Co., Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether any, and, if so, what, regulations are in force with regard to cases of infectious disease rejected and sent ashore from emigrant and passenger vessels, after the inspection by the medical Inspectors to the Board of Trade, of passengers by outward bound ships; whether the medical Inspectors are required to report the matter to the Local Authorities; and if it is a fact that complaints have been made of occasional outbreaks of infectious and epidemic diseases in consequence of such cases going uncontrolled to common lodging houses, &c.?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The matter to which the hon. Member refers is one rather for the Local Sanitary Authorities under the Public Health Act, 1875, than for the Board of Trade. The Board's Medical Inspectors report to the Local Authorities whenever (as in London, for instance) those Authorities ask them to co-operate by doing so; and I have directed that they shall in future report whether requested or not. I understand that no complaint has in recent years reached the Board of Trade of any outbreaks of disease having occurred under the circumstances stated by the hon. Member.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE AT CAVAN.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether four gentlemen have recently been appointed Justices of the Peace of the County Cavan who are possessed of qualifications, but do not reside in the Bailieborough Union; whether, at a recent attempted election of a matron of the union workhouse, an equal number of votes were given to two candidates; and whether the gentlemen recently appointed Justices of the Peace will be entitled to vote at the adjourned election, or on any other occasion prior to the 29th September?

*MR. JACKSON: The Clerk of the Bailieborough Union reports that the names of four gentlemen who are non-resident Justices of the Peace have been recently placed on the list as ex-officio Guardians, making for the union 16 elected and 16 ex-officio Guardians. I have no information as regards the second paragraph. Assuming that the gentlemen referred to possess the qualifications required for ex-officio Guardians by Statute, they will be entitled to take part in the proceedings at any meeting of the Board.

INSPECTOR BLACK, OF BIRMINGHAM.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department have any allegations of a serious character reached the Police Authorities with regard to Inspector James Black, of Birmingham; did the Police Authorities take any steps to stop the public testimonials to Mr. Black which were on foot some weeks ago in Birmingham, and, if so, what was their reason for doing so; has the Home Office any authority over provincial Inspectors of Police such as Mr. Black; have such officers acted during the dynamite scare under the directions of the Home Office; and if the Home Office is not responsible for the provincial police, which Minister of the Crown in this House is so responsible?

MR. MATTHEWS: I must refer the hon. Member to the answer which I gave on this subject to the hon. Member for Waterford on Monday last, and to which I have nothing to add. Mr. Black, who has retired from the Force on the pension due to 25 years' service, has, as I have already stated, informed me that he proposes to take legal action to vindicate his character from certain defamatory statements which have appeared in the newspapers against him, and I must decline to express any opinion about them. The answer to the second and fourth paragraphs of the question is, as I am informed, in the negative. The Home Office has no authority over provincial Inspectors of Police. It is not responsible for the discipline or conduct of the provincial police. It is the Local Authorities, and not any Minister of the Crown, who are so responsible.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: The Home Secretary has not answered that paragraph of my question which asks—“Have such officers acted during the dynamite scare under the directions of the Home Office; and if the Home Office is not responsible for the provincial police, which Minister of the Crown in this House is so responsible?”

MR. MATTHEWS: If the Gentleman had listened to my previous answer he would have seen I had replied to that question.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: May I ask the hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary is he aware that a distinguished member of the police, named French, in London made the same threats against the Press for exposing his misconduct which was subsequently convicted of an abominable offence in Ireland, and whether, bearing that in mind, he will take any further action in the matter?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

TITHE RENT CHARGE.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): I beg to ask the right hon. Member for the University, as Ecclesiastical Commissioner, whether, in the case of a tenant owner paying to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales the tithe rent-charge in respect of several tenants, who are under contracts bound to repay such amount to him, the Commissioners have instructed their tithe receivers to give the landowner separate receipts in respect of each tenant's tithe rent-charge; and whether, having regard to the serious difficulty of the landowner being able under such circumstances to satisfy each separate tenant the amount of such tithe rent-charge is due, and which amount, through the effect of the corn averages, varies from year to year, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners still intend to adhere to their resolution not to give separate receipts?

MR. J. R. MOWBRAY (University): The Ecclesiastical Commissioners have not instructed their receivers to refuse to give separate receipts to landowners in respect of each tenant's tithe rent-charge; on the contrary, the receivers have been directed to give every facility to the owners by furnishing as many receipts as may be required. If the hon. Member will furnish particulars of any case such as was suggested in his question, the matter will be investigated.

MR. MORTON: May I ask the right hon. Member is he aware that Secretary has written a letter refusing to give separate receipts?

*SIR J. R. MOWBRAY: No, Sir; I am not aware of it. The Secretary has given me the information which I have given the hon. Member, and we cannot trace any case of the kind at all within the record or knowledge of anyone.

MR. MORTON: Has not the right hon. Member got the letter?

*SIR J. R. MOWBRAY: No.

CATHEDRAL CHURCHES AND CHARITIES.

MR. MORTON: I beg to ask the hon. Member for Exeter, as a Charity Commissioner, whether, since by the provisions of 5 and 6 Will. 4, c. 71, s. 16, the Collegiate and Cathedral Churches are exempted from inquiry as to the charities held by them, and as no inquiry has for many years been held, the Charity Commissioners will be prepared to bring up a Report to Parliament as to the advisability of an inquiry being forthwith held into all such exempted charities?

SIR S. NORTHCOTE (Exeter): The Act mentioned in the question expired in 1837, but if the question relates to the corporate property of the Church, as mentioned, which is specially exempted from the jurisdiction of the Charity Commissioners by Section 62 of the Charitable Trusts Act, 1853, it will be beyond the competence of the Commissioners to take any action in respect of that property unless authorised by Parliament to do so.

THE SUPPORT OF AN IMBECILE.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that a labourer named Henry Mann, living at Winburgh, Norfolk, whose average earnings (in consequence of his being a cripple) do not exceed 6s. per week, has been ordered by the Mitford and Launditch Board of Guardians at their meeting on 21st March to contribute the sum of 1s. per week towards the support of his imbecile son, who is an inmate of the Mitford Union; and, if so, what steps he proposes to take to interfere in this case in the interest of Henry Mann?

Mr. Morton

*MR. RITCHIE: I have made inquiry of the Guardians respecting the case of Henry Mann, whose son is an inmate of the Mitford and Launditch Workhouse. I am informed that the Guardians do not admit that Mann's earnings are only six shillings per week, and they are making further inquiries as to his means. The Guardians are not empowered to make any order as to the payment to be made by Mann; but they have informed him that they will take proceedings against him before the Justices if he does not arrange to pay one shilling per week towards the cost of the maintenance of his son. In the event of proceedings being instituted by the Guardians, it will be a question for the Justices to determine whether Mann is of sufficient ability to make any payment towards his son's maintenance, and the Justices are only empowered to make such order as the means of the person would justify.

MR. BROADHURST: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, if there is any additional evidence, he will give the case further consideration?

*MR. RITCHIE: Certainly, Sir. If the hon. Member has any additional evidence I shall be glad to consider it.

THE CASE OF MRS. OSBORNE.

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department has he kept in view that there may be more lives than one in jeopardy by the continued incarceration of Mrs. Osborne; is there no protection at law for the life of an unborn child in such circumstances, or is it ever afterwards to be subject to the odium of having been born in gaol; and can he, viewing all the facts, see his way to advise Her Majesty to graciously pardon Mrs. Osborne?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am aware of the circumstance to which the hon. Member refers. It is not the rule for female prisoners who are with child to be discharged from prison in order that their children may be free from the odium of birth in a prison. They are not discharged before confinement unless special medical reasons exist. Mrs. Osborne, like any other prisoner in her condition, is receiving, and will continue to receive, all possible care and medical advice. There is nothing sufficient to justify at the present time any interference with the sentence.

MR. H. CAMPBELL: I would beg in addition to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is true that during the past year no less than 66 women were either released at once or had their sentences reduced as their confinement was approaching?

MR. MATTHEWS: If the hon. Member wishes any further information, I must ask him to be good enough to put the question on the Paper.

THE CROPS OF INDIA.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Government of India have complied with the suggestion made to the Government of India by the Secretary of State, as intimated to the House on 28th November, 1890, that a table of the average yield of the principal crops in the various districts should be prepared; and whether, if received, he will lay the same upon the Table of the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): These statistics have not been received yet. The Government of India hope to dispatch them by the end of July. When they arrive, the Secretary of State will consider the propriety of laying them on the Table.

STOCK AND PRODUCE IN IRELAND.

MR. KNOX: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he would arrange to have the statistics of prices of stock and produce collected by the Irish Land Commission during the last year published, with abstracts and averages, in the form of a Parliamentary Return?

MR. JACKSON: I will inquire whether it is desirable to have this statement published. I do not see any objection to it myself if it is of any use, but it would be necessary to get information from the Land Commission on the subject.

MR. KNOX: I beg to give notice that I will repeat the question on Monday.

GALWAY COUNTY INFIRMARY COMMISSION.

MR. CRILLY (for Mr. FOLEY): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland at what date the Government Bill for carrying into effect the recommendations of the Galway County Infirmary Commission is to be introduced?

MR. JACKSON: The necessary notices to enable this Bill to be introduced were given at the end of last year. I am not at present able to say when the Bill will be introduced, as the question requires some consideration.

MR. CRILLY: Could my hon. Friend put another question on this matter?

MR. JACKSON: If he will be good enough to delay for a week, I will take an opportunity in the meantime of inquiring.

BELFAST CONSTABULARY BARRACKS.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the building work in connection with the new Central Constabulary Barrack for Belfast was begun; when the work on the men's quarters is likely to be completed; and when the stables and other works are to be commenced?

MR. JACKSON: The erection of the new Central Constabulary Barrack in Belfast was begun in April, 1891. This building should, under the terms of the contract, be completed by 1st January, 1893; but the Board of Works, judging from the present state of the building, are of opinion that it cannot be finished within the time specified. The other buildings and works of improvement in connection with the accommodation for the men, arranged for under the general scheme now being carried out, will probably occupy a further period of twelve months. Upon their completion the erection of the stabling will be proceeded with.

THE DISTURBANCES AT PORTADOWN.

MR. KNOX (for Mr. M. J. KENNY, Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that on St. Patrick's night, 17th instant, an Orange band, playing Party tunes, paraded the streets of Portadown, broke the windows of many of the houses inhabited by Catholics, and also assaulted and knocked down several Catholics in Castle Street and High Street; if application had been made to the Divisional Commissioner for a force of extra police in anticipation of disturbances, and refused; and if the police have made any arrests, or have instituted proceedings against persons concerned in the disturbances in question?

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): Before the right hon. Gentleman answers this question I would like to ask him whether the band in question was a flute and not an Orange band; whether it was not the case that no person was knocked down; and whether two panes of glass were not broken at a public-house belonging to a Protestant and two panes at a public-house belonging to a Roman Catholic, thus showing an impartial spirit; and whether the police prosecution was not withdrawn at the instance of Mr. O'Hanlon, a Roman Catholic Magistrate?

MR. JACKSON: I have no doubt the "glass" to which the hon. Gentleman refers had a good deal to do with the whole proceedings. The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that on the date mentioned bands played through Portadown, but not through the Roman Catholic quarter. Windows were (as I stated a few days ago in reply to a question put by the hon. Member for South Armagh) broken in six houses occupied by Roman Catholics and in one house occupied by a Protestant. The police did not witness any assaults, nor are they aware of any serious one; but it is alleged that some, apparently of a trifling nature, took place. The Divisional Commissioner and the local Magistrates in consultation decided that there was no necessity to bring a large body of extra police into the town; but the town establishment was strengthened by nine additional police from outlying stations. No arrests have been made, and no proceedings have been taken.

THE CHARACTER-NOTE SYSTEM.

MR. BROADHURST: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Admiralty Authorities have introduced the character-note system in respect to the employment of new hands in Her Majesty's Dockyards; and whether a man named Sullivan (a member of the Steam Engine Makers' Society) was recently discharged from Chatham Dockyard solely on account of a character-note from his late employers?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): It has been found necessary to introduce the character-note system in connection with the employment of new hands, in consequence of men having been entered at the dockyards who subsequently were found to have bad characters, and in one instance to have been convicted of theft. A man named Sullivan was entered on 11th March at Chatham as a fitter on probation, and was warned at the time that his retention was dependent upon the character that might be given by his late employers. It was found that Sullivan had left the service of his late employers without completing his apprenticeship. He was therefore discharged.

INFANTRY DRILL BOOK.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether the new Provisional Infantry Drill Book of 1892 is intended to be put at once into the hands of all Her Majesty's Infantry, including the Auxiliary Forces, as the authorised manual for drill; what is the meaning of the word "Provisional" as attached to the book; and whether it is correctly inferred from the book that in the future establishment of an eight company battalion there shall only be three mounted officers—namely, the Commanding Officer, the Major, and the Adjutant?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Infantry Drill Book of 1892 has been issued to all Her Majesty's Infantry, and is the only authorised drill book for that arm. It is called "Provisional" because, as it involves a very considerable departure from some of the previously existing ideas respecting drill, it is thought right to let all officers see that there would be no impropriety in their offering observations upon it. The book is written to suit existing establishments. The present mounted establishment for an Infantry battalion of the Line is one Lieutenant Colonel, one Major, and one Adjutant.

THE LATE POST OFFICE SURVEYOR OF THE SOUTH EAST DISTRICT.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why Mr. Perring, late surveyor of the South East District, who has been discharging the duties of that office up to the 21st instant, has been called upon by the Treasury to refund the difference between the full pay of surveyor and his present retired pay from the 1st January, 1892, to 21st March; and whether, as Postmaster General, he will see that this public servant is not thus deprived of his rights as to pay whilst acting under the orders of the Department he was bound to obey until superseded?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: This officer, who had received notice that he would be retired on the 1st January, 1892, appealed to the Treasury against his retirement just before the end of the year. His appeal was not supported by me, as there was no exceptional circumstances in his case. As he was allowed to continue on duty pending the decision on his appeal, the question of his pay during that period is under consideration.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the total for the Royal Irish Constabulary Force of all grades, whether as a free quota or extra force, authorised by Statute to be maintained in Ireland; what was the total free quota for 1891, and what proportion serving in the counties and towns and in the depôt; and what is the total extra force serving in the counties and towns and charged to the local rates?

*MR. JACKSON: I understand the hon. Member to refer to the maximum Force authorised by Statute, and in answer I have to say that the component parts of the Constabulary Force, the numbers of which are limited by Statute, are as follows:—County inspectors and town inspectors, 37; district inspectors, 248; head constables, 358; sergeants, acting sergeants, and constables, free force, 10,006; reserve and revenue force, 800; extra force, City of Belfast, 320; extra force, City of Londonderry, 45. The extra forces for counties under Section 12 and Section 13 of 6 and 7 William IV., Chapter 13, are practically only limited by the extent of the requirements. In 1891, according to a Return, No. 33 of this Session, of the free force, 9,507 were in counties and 282 at the depôt. In the same period the extra force serving in counties and towns and chargeable to local rates was 1,568.

MR. HAYDEN: Am I to understand that the full force has not been maintained?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir. The total maximum force authorised by Statute has not been maintained. The hon. Member must not deduce from that that the extra force is charged where the free quota has not come up to the number.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware of the fact that the addition of the men at the depôt to those in the county only managed to make up the authorised number of the free quota, when he replied that the case of Donegal might be made up by a number of men at the depôt.

*MR. JACKSON: I certainly was aware of the fact; and, if my memory serves me right, I pointed out that in the free quota account was taken of the number of recruits at the depôt and of the vacancies.

TRADE SOCIETIES AND THE POST OFFICE SAVINGS BANK.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he is aware that an application made by a branch of the Steam Engine Makers' Society, at New Brompton, to deposit the funds of the branch in the Post Office Savings Bank, was met by the reply on the part of the Commissioners for the Reduction of the National Debt that the branch could not deposit its funds without limit, on the grounds "that, in their opinion, your society does not come within the class of cases contemplated by the Statute"; whether he is aware that it has been the practice of the society named for a great number of years to deposit in the Post Office Savings Bank the funds of all their branches, and that by some 70 to 80 branches the funds are so deposited at this time without any question; whether he can inform the House upon what grounds an exception is made as regards this particular branch; and whether it is the intention of the National Debt Commissioners to withdraw the privilege so long enjoyed by Trade Unions of the United Kingdom of depositing their funds in the Post Office Savings Banks, or of so limiting the amount as to render the privilege of but little benefit to such societies?

MR. GOSCHEN: The facts stated by the hon. Member in the first two paragraphs of the question are substantially correct. There is considerable difficulty in deciding whether Trade Societies are "provident or charitable institutions" within the meaning of the clause which allows deposit of funds without limit in the case of such institutions. I am responsible, as head of the National Debt Commission, for the decision under which the branch in question was excluded; but I admit that it is on the border line, and, in view of the fact that many other branches of the same society had been granted the privilege before my attention was called to the matter, I am prepared to grant it to this branch also. With regard to the general question, the National Debt Commissioners are bound to carry out the intentions of the Legislature, and to discriminate between institutions which are "provident or charitable" and other institutions. But so long as the amount of the funds deposited by Trade Societies does not exceed reasonable limits, I am prepared not to press the strictest interpretation of the law against them.

GIBRALTAR.

SIR E. WATKIN (Hythe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Colonial

Mr. Howell

Office have approved of and sanctioned a scheme for boring a tunnel through the Rock of Gibraltar from west to east for the primary object of searching for water; and if this should not be found, then of converting the tunnel into a large drain for taking the sewage of the town into the Mediterranean; whether two-thirds of the cost of this scheme will fall upon the civilian ratepayers of Gibraltar, who by recent legislation have been deprived of their former amount of representation on the Sanitary Board, which controls the expenses of such works; whether he is aware that the said ratepayers consider this scheme of doubtful value, and would therefore ask that further inquiry be made before a large tax is imposed upon them; and whether military objections have been made to carrying out a communication between the eastern and inaccessible side of the Rock and the town, where the batteries, magazines, and barracks are situated?

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what are the most recent statistics with regard to the numbers of the civilian and military populations of the city and colony of Gibraltar; and what is the death rate in the civilian and military populations respectively? The hon. Gentleman also asked what efforts have been made, and with what success, to fill up the vacancies that exist in the representation of the ratepayers on the Sanitary Commission of Gibraltar?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The answer to the first question of the hon. Baronet is, Yes. The answer to the second is that two-thirds of the cost of the scheme will fall upon the rates, but that as only two-thirds of the rates are paid by the civilian ratepayers, their contribution to the cost of the scheme will be only four-ninths, which is the proportion of their representation on the present Sanitary Board. As regards the third question, objections have been made to the scheme by the Ratepayers' Defence Association, but it was recommended, after full consideration and inquiry on the spot, by so high an authority as Major Tulloch, Chief Engineering

Inspector of the Local Government Board, and Her Majesty's Government do not feel justified in delaying the commencement of the work, or incurring the expense of a further inquiry. The answer to the fourth question is, No. In answer to the hon. Member for Huddersfield, I have to say that up to the 30th of November last eight persons had declined nomination. There is nothing unusual in this, as previous to the recent change the utmost difficulty was experienced in getting gentlemen of standing willing to serve on the Board, on which there were in 1890 two vacancies, nomination to which was refused by no fewer than twelve gentlemen, including one of the members of the deputation, the other two having also refused to serve in previous years. This is one of the reasons which led Her Majesty's Government to reduce the number of the Commissioners. The number of the civil population at the recent census was 19,100, and of the military 5,896. As to the death rate, Major Tulloch reported that the death rate in 1889 was 24·5 per 1,000 among the whole population, and 25 per 1,000 among the fixed population. In 1888 it was only slightly less—namely, 24·2 per 1,000, while for 1887 it was 32·5, in which year there was an epidemic of scarlet fever. The death rate was therefore in 1889 nearly 50 per cent. higher than that of London, and from 75 to 100 per cent. higher than that of seaside towns in England. The Report of the Army Medical Department shows that the death rate among the military in the same year was 5·67 per 1,000, while in the United Kingdom it was only 4·57.

MR. SUMMERS: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman when the lists will be ready for publication, and if there is any objection to laying them on the Table?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: With regard to the publication of the Papers, I am not aware of any special objection to the giving of the Papers, but I must take time to consider the matter.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I ask the right hon. Gentleman what was the ground of refusal of those gentlemen who were asked to join the Commission; and if it is not the fact that they declined on the ground that their names were not selected by the Grand Jury, but by the Governor of Gibraltar himself.

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I am unable to answer that question without notice.

MR. CAUSTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman state how many have accepted nomination, and what their names and occupations are?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The hon. Member will have to give notice of that question.

THE LAGOS TREATIES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the statement of the Lagos Weekly Record for 23rd January to the effect that, though Mr. Carter ultimately induced the Jebu messengers to assent to the proposed Treaty, he failed in his efforts to obtain from them an admission that they were authorised to do more than tender the prescribed apology, and to the statements made by British merchants and others to the effect that, as soon as the Treaty was reported at head-quarters, it was, instead of being confirmed and recognised, at once repudiated in the most forcible way; whether the information in his possession confirms or conflicts with the statements here cited; and whether the Papers promised upon this subject will be laid without delay upon the Table of the House?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: I have referred to the Lagos Weekly Record of 23rd January, and do not find any statement of the kind described in the hon. Member's question. I have no information to the effect that the Treaty was repudiated directly it was reported at head-quarters, but within a month of its signature a peaceful party of travellers was robbed and beaten while at the capital, and refused permission to pass. The information in my possession points to the fact that the deputation had authority to treat on the subjects discussed at the meeting. The Papers will be laid so soon as this can be done consistently with the public interests.

ment that this has not been repudiated?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I have given all the information I have in answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman.

FIRE AT THE BELL HOTEL, HAMPTON.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been directed to the recent destruction of the Bell Hotel, at Hampton, when the landlady, her two sons and daughters, were saved from destruction by the proprietor's (a member of the Hampton Fire Brigade) forethought in keeping a strong rope in the chief bed-room as a means of escape in case of fire; and whether, in view of the repeatedly occurring fires in hotels, attended with extreme peril to and frequent loss of life, the Home Office will take steps to secure inspection of hotels, with a view to prevent future calamity, by the assistance of expert Inspectors, and the compulsory adoption in hotels of ladders or ropes as a life-saving apparatus?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have seen a newspaper report of the circumstances attending the fire at the Bell Hotel, Hampton. I am not prepared to initiate the legislation which would be necessary to give effect to the hon. Member's suggestions for inspection of hotels and compulsory provision of life-saving apparatus.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in other countries these steps are taken to prevent the loss of life in case of fire; and will the right hon. Gentleman take into consideration the numerous recurring cases of fire in hotels in this country where lives have been lost, and other lives endangered? And I beg to give notice that I will raise this question on the Home Office Vote.

THE SMALL HOLDINGS BILL.

MR. J. MADEN (Lancashire, Rossendale): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether persons who are now in occupation of land and buildings up to 50 acres will be able to avail themselves of the provisions of the Small Holdings Bill, in order to become the owners of the land and buildings they now occupy?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): If the hon. Member will refer to Section 1 of Clause 10 of the Bill he will find that the County Council may advance to a tenant who has agreed with his landlord for the purchase of his holding three-fourths of the purchase money, provided that the County Council is satisfied that the title to the holding is good, that the sale is made in good faith, and that the price is reasonable. Whether any particular tenant or tenants will be able to avail themselves of this provision will depend, of course, on the individual circumstances of each case, as to which I am not able to speak.

TRUSTEES OF OLIVER AND RICHARDS' CHARITIES, YSTRADMEURIG.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Exeter, as a Charity Commissioner, whether the Trustees of Oliver and Richards' Charities, Ystradmeurig, have been appointed; and, if not, when the appointment will be made, so that the work connected with the Trust might be carried on?

SIR S. NORTHCOTE: The appointment of new Trustees of the charities mentioned in the question has not yet been completed owing to the delay on the part of the agent of the Trustees in the transmission to the Commissioners of the revised schedule of the property belonging to each charity to be appended to the Orders. So soon as this is returned the Orders will be sealed by the Commissioners.

THE DORNOCH VOLUNTEER COMPANY.

MR. MACDONALD CAMERON (Wick, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware of the litigation which has taken place between the Town Council of Dornoch and Captain Mackintosh of the Dornoch Volunteer Company, owing to the latter having repudiated the title of the former to the town links, whereon were erected some buildings belonging to the Volunteer Company, since removed by Captain Mackintosh; whether Captain Mackintosh acted under instructions from his superior officers in commencing litigation against the Town Council of Dornoch; whether it is the intention of the War Office authorities to cause Captain Mackintosh to restore these buildings; whether he is aware that in two actions tried before Sheriff Substitute Mackenzie decisions were given in favour of the Town Council, but on appeal to the Sheriff Principal the judgment of the Substitute was reversed, on the ground that the commanding officer of the district should be sued; and whether it is the intention of the War Office authorities to take such steps as will settle this contest?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am aware that litigation took place, but I understand Captain Mackintosh did not initiate it, and that the decision on appeal is in his favour. It does not appear that houses were removed, but rather the rifle range, with butts, targets, and magazine. No further action is contemplated at the War Office.

CORK DISTRICT LUNATIC ASYLUM.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will explain why the Board of Control in Dublin have objected to medical students visiting the Eglinton or Cork District Lunatic Asylum for the purpose of obtaining clinical instruction, although the students have been in the habit of visiting the institution for years past; and whether the Board of Governors have expressed their disapprobation of the mandate of the Board of Control?

MR. JACKSON: I think the hon. Member must be misinformed, because I am told that neither the Board of Control nor the Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums in Ireland have interfered in any way with the visits of medical students to the Cork District Lunatic Asylum. I have also received information from the resident medical superintendent of the asylum, in which he says that—

“No action whatever has been taken for removing medical students from this asylum, and, in fact, I have only just finished my three months' course of clinical instruction to students.”

OPEN-AIR PREACHING AT ARKLOW.

MR. JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received information concerning the ill-treatment last Sunday, at Arklow, of the Protestant clergyman; whether the police have instructions to prevent open-air preaching in that town; and whether there is any existing law which prohibits such preaching in Ireland under British rule?

*MR. JACKSON: My hon. Friend appears to have been misinformed as to the facts of this case. There is no law prohibiting open-air preaching in Ireland. The action of the police in this matter has been solely for the purpose of preventing the assembling together of people in the streets under circumstances likely to lead to a breach of the peace, and to cause an obstruction of the highway.

MR. SEXTON: Has not the rev. gentleman referred to been already committed to prison by a competent Court for obstructing the public thoroughfare?

*MR. JACKSON: Well, Sir, I believe the fact is that he was ordered to pay a fine, and in default of payment he was committed to prison.

SAVINGS BANK INSPECTORS.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether he can inform the House what number of Inspectors have been appointed under the Savings Bank Act of last Session, the names of the Inspectors, by whom they were nominated, and the amount of remuneration in each case; whether the appointments are permanent or for a term of years, and what are the conditions of their appointment; whether any annual Reports are to be presented to Parliament of the work done, the banks inspected, and the results of the investigations made; whether the Inspectors have to pass a Civil Service examination by the Civil Service Commissioners, or are selected from the Society of Chartered Accountants; and whether he will present a Return to this House, giving the name of each Inspector, his profession, his area of inspection, and the names of the parties by whom he was nominated for the post?

*MR. GOSCHEN: With regard to the third paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I may call his attention to Section 3 (Sub-section 7) of the Act under which the Committee is appointed. This clause requires that the Committee should annually Report their proceedings, and that the Report should be laid on the Table of the House. The approval of the Treasury is required for the appointment of officers by the Committee. Proposals for the appointment of Inspectors have been made by the Committee, and are still under the consideration of the Treasury. I am, therefore, unable to give the hon. Member the information for which he asks, but I may state that the scheme of inspection proposed by the Committee is tentative, and the appointments are intended to be of a temporary nature.

MR. HOWELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman lay on the Table a Return giving the names of the general candidates, and by whom they are proposed and seconded?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think it would be most unusual to give the names of those by whom the candidates are proposed. They are appointed by the Committee under the provisions of the Act, and the Committee would be responsible.

MR. HOWELL: I beg to give notice that on the Estimates I shall bring this question before the House.

SHEEP DOG LICENCES.

MR. A. SUTHERLAND (Sutherland): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Inland Revenue Authorities in Scotland are contrary to usage refusing to exempt from licence dogs kept and used by crofters solely for the purpose of tending sheep and cattle on their holdings; and whether such refusal by the Inland Revenue Authorities is in conformity with the law?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Certificates of exemption are granted in every case where it is proved to the satisfaction of the Commissioners of Inland Revenue that the applicant's dog is kept solely for the purpose of tending sheep or cattle, and no new departure has been made with regard to their issue.

POSTMEN'S GOOD CONDUCT PAY.

MR. HAMMOND (Carlow): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, according to the Regulations of the Department, postmen, urban and rural, who have completed five years' service, and against whom no unfavourable record has been made, are entitled each to one good conduct badge, with increase of pay; whether he is aware that, in some of the Irish districts, postmen who have had periods of service much longer than five years, and against whom no unfavourable record has been made, have not received such badge or increase of pay; and whether he will direct that such postmen shall be allowed in future these advantages, and that they be now paid respectively the sums to which they would appear to have been entitled since they have completed five years' service?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The answer to the first question is in the affirmative; to the second in the negative. It is certainly intended that Irish postmen of good conduct shall receive equal treatment to those elsewhere. It is only since July, 1891, that good conduct badges have been unlimited in number, and it would not be possible to make the good conduct pay retrospective beyond that date in favour of men who, though qualified, had not attained to the badge.

THE OUTGOING POST AT DRINAGH.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been directed to the inconvenience occasioned to the inhabitants of Drinagh, County Cork, in consequence of the outgoing daily post taking place at ten o'clock a.m.; whether letters taken at ten a.m. are sent on by the 7.45 mail train from Dunmanway, which is distant only seven miles; and if, under the circumstances, an afternoon or later outgoing post will be granted to the people of Drinagh?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Arrangements are in progress for giving a later outgoing post to Drinagh. The effect will be to afford an interval of nearly three hours for reply.

FISHING BOATS FOR THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD.

Dr. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact, as announced by the Rev. Mr. Green, Fishery Commissioner, in his recent communication to the Congested Districts Board, "that two fishing boats have been built in the Isle of Man for the Board"; whether these boats could have been as well built for the Board at Passage Docks, Carrigaloe, Cork Harbour, or at Arklow; whether he is aware that several fishing boats recently built at the two first-mentioned places, assisted by public subscription raised in Cork, are now considered the steepest, most handy, and best sea-going fishing smacks in the Kinsale fishing district, which numbers hundreds, including Manx, Cornish, and French vessels; and whether, if more fishing vessels are to be built for the Board, a further attempt will be made to encourage the fish industry by employing the Cork Harbour and Arklow shipwrights, to believe Irish wants by Irish labour?

Mr. JACKSON: Perhaps the hon. Member will postpone the question, as we have not been able to get the information he desires.

Dr. TANNER: I will put it down for Wednesday next; and may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to see that there are no boats built between this and next week?

Mr. JACKSON: I do not think the hon. Gentleman need fear that any boats will be built between this and next week.

Dr. TANNER: Or started.

THE SCARCITY IN MADRAS.

Mr. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the attention of the Secretary of State for India has been directed to a telegram forwarded to the Governor of Madras by a large meeting of the inhabitants of Salem, in which it is stated that the crops are entirely withered; that there is scarcity of water even for drinking purposes; that severest measures are taken by local Authorities for collecting revenue; and that the meeting prayed that collection of revenue might be postponed under the present circumstances; and whether the Secretary of State for India will give immediate directions for the postponement of the collection of revenue in this famine-stricken district?

*Mr. CURZON: The Secretary of State has not seen the telegram described in the question. The Governor of Madras telegraphed yesterday on the subject as follows:—

"Drinking water scarce in Salem town and Taluk, but every possible means taken to allviate. Current year's expenditure from local Municipal Funds for improving water supply Rs. 2,600 Salem town, Rs. 19,120 Salem district excluding Rs. 126,000 well loans, advanced for 680 wells constructed or in progress. Collector strenuously denies pressure of revenue collection. Half Ryotwari demand, about one lakh, postponed till next financial year. Remission on irrigated land will be given at the next annual assessment of the revenue demand."

In view of this statement and of the telegrams of July and September last regarding the liberal suspension of land revenue, which I quoted in the Debate raised by the hon. Member on the scarcity in India, the Secretary of State does not see any necessity for issuing further instructions in the matter.

GENERAL CATTLE DISEASES FUND.

Mr. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table the account for the last completed year of the General Cattle Diseases Fund; and whether in connection with the said account he will furnish a Return showing the amount of money expended in each county or union on account of salaries, remuneration, expenses, allowances, compensation, and also the amount levied by Local Government Boards on each county or union? And at the same time, may I ask if the accounts are ever audited by the Comptroller or Auditor General, or by an independent authority?

Mr. JACKSON: With regard to the last question, I have no information on the point; I presume that the accounts are audited. I understand that the Report, in pursuance of the 29th Section of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act of 1878, is, as regards Ireland, annually presented to Parliament a gives the information asked for by the hon. Member. The last Report presented was for the year 1890; the Report for 1891 is now in the printer's hands.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Does not that Report refer only to orders made in regard to cattle, and not include accounts and charges?

MR. JACKSON: I cannot say if that is the case.

THE WEARING OF THE SHAMROCK.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief leaves to the discretion of commanding officers to determine what amount of braid or other ornaments may be worn on the caps or tunics of troops, or if such matters are settled by a Central Authority at the Horse Guards or War Office; and if it is only on such details of dress as touch on the wearing of national emblems that commanding officers may use their discretion?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In answer to the first question, those details are clearly laid down in the published Regulations of the War Office.

COLONEL NOLAN: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of the question.

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In answer to the second part of the question, the discretion of the commanding officer clearly applies.

COLONEL NOLAN: Does it only apply in this case?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: All matters outside the Regulations laid down by the War Office are at the discretion of the commanding officer.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if, where commanding officers use the discretion permitted to them by the Commander-in-Chief, and do not forbid by General or Regimental Orders, or otherwise, the wearing of shamrock on St. Patrick's Day, in such cases it is or will be permissible to officers junior to commanding officers to order the removal of the Irish emblem?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The commanding officer of a corps is responsible for the conduct and discipline of all its members, and he will exercise absolute discretion in the matter.

COLONEL NOLAN: But if the colonel of a regiment has made no order whatever, will the captain be in a position to exercise such authority?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I have already answered that question. None of these emblems can be worn without the permission of the commanding officer.

SCHOOL TEACHERS' CERTIFICATES.

MR. H. R. FARQUHARSON (Dorset, W.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether a head teacher of a school holding second grade certificates for freehand, perspective, geometry, and blackboard, can obtain grants for teachers in his school on their successfully passing in any of the above subjects?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): Grants are made to managers of a school on account of the passing of pupil teachers in drawing of the second grade, but not of certificated and assistant teachers.

RETURN UNDER THE ALLOTMENTS ACTS.

MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board when the Return of land acquired by Local Authorities under the Allotments Acts is likely to be presented and issued to Members?

*MR. RITCHIE: The Return has to be obtained from more than 600 Local Authorities, and some time must elapse before there is any probability of this Return being completed and issued to Members.

HOUSE FEES FOR PRIVATE BILLS.

MR. LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government will appoint a Select Committee to consider the question of "House" fees charged in respect of Private Bills?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In answer to my hon. Friend, I must say I do not think this question is yet quite ripe for further action. He is aware that it is not one which is affected in any way by the Private Bill Procedure Bill, which was read a first time the other day, and he is also aware that any large alteration in the question of House fees would be best taken in hand in concert with the House of Lords. On the whole, I do not feel disposed to move in the matter.

PARLIAMENTARY AGENTS.

MR. MARK STEWART (Kirkcudbright) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Scotch solicitors will be allowed to conduct the preliminary stages of Scotch Private Bills in either House of Parliament before they are referred to the Commission under the proposed Private Bill Procedure legislation ; and whether the employment of a Parliamentary agent is optional or imperative ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : In regard to the first paragraph, Scotch solicitors are certainly able to act as Parliamentary agents. The employment of a Parliamentary agent is, I believe, imperative in the conduct of a Bill in this House.

CLERGY DISCIPLINE (IMMORALITY) BILL.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, &c.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that a Committee of Convocation is now sitting for the purpose of preparing canons bearing upon clergy discipline ; and whether, in view of this fact, he will postpone the Second Reading of the Clergy Discipline (Immorality) Bill until such Committee has presented its Report ? May I also ask whether the paragraph in yesterday's Times is correct—that it is the intention of the Government not to press the Second Reading of the Bill before Easter ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have not seen the paragraph in question, and I can only say, in answer to the hon. Gentleman's question on that subject, that I am desirous of getting on with the Bill before Easter ; but, as the House is aware, there is much business to be done before Easter, and I am not very sanguine on the point. As regards the question on the Paper, I do think it very desirable that the clergy in Convocation should have an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the Bill, and I trust that they will do so. I cannot pledge myself to imperil the passage of the Bill by waiting an undue length of time for such expression of opinion.

MR. PICTON (Leicester) : Are there any recent precedents which would justify the House in waiting on the decision of Convocation ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : The hon. Gentleman will observe that I said nothing about waiting for the decision of Convocation. What I said was that it was very desirable that the House should have the opinion of the clergy expressed ; in any legislation affecting that or any other body we are always glad of such an expression of opinion.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to announce the names of the Royal Commissioners to whom the question of a Teaching University for London (the Gresham University) will be referred ?

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is able to state the terms of the reference to a Royal Commission of the question of University education in London, and the names of the Commissioners ?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have to ask if the hon. Gentlemen will put off their questions till Monday, on which day I hope to be able to give a full and complete reply.

THE CONTROL OF THE PROVINCIAL POLICE.

MR. J. O'CONNOR : In consequence of the answer of the Home Secretary to Question 19, I desire to ask him again if there is any abuse of authority on the part of the police or inspectors of the police in England in the administration of the law, which Minister of the Crown is responsible in this House for such abuse, and whose duty is it to answer questions in this House concerning the same ?

*MR. MATTHEWS : I should be extremely glad if the hon. Member would put that question on the Paper, because it is one I should like to answer with full deliberation and perfect accuracy. I can only repeat what I said before, that, so far as I am aware, no Minister of the Crown is responsible for any misconduct in his office by a provincial policeman or police inspector. The Minister of the Crown has neither the choice of the policeman nor the right to dismiss him, and has no authority to give him any order whatsoever. The police are appointed and dismissed by the Chief Constable in counties, and in a town like Birmingham, which is referred to here, by the Watch Committee; therefore no Minister of the Crown is responsible for wrong conduct by a policeman in the discharge of his office. On the other point, I would rather defer to your authority, Sir; but I apprehend that a Minister who is not responsible for any particular act or misconduct is not bound to answer questions about that matter in this House.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to give Notice that I shall put a question on the Paper to-morrow on this subject, and if the reply I receive is anything like the reply I have received now, I will address to you a question on a point of Order.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to give Notice that I will ask to-morrow whether the police of, say Walsall, are only responsible to the Watch Committee, and that Ministers have no authority over them?

*MR. MATTHEWS: That is exactly what I said. The only point of contact between the Home Secretary and the provincial police consists of the certificates which he has to issue to enable them to get their share of the money contributed to the Exchequer Contribution Account or to the Pension Fund. If, in the judgment of the Home Secretary, the local force shows want of efficiency, either in numbers or discipline, he can withhold the certificate, and in that way influence those who have authority.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM: I shall call attention to the question on the Estimates.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman is able to state what finance will be taken to-morrow, and, so far as he can, what will be the order of business next week?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: With regard to to-morrow, the Government are bound by the existing regulation, as the House is aware, to deal on Friday morning only with Supply, and I propose to take Class 1 of the Civil Service Estimates. On Monday I propose to begin the discussion in Committee on the Small Holdings Bill, and I think it will be generally convenient that it should be taken every day next week. I shall not ask the House to give more time than the Government have at present, but to relax the regulation by which Tuesday and Friday mornings are allocated to Supply, so that we may on those days, if necessary, take the Committee on the Small Holdings Bill. We should not take the Committee on Wednesday.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS: Will any Army Estimates be taken to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think I shall put down Civil Service Estimates only.

A CORRECTION.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): In the Votes and Proceedings of the House issued this morning, the Amendment moved by my hon. Friend yesterday to the Bill proposed by the hon. Member below the Gangway was put down in my name. The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lea) moved the Amendment—I merely supported it.

EVIDENCE IN CRIMINAL CASES BILL.

MR. M. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to take the fourth Order this evening?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; in the absence of my right hon. and learned Friend who has charge of the Bill, I shall not take it this evening. I cannot say when it will be taken.

THE BUDGET.

SIR W. HARCOURT: I understand the right hon. Gentleman stated that the Budget would be taken on Monday week. Does that still stand?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think probably that will be the course adopted; but I should not like to pledge myself to that.

NEW MEMBER SWORN.

Joseph Austen Chamberlain, esquire, for the County of Worcester (Eastern Division).

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to confer further powers upon the Great Northern Railway Company with respect to their own Undertaking and Undertakings in which they are jointly interested; and for other purposes." [Great Northern Railway Bill [Lords.]]

And, also, a Bill intituled, "An Act to extend the periods limited for the compulsory purchase of lands for and for the completion of the authorised railways of the Hull and North Western Junction Railway Company." [Hull and North Western Junction Railway (Extension of Time) Bill [Lords.]]

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 208.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*(4.55.) THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): Mr. Speaker, in rising to move that this Bill be now read a second time, I do not think it will be necessary for me to do more than remind the House of the way in which this money arises for distribution—which has come to be known by the convenient name of the Equivalent Grant. It is the sum which arises for Scotland in proportion to the fee grant given to England out of the Imperial funds in last Session. I would point out that the amount of the sum, although £265,000 is in the Bill as the amount available at present, may and probably will vary from year to year accordingly as the English quota varies. I do not propose to say anything as to the propriety or accuracy of the calculation which brings out the figure at £265,000, for reasons which have already been explained to the House. That would be dealt with in a general discussion on the financial relations of the three Divisions of the Kingdom. The mode in which the fee grant for Scotland is fixed, and the way in which it is distributed, is sufficiently in the minds of hon. Members to discharge me from the duty of saying much about it; but I think it right to explain in a very few words the financial aspects of the Bill. Hon. Members will observe that we begin by repealing part of a certain section of the Local Government Act of 1889, and I desire to make this explanation, to show the intention of the Government in making the proposal, that the fee grant was made out of the sum at the credit of the Local Taxation Account. In 1889 the residue of the Local Taxation Account was devoted to the relief of fees, and in 1890 an additional sum not exceeding £40,000 was devoted to the relief of fees. In one sense that was a very proper and satisfactory arrangement; but at the same time, inasmuch as the English fee grant is payable out of Imperial funds, and not out of the taxes assigned to local purposes, it was thought that if for no other reason than to furnish the basis of a proper comparison between the Local Taxation Accounts applicable to the two parts of the Kingdom, the fee grant should be laid substantially upon the same Imperial funds in the two cases. We do not thereby make any difference in the amount at the credit of the Local Taxation Account, but simply alter its purposes by taking the fee grant from that account and placing it on the Imperial funds, and substituting the other purposes specified in the Bill to which this fund is to be devoted. This adjustment of the grant makes no difference whatever in the amount which Scotland receives, or in the amount which stands at the credit of the Local Taxation Account. It has really the effect of re-adjusting the account, so that the fee grant comes out of it to the extent answering the amount of the fee grant in England. For all purposes beyond that the fee grant remains in the Local Taxation Account; but to that extent the account is set free to be devoted to other purposes, which are set forth in the Bill. It will not be necessary for me to deal at any length with the details of the Bill, with which hon. Members are already sufficiently familiar; but there is one branch of the subject on which it will be expected I should give, and on which I undertook to give, some further explanation, and that is with respect to the item which comes first in the Bill—namely, the sum which we purpose to devote to the furtherance of secondary education in Scotland. That amount, as has already been stated in this House, is £60,000, and the Bill provides that it shall be devoted to defraying the cost of inspection of higher class schools, of holding examinations for leaving certificates, and for making advances for secondary education under the Minutes of the Department, both for urban and rural schools. The first question which arises on such a matter is the principle upon which the amount is to be divided. It may be possible—and I think the suggestion was made from the other side of the House—that it should be divided by counties, or districts, according to any standard you may think fair, such as population or valuation, leaving the further distribution to what I may call some Central Local Authority. That would have the merit of facility, so far as Parliament is concerned, but it appears to be open to two objections to which I think the scheme of the Government is not open. One of these is that it is, at all events, difficult to see how such a mode of distributing the money would work in with the existence of School Boards. The relation of School Boards to a central authority would require to be very carefully considered; and, in addition to that, it does appear to me clear enough that the county does not form a very reasonable or convenient basis for the district education arrangements. I shall merely shadow forth what we propose in the Bill. We propose that the money to be devoted to secondary education should in the main be applied in proportion to the amount of secondary education supplied in the various districts, and that under certain clearly defined conditions. The result would be that each district would obtain its share of the grant according to its proportion, and the main advantage of that is that it would further what is really the chief necessity of secondary education in Scotland—namely, that there should be better organisation. With reference to the conditions attaching to the distribution of the money, there are certain things to be aimed at which limit the conditions that can be imposed. In the first place, it will be admitted without any dissent that it would not do to interfere more than is absolutely necessary with the existing resources, which are already applicable in that direction. In the second place, while there are many parents ready to pay in some cases a large, and in many cases a moderate, fee for secondary education, it is desirable that those who cannot afford to do so should have their aim furthered by the application of this grant, so that all pupils desirous of going forward may have no obstacle in the way; and, thirdly, that all classes of pupils fitted for taking this additional step should, so far as possible, both for the sake of the scholars themselves and for husbanding the resources, be brought together for the purpose of education. The best mode, in the opinion of the Government, is by imposing a condition that the fee to be charged should not exceed a certain fixed amount per head upon the average attendance. The result of such a condition would be that the localities would each derive a fair revenue from fees, while at the same time the average fee would be kept down to the advantage of those who cannot afford to pay any fee, or only a moderate one, either by the provision of a certain number of free places, or by the lowering of the fees over the whole school to a very moderate sum. We propose to leave very much to the locality itself the choice between these various modes. The amount of the fee we propose is £3 per head per annum. At the present time the average fee in the burgh schools of Scotland is £6. In some it is a good deal more, and in those cases, probably, the fee would not be reduced, because the schools supply a want which would not be better supplied by lowering the fees. But it would not be desirable to debar such schools from participation in the grant, or to exclude poor people from the advantages of the education which there given. Therefore, the result of our proposal would be that the capitation grant which we should propose to give for children in the higher class schools is £3 per head per annum on the average attendance at the schools; but where the fee is so large that the managers could not or would not reduce it to the limit of £3, then the schools would be entitled to participate in the grant to the extent of £3 per head, not on the average attendance, but upon the number of free admissions available to those who desire it. I will give a figure or two showing how this works out: The average attendance as it at present stands in the burgh schools in Scotland is 5,500, and the cost of education something near £9 a head. But we cannot count upon 5,500 children. In the schools I have already mentioned, where the fees would not be reduced, the attendance could not be taken as a basis of calculation, and we think it probable that about 4,000 will be the number in respect of whom the grant will be claimed, and that would suppose of about £12,000. At the same time, it must be remembered that we should expect a considerable increase in attendance in the secondary schools. The age for secondary education may be laid down as between 13 and 16, and of children of that age there are probably 270,000 in Scotland. Of these there are in elementary schools at present 50,000, and it is not too sanguine an expectation that these may be in course of time, and at a very long time, raised to 80,000; and taking that figure from the total number of children I have given, there will be left about 190,000 children who are of the age to go forward to secondary education. But it is found from experience that only about one-sixth would do so. Therefore, taking one-sixth of the figure I have given—45,000—it would result in a probable attendance in the secondary schools of 30,000, which is an increase of about 20,000 over the number attending now. If we put it more moderately, suppose that 8,000 children were added, the result would be this: that these schools should receive a capitation grant which would then amount to £36,000, and then the fees would be reduced, as a condition of sharing the grant, to an average of £3 a head, which would yield £36,000 more. So that the result would be the education of 12,000 additional children, and £72,000 would be the amount of the grant and the fees. That is the main condition, but there are other conditions to which I may just advert which we propose to lay on those who wish to participate in the grant. One of them, as might naturally be supposed, is the inspection of the schools which are to participate, to insure the efficiency of instruction, and also of the equipment of the schools; and we should propose, to render that effective, that the test should be the results of the leaving certificate examination. The other condition would be to admit some element of popular representation in the management. As regards the burgh schools properly so called, they are under the School Boards, and you have the representation already in hand. In some of the burghs in Scotland there are endowed schools which have been remodelled in recent years, and there is in them a sufficiently representative element to meet what we view as the just demand of the Department in that particular. The third category of schools which I desire to come in might do so on giving the School Boards some substantial representation in the management. So far for the burghs; but it is plain that secondary schools do not cover the whole field of secondary education, and, therefore, it is necessary also to take into account the country districts. Now, here of course it is desirable to avoid the undue multiplication of opportunities for secondary education, in so far as that might lead to a waste of resources. Undoubtedly in the scattered districts there are many children who are ready and able to go forward, and yet it would be vain to attempt to bring secondary education to the doors of all in the sense in which we do it in the burghs. Therefore, it does seem necessary that there should be placed in the country districts some educational centre, where secondary education can be developed by secondary departments in the ordinary school: I need not dwell upon this at very great length, because the mere mention of it will show hon. Members what is proposed to be done. It is enough to say that such secondary department would be on the same footing as regards the grant as the secondary schools to which I have already adverted. There would be in such cases a substantial revenue from fees, and also from the grant; and in such cases it would, I think, be wise and proper to provide still further encouragement for the development of this kind of education in two directions. In the first place, it would be well to admit the children who are receiving secondary education to the leaving certificate examinations free of charge. In the second place, it is proposed in certain instances—not many in number probably, but it is impossible to say how many—to graduate the capitation grant according to the number of children gathered together in any particular quarter. That is to say, if the number attending is so small as to make the cost relatively very large, there should be a larger grant per head within limits to be fixed than the ordinary grant, which I have already mentioned, of £3 per annum. The expectation that we have formed, after the consideration we have given to the proposals under this head, is that about 5,000 children, more or less, would be received in the secondary departments of ordinary schools. Of course, the figures I have given are to a large extent estimates, the result of careful calculations, with due regard to the conditions of Scotland, but they must be tested by experience.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I understand that there are 32,000 children in the first class and 5,000 in the second.

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: That is so. The intention of the Government in making these proposals is that we should have the foundation of a really thorough organisation upon existing lines, which I regard as a very important matter. It will preserve the local initiative, and at the same time ensure a common aim and a common standard. In the Code recently issued we furnish an incentive to thoroughness in elementary education in the offer of a merit certificate; and that will serve as the starting-point of secondary education. We think that, under the conditions which I have very briefly sketched, no locality and no class in Scotland will feel excluded from the advantage of this grant. I do not think I should be justified in occupying the time of the House on the other items of the Bill. We propose to give to the Universities of Scotland £30,000 to be expended according to ordinances by the existing Commissioners. The Parochial Boards we propose to treat in the manner I have already explained by giving £25,000 as a further contribution towards the cost of pauper lunatics, and £50,000 to be distributed according to valuation in the relief of local rates. With reference to the former of these two sums, I may say that a sum of £90,500 was, under the Local Government Act of 1889, devoted to the medical relief of pauper lunatics, but calculations show that the matter has advanced so much further that this sum of £25,000 is required to put things in the same position as they were left by the Act of 1889. The remainder of the sum we propose to distribute in the manner to which I have referred—amongst the County and Town Councils in Scotland, in proportion to their valuation, as the Secretary for Scotland may determine. This is a proposal which has already had the sanction of Parliament: and, as it has worked well, I do not know that I need discuss it further. The arguments that have been submitted on previous occasions, with reference to the proper mode of allocating the sum to be given in relief of local rates as between Town and County Councils, do not appear at all conclusive against the propriety and fairness of the allocation laid down in the Bill. If any attempt be made to thresh out this question with reference to the distribution of this sum of money, I think it will be found in the end that no sufficient reason can be urged for departing from the principle of distribution which has already been sanctioned by Parliament. I beg to move that this Bill be now read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Lord Advocate.)

Sir C. J. Pearson

(5.31.) MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.) : This Bill comes before us in somewhat a new form, or, at any rate, the financial proposals it embodies are not such as I think we had a right to expect. At the same time, I must say I think the Lord Advocate was right when he treated the question of re-arrangement of the financial proposals as substantially making no difference as regards the main objects of the Bill. He devoted his introductory speech almost entirely to an exposition of the inefficacy of the present arrangements with a lucidity for which we are grateful to him, and of the scheme under which the Government propose to apply £60,000, or rather to allot it to secondary education in Scotland; but he gave us very little information indeed—or I should say he advanced very few arguments indeed—to justify the particular sum which they have allotted to education, and the allotment of a far larger sum to the relief of rates. Now, substantially, without going into the financial change of front which the Government have effected, and without discussing the excessively complicated plan—I am bound to say a plan which at present, even with the advantage of the explanation of the Lord Advocate, I am not able to follow—embodied in Sub-section 5, Section 2—without going into that, it will be sufficient for me to say, in broad terms, that the substance of this Bill is, it proposes to take the sum which falls to Scotland in respect of the grant for free education to England, and to apply it mainly to the relief of local rates. Now, why is it proposed to apply the money to the relief of local rates? That is the very first and fundamental question I have to ask. Is it proposed to apply to the relief of local rates only because such an application has been made of a similar fund in England? Now, the House, I hope, will bear in mind how this application of the Imperial grant to local rates took its origin. It took its origin in demands made upon the Parliament which sat in 1880-85 for the relief of local rates to be made out of Imperial Funds. These demands came only from England. No such demand, so far as I can recollect, was ever made by any responsible Scotch Member; and the discussions which we had repeatedly in this House between 1880 and 1885 were practically regarded as entirely English discussions, in which, no doubt, Scotch Members took part, but with which Scotland as an interested party had nothing to do. How, then, came the money to be given in relief of the Scotch rates? The Government had got the money; they found that it had been applied to a particular purpose in England, and they said they would adopt a similar course and apply it to a similar purpose in Scotland, and we have been told that the Scotch Local Authorities—the County Councils and Town Councils—said they would be glad to get the money. It would be very odd if they did not say that they would be glad to get the money. When the tempter, in the shape of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, came dangling a bag of gold before them, it would be very odd if the Local Authorities in Scotland did not accept the offer. But that makes no difference in the main fact, that this is a demand which was never made by Scotland. There has been no discontent with the incidence of the local rates in Scotland; we never asked to be relieved of these rates. All I can say is that so far as I have been able to ascertain, and so far as many hon. Members on this side of the House have been able to ascertain the wishes of their constituencies the demands made by the Scotch Town and County Councils did not represent the general wishes of the Scotch people; and, indeed, there are many of us who have had the information that, although the Councils did not think it was for them to refuse the gift that was offered, they themselves had no great eagerness in the matter. We come then to ask the question—whether this relief will be a success; will it be any benefit to the Scotch ratepayer? I shall not go again into the arguments set forth, and the figures given—the very interesting arguments and the very cogent figures—by my hon. Colleague in a previous Debate, to show the sort of relief that would fall upon the ratepayer; but what I desire to put before the House on this occasion is the fact that in making a distribution of the sum which comes to us once in a way and which will not occur again, we are making it in the form of a Bill, which is intended to be permanent. It is all very well to say we can legislate again on the subject. But, not to dwell upon the difficulty of passing Bills through two Houses of Parliaments, I rather desire to ask the House to consider how great will be the difficulty at a distant period of time of taking away money which has been given to Town and County Councils. To use an old proverb, it would be as hard to take a pat of butter out of a dog's mouth as to get this money back out of the pockets of the Town and County Councils when once they have accepted it. And that is the reason why I would ask if the Government are not prepared to give way on the different requests made to them, if they are not prepared with any better scheme, that they should, at all events, consent to have this scheme for one year only, and during that period give us an opportunity of ascertaining more fully the wishes of the Scotch people, and then propose a plan that will give the best expression to their views. These are the general grounds upon which I shall feel it my duty to vote against this Bill. But there is a special ground on which I am opposed to the provisions, as explained in the right hon. Gentleman's speech, which are proposed to be made for secondary education, and I put upon the Notice Paper a Motion by which I intended to call attention to that special aspect of the Bill. I have given Notice to move this—

"That it is inexpedient, without further inquiring into the educational needs of Scotland, to pass a measure permanently appropriating to certain specific objects in permanently fixed proportion the sum standing to the credit of the Local Taxation (Scotland) Account."

I do not propose—at any rate, at this stage—to move this Resolution, and for this reason: if I did so, it might have, I fear, the effect of narrowing the limits of our Debate upon the whole Bill, which I should be very sorry to do; and, therefore, although I think it worth while to call attention to that particular aspect as being one of the most important of this Bill which has come before us, I do not desire to ask the House to debate that point. But I do wish to call the attention of the House to the position in which the Bill, if it be carried, will leave Scotch secondary education. We should have expected that before a plan was laid before us—such a plan as the right hon. Gentleman has shadowed forth—we should have had some data in order to appreciate the appropriateness of that plan; that we should have had some public inquiry, by a Royal Commission or a Parliamentary Committee, into the condition of Scotch secondary education; or that we should have had a plan which set out in full, and put in plain black and white, these proposals, which, in spite of the care of the right hon. Gentleman, I have not been able, I confess, altogether to follow in his statement. But we have not anything of the kind. We have not even a memorandum to be placed before us, explaining these proposals of the Government; and we have, I may say, in coming to consider a question which is very vital to the future of Scotch education, no information practically on which to rely as to the needs of Scotland in this respect, or as to the best method by which these needs may be met. But, in my opinion, and, I think, in the opinion of nearly everybody who has considered Scotch education, I should say that the allotted sum of £60,000 was far too little for the needs of Scotch education. If we consider the several objects for which the money ought to be applied, and the needs of the localities, almost all the secondary schools are gathered together in a few large centres, so that there is a plethora here and a deficiency elsewhere; for we have to consider, not only the towns in Scotland, but the many parishes where no secondary school exists; and there are many towns where the educational difficulties are great owing to the thinness and the poverty of the population; and the amount of the salaries of the teachers of secondary schools are, as a rule, far lower than in England. Then, if we look at the greater demands which are made for continuation schools and evening schools, and the great extension which may be given to elementary education by the introduction of such a plan, we shall see that really we have no data at all for concluding that the sum of £60,000 is sufficient to satisfy, or to come near satisfying, the educational demands of the country. The right hon. Gentleman has given us some interesting suggestions, and I shall presently say some words on these points; but, after all, what does he ask the House to do? He has brought forward these particular suggestions of his, and he asks the House to consider them; but he does not give us an opportunity of expressing our opinions upon any one of them. He tells us that the Scotch Education Department at present propose to do so and so, but he does not embody these proposals in a measure. He does not even lay the Minute of the Scotch Education Department before us. He asks us—to use the expression used by the Chancellor of the Exchequer—to give a blank cheque to the Scotch Education Department. I have great respect for the Scotch Education Department. I know it contains many able men, the Secretary especially being a very great authority on education. but I decline—and I think this House ought to decline—to follow blindly the Scotch Education Department in this matter. In order not to be too vague, I should like to tell the right hon. Gentleman some points which he has not adverted to, and on which I think we want more information. I want to know whether it is proposed by the Bill to erect new secondary schools where none exist, as I understand it is not proposed to give any assistance to secondary education, except in burghs where there already exist secondary schools, or in the rural districts where they are to have super-added a secondary department to the elementary school; but it seems to omit altogether the case of burghs which do not possess at present secondary schools. With regard to the rural schools, he has told us that the Government propose to give grants in respect of secondary departments of these schools; and if I understood him aright he suggested that this should be done in rural districts not for every school, but that a certain number of schools should be selected to have a secondary department created in them, and that these schools should serve the needs of other parishes, besides the parish in which they were situated. If that proposal is made—and there is a great deal to be said on the point—surely, something further is needed. Take a county. Are we to understand that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to choose out some six or eight centres or places where secondary schools should be erected; and that that secondary department is to be left entirely under the management of the local School Board? I submit that that would be very unfair to the rest of the county; and I think it would be an unfair application of the money which was equitably given to the rest of the county. We have in Aberdeen about 90 School Boards. The sum of money, I believe, demanded out of the £60,000 would be about £2,500. If you distribute that over 90 School Boards it would give about £28 to each School Board. Clearly that would be an improvident and wasteful way of spending money. It is proposed to choose a number of places well situated to be sites for secondary schools and to erect them there. Why should the School Boards of these places have the entire management of these schools? The other parishes in which the money is equitably given ought to have a share in it. And instead of this crude and imperfect scheme we should have a comprehensive scheme which would not only create secondary schools in burghs where they do not exist, but also establish a proper system of organisation in towns; creating Boards superior to the ordinary School Boards, and having representatives either of the surrounding parishes or from the county at large to administer the schools, which, in fact, would be schools serving the whole county. I do not find in the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman anything to show that he has dealt with that question. Now let me put another point to the right hon. Gentleman. He talked of the existing secondary schools, and he proposed where any school which is not now a school under county management and control is to receive a share of this grant, that it should admit something of the nature of a representative element upon its Governing Body. Now that is a thing which many of us are very glad to hear. The House will remember that when a similar provision was made with regard to the elementary schools of England in this House, it was refused by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Are the Scotch Education Department to determine what are to be the relations between secondary schools and those schools which are not now under School Boards? These are matters which belong to legislation, and are not matters fit to be settled by a Minute of the Department; and, therefore, we are also entitled to have, I think, not only fuller information upon them, but to have the views of the Government embodied in a shape in which the opinion of the House might be taken upon it. I need hardly call the attention of the House to the fact that in the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill, passed four years ago, a County Authority was created for the purpose of administering secondary education, and the existence of that authority has been found extremely valuable in Wales. I see the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. H. Dyke Acland) in his place, and he will be able to give the House fuller information on that subject than I can; but I think I am correct in saying that nothing has done more good, nothing has more stimulated the people to establish new schools—than the creation of a County Authority; and it seems to me we are making a great mistake if we lose this opportunity of trying to create some County Authority for secondary education in Scotland. I do not exclude the possibility of grouping the smaller counties into one body for this purpose. That brings me to another point—the relation between technical education and secondary education. Two years ago we allowed the County Councils to apply considerable sums of money to promote technical education. Anyone who looks into the matter will see that the more you can connect technical education with secondary education generally the better for both, and that, in fact, you cannot really work technical education unless you hinge it on to secondary education. Would it not, therefore, be a mistake if, when we are going to apply a large sum to promote secondary education we were to disjoin that sum entirely from the body which administer the Technical Education Grant? Surely here is another reason for having a more comprehensive scheme for enabling us to bring these two into one system and endeavouring to connect the two departments. I do not wish to enter into any discussion as to which of these plans is the better. What I submit upon the statement of the Lord Advocate is that this is a question far more difficult and complicated than can be solved by the allotment of a certain sum of money. He has shown no reason why the sum of £60,000 is sufficient. I think before we permanently determine that £60,000 or £70,000 or £80,000 is a sufficient sum we ought to have a full inquiry into the condition of Scotch education; and then a comprehensive scheme should be laid before us in the shape of a Bill. I will only say before sitting down that I hope no one will suppose that we do not look upon this question of secondary education as of far more importance as regards the poorer class than as regards even the rich middle class. I think much more could be done than this grant ever could effect to stimulate secondary education in Scotland; and it is chiefly for the sake of giving a better chance to the poorer children to carry their education further that we plead for the extension of the sum. I do not mean for a moment to exclude or disparage the other objects for which the money is to be applied. Many of them are a great deal better than applying it in the relief of rates. I desire to put the issue as between education and the rates; and I say that by applying this money to education we should do far more for the benefit of the Scottish people by extending and furthering the educational facilities open to them than by giving it in relief of the rates, which, no doubt, in the case of some Local Bodies, may be reckoned by pounds, which, in the case of the large middle class, will be reckoned by shillings, but which, in the case of the great mass of the community, will be reckoned only by pennies. In giving such relief we shall be throwing away one of the best opportunities for materially relieving and developing Scotch education that was ever presented to us, and we shall be wasting the money and shall be losing a chance which in our lifetime may never occur again.

*(5.55.) MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): The first question that arises in connection with the Equivalent Grant to Scotland is the question whether we should give effect to the proposals of the Government by Bill or by Vote. I honestly confess that I should consider it an insuperable argument against proceeding by Bill if by so doing we stereotyped the sum of £265,000 a year, which is Scotland's present share of the grant, and if Scotland were consequently not to get the benefit of any expansion that may occur in the case of the English grant. But my right hon. Friend the Lord Advocate has told us, and a careful perusal of the Bill most clearly shows us, that if we proceed by this Bill our Equivalent Grant will not be stereotyped, and that we shall get the benefit of any elasticity that there may be in the English grant. That being so, I cannot see any objection to proceeding by Bill, or any argument in favour of proceeding by Vote. As a matter of course, it stands to reason that it is absolutely necessary, in order that our financial arrangements may be useful, that they should have some degree of permanency about them. Our hon. Friends opposite who say that we ought to proceed by Vote rather than by Bill have none of the Local Representative Bodies at their back. The County Councils and Town Councils are all unanimous in asking that we should proceed by Bill and not by Vote; so are all the Parochial Boards. The School Boards of Scotland are also in favour of a Bill; so is the Educational Institute of Scotland, and so is the Secondary Teachers' Association. On the 9th March a deputation came to this House, and had a conference with certain hon. Members who are in favour of secondary education and opposed to the relief of the rates. Now, that deputation represented very accurately the feeling of the School Boards of Scotland, the feeling of the Educational Institute of Scotland, and the feeling of the Secondary Teachers' Association of Scotland. And what said that deputation? They said—I can only give the account from the newspapers, as I was not present at the conference myself—they had a great dread of anything like a temporary arrangement, that they hoped the arrangements would be made not only for one year, but on a permanent footing; and then they went on to say that one of the chief difficulties which they had laboured under for many years was the great difficulty of uncertainty. The champions of secondary education in Scotland would rather have their £60,000 as a certainty than possibly a larger sum as an uncertainty. As a further argument in favour of a Bill rather than a Vote let me add that really I do not think that any of us would like to see further and constant dissension among hon. Members on the benches opposite, and we must remember that this dissension will continue year after year if we do not proceed by Bill. An hon. Member opposite said—

“I sincerely hope that this may be the last time we shall be called upon in this House to discuss an Equivalent Grant.”

Now, that hope cannot possibly be fulfilled unless we proceed by Bill and not by Vote. We must give a real permanence to the matter, or year after year the arrangements will be subjected to discussion and alteration. The Bill before us, as its name implies, provides one grant for education and another for the relief of local rates. It gives a grant of £90,000 a year to education—£60,000 for secondary education, and £30,000 for Scotch Universities—and £175,000 a year for the relief of rates. The whole sum dealt with by the Bill is £265,000 a year. Let me take, first, the grant of £60,000 for secondary education. I have listened very carefully to the words which have fallen from my right hon. Friend as to what is to be done for the rural districts. I am perhaps not quite as sanguine with regard to the success of the secondary education arrangements in rural districts as he is, but, at the same time, I think it is an experiment which is well worth trying; and in view of the fact that we get £45,000 a year in the Equivalent Grant more than we ever expected, I think we can afford to be generous in respect of £90,000, though it ought really to come of Imperial Funds. The £90,000 to be given to education is, however, the very utmost that can be given to it; the balance is the irreducible minimum that we, the defenders of the ratepayers, can accept as sufficient. I am now to the question of the relief of the rate. £175,000 a year is to be devoted to that purpose. I am delighted to be able to congratulate the Government on having the unanimous support of all the Political Parties in this House—that is to say, the Party so ably represented by the hon. Member for St. Rollox, who is an even greater enthusiast for the principle of "one man one vote" than for the principle of "one man one vote." The hon. Member for St. Rollox, as the accredited spokesman of his Party, put the case in such a complete form that I will venture to repeat his words to the House. He said on the 13th March, 1890—

"Now the Government have themselves proposed to take 3d. per £1 out of the pockets of the ratepayers of Scotland for free education."

Of course, that statement is not exactly accurate, but it emphasises in a rough-and-ready way his line of argument. He went on to say—

"It is a mistake to suppose that I and those who think with me wish to burden the already burdened ratepayer in Glasgow. We want free education in England as well as in Scotland. If free education be given to England it must come out of the Imperial Treasury, and be accompanied by an equal grant to Scotland. Free education in England is the restoration to the Scotch ratepayer of 3d. per £1."

I think that was exceedingly well put by the hon. Member for St. Rollox. I hope he will act up to his words. There are also two other factors in favour of the Government proposal for the relief of the rates. First, there is the attitude of the right hon. Member for Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman), who first spoke of the relief as "brutal," and afterwards tried to explain it away by saying he was talking in French. He said he was sorry I did not understand the French meaning of the word "brutal." Now, as a former Foreign Office man, I am quite prepared to enter into a competitive examination with the right hon. Gentleman in the French language. It must, however, be the French of France, and not in the French of the Stirling Burghs—still, the French of the Stirling Burghs is not to be despised. Imagine the magnificent resources of vituperation contained in a language in which the word "brutal" is by no means an uncomplimentary adjective—why such phrases as "brutal" Balfour dwindle down to "simple" Balfour, or even "naked" Balfour. I wish to draw special attention to this matter, because we find that the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs is gradually coming more and more to our side; and I begin to hope he will, perhaps on this question as in that of Home Rule for Ireland, to use his own choice phrase, "find salvation." Then the fact also that we have the right hon. Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) on our side speaks volumes for our case, because he, in politics, can hardly be said to be Quixotic, or likely to go far out of his way to help a lame dog over a stile. On the contrary, he would be more likely to watch which way the cat was going to jump, and then give a helping hand to that jumping cat. Right hon. Gentlemen opposite complain of the way the Government have of dangling money in front of various classes in Scotland. They say it is demoralising and dishonest, but I would ask the hon. Member for Blackfriars, who applauds that statement, why he wishes to disendow the Church of Scotland? Does he wish to dangle that money before the faces of the people of Scotland? What does he propose to do with the Church Funds? An hon. Member opposite suggested "baths" as a specially great object. "Rob religion and build baths" would indeed make an admirable battle cry. I believe that the people of Scotland were so keen for free education that they would have been willing to make some sacrifice for it. They would certainly have been willing to have free education even without any relief of taxation. How much more grateful must they be to the Government for that great boon of free education, together with a relief of both rates and taxation.

(5.22.) MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down made one observation with reference to the grant for secondary education which shows that he is labouring under the delusion that nothing can be done except in the form of a Bill, forgetting altogether that the whole of our elementary education rests upon an annual grant, and that it is of a permanent character. If there were one thing wanted to convince us of the propriety of dealing with this question in a provisional way for the current year, it would be the extremely crude, imperfect, and wholly unsatisfactory delineation of the plan of secondary education which fell from the Lord Advocate. Anything less complete, anything less scientific, anything less exhaustive, could hardly be imagined. His ideas are of the crudest possible character. It is evident that the Government have not formed a plan. I will now put the question again, which I raised on a former occasion—namely, with regard to the amount of money coming to Scotland under this Bill, How is it that it has not been distributed on the same principle as in England? I believe the reason is that it would increase the sum for the present year from £265,000 to £270,000; although that is a very small matter. What the Government does by this Bill is to raise the extremely difficult and thorny question of the financial arrangements of Scotland and England with regard to Imperial expenditure. Now, if the Government had appointed a Committee to inquire into that subject, I should not have said a word with regard to it; but it is clear, from the course the Government have pursued, that they do not mean to appoint that Committee. There will be no inquiry so far as they are concerned. In the course of last year the Treasury put forth an elaborate and careful statement showing, according to their view, the amount of money which was contributed to the Imperial services of England, Scotland, and Ireland, and also the amount of monies which those countries respectively obtained from the Imperial Government. The remarkable fact about that document was that on the surface it appears to show that Scotland was slightly overtaxed, and the general result of the paper was to make out that a great loss was sustained through Ireland, and that that loss fell principally upon England and not upon Scotland. Now, that is an entirely delusive theory.

Mr. Hunter

Taking the figures of Customs and Excise, I find that for last year alone in England the total receipts from Customs and Excise was a trifle under £37,000,000. If you take the population, you will find that if England paid £37,000,000 Scotland ought to have paid a little over £5,109,000, while we actually paid £6,100,000, or more than a million beyond our proper share. I venture also to say that we ought not to be taxed in Scotland according to population, but according to population and wealth. If we take the test of wealth as shown by the taxes in the two countries, we find that Scotland paid nearly £1,400,000 more than she should have done; and if upon the figures supplied to the Government a fair estimate is made, it will be found that Scotland is overtaxed to the tune of at least 1½ millions a year, and that even Ireland is still overtaxed. This question raises much larger issues than that of this small sum of £265,000, but to show how utterly futile it is for the Government to attempt to adjust the financial relations of England and Scotland on this principle let me point to one single fact. Between the years 1889 and 1890 there was an increase in the Customs and Excise to Scotland of £380,000, so that in one year the Government obtained from Scotland nearly £400,000 in excess of what, taken according to the population, Scotland ought to have paid in Customs and Excise alone. The result is, so far as last year is concerned, that if we divide the population into families of five persons, the average receipts for Customs and Excise were in Scotland £7 14s. 3d., and in England only £6 7s. 4d., making a difference of £1 7s. 4d. for every family. These figures show that in the matter of taxation relatively our burden, measured by Customs and Excise alone, shows no less difference than 27s. per family. That is one point. My principal objection to this Bill, however, is that it takes money provided by Imperial taxation and applies it for the relief of local rates. That is an objection which has long been maintained by the Liberal Party. They have always opposed Grants in Aid, and so far as their Parliamentary power would extend they have opposed them, mainly on the ground that Grants in Aid are not really beneficial to the localities to which they are given, but encourage recklessness and extravagance. But there is one point to which less attention has been paid than it deserves, and that is the granting of sums in relief of local rates is a means of shifting the burden and altering the incidence of taxation. Now the weight of Imperial taxation rests mainly on the poor; the weight of local taxation rests chiefly on the rich, and if you relieve the local rates out of Imperial taxation you are relieving the poor at the expense of the poor. That is an abstract proposition with which nobody agrees, but abstract propositions hardly have full force unless they are backed with precise and with definite figures. I shall endeavour to prove my point by a brief estimate of the burden of Imperial taxation on two classes of persons—those who pay Income Tax and those who do not. The total gross amount of income enjoyed by the income tax-paying class in Scotland is, in round figures, about sixty million pounds per annum. The Government returns do not enable us to say the number of persons who pay Income Tax, but, so far as Scotland is concerned, I believe we may ascertain it with approximate accuracy, if we assume that the number of persons occupying houses of £15 and upwards does not materially differ from the number of persons occupying houses of £10 and upwards. Well, Sir, the population living in houses of £15 and upwards number 16 per cent. of the population of Scotland, and 84 per cent. of the population live in houses of £10 and under. In order to make a comparison between those who pay Income Tax and those who do not pay Income Tax, I am going to credit the upper class with very large payments in Imperial taxation. I credit them with the whole of the Property Tax, the whole of the Stamps and Probate duty, the whole of the duty on foreign spirits, the whole of the duty upon wine and spirits, in all, £4,236,000. I also assume that the Income Tax people consume an average share of tea, tobacco, and spirits. With respect to the lower class of the population, I assume that they pay nothing to Imperial taxation except the average amount of Customs and Excise, including the £100,000 of licences and the whole of the foreign spirits and the whole of the wines. If we do that, what is the result? The result is that you have 120,000 people paying 6·9 per cent. of their incomes in Imperial taxation; you have 628,000 people paying 12·4 per cent. on their gross income. Now, Sir, how may we arrive at the income of those who do not pay Income Tax? I divide them into two classes, those who live in houses between £10 and £15, and those who live in houses under £10. With regard to the first, we may assume that their income does not exceed more than ten times their rent, while those who live in houses under £10 have an income which could not be supposed in Scotland to be nine times their rental. These are exaggerated figures, but I purposely exaggerate the amount of the income. Now, Sir, ought we to tax the working man upon his gross income? On the same principle that £120 is deducted from the incomes of those receiving between £150 and £400 a year, some reasonable allowance ought to be made if you are to consider the income equal for the purpose of taxation. If you take £35 as the smallest sum that should be deducted from persons under £150, the contrast between those who pay the Imperial tax and those who do not is this: those who pay Income Tax pay 7 per cent., and those who do not pay Income Tax pay 22 per cent. on their net income. And there is another way in which the same result may be clearly brought out. Let us suppose that the Customs and Excise were abolished, and that Scotland had to raise this £6,000,000 by means of a national rate on the same basis as the poor rate; those who occupy houses between £10 and £15 would pay £120,000 a year as against £575,000 a year which they now pay in Imperial taxation. But those under £10 would pay £362,000 as against the £3,822,000 that they now pay. In other words, the advantage to the working class of abolishing the Customs and Excise, which is indirect taxation, and substituting a local rate, would be that that class of persons would gain £3,800,000 and would lose only £360,000. In other words, it would be equivalent to £3,403,000 in their pockets every year. That follows from the nature of the different taxes. A tax on commodities is an equal tax on the pauper and on the peer, but in the case of rates a person living in a £500 house has to pay more than the person who lives in a £100 house. If the Government wish to relieve the local taxpayers, I will tell them how to apply this money. Let them reduce the duty on tea and tobacco and then the working class, forming 73 per cent. of the population, would gain over £109,000 in relief. They would obtain an average relief of 6s. 8d. per family. How much relief will they get under this Bill? They are going to get a relief of £12,500 a year, so that by this operation of diverting Imperial money in relief of local rates the Government are practically taking from the pockets of the working man the sum of £181,000. £12,000 out of £265,000 is all the working man is going to get, but the landlord is more liberally treated, and he will get £47,000. I object to this Bill and shall vote against it, on the ground that to apply money obtained from Imperial taxation to local rates is a process which takes money out of the pockets of the working man and puts it into the pocket of the richer ratepayer. With regard to the £50,000 that it is proposed to give to the Parochial Boards, I should prefer that that money should go to providing bursaries or scholarships for the education of poor boys in secondary schools or in the Universities. In respect of the £1,000 which it is proposed to give County Councils and the Town Councils, I have indicated sufficiently that it is impossible to select a more iniquitous object to devote Imperial money to than the relief of the richer persons and the large landowners. Therefore, there is only one course, and that is to give to the County Councils and the Town Councils a wide discretion as to the mode in which this money may be used, especially to enable them to provide for a great many objects of genuine public utility for which they have no power to impose a rate at present. There are a large number of such questions. There is, for example, the question of providing relief for unemployed workmen in times of distress.

Mr. Hunter

It is most desirable that Town Councils should have at their command other resources than charity which may be available, to enable them to make some provision in times of distress for the unemployed. Then there is the subject of providing pensions for old age and the insurance of fatherless children. Then, Sir, there are the provision of public parks and public halls, and public places of recreation, and free gymnasiums, the establishment of art galleries and public libraries, and in the counties there is the important subject of allotments, and the provision of means for stocking those allotments. There is, in fact, a large number of objects of undeniable public utility which differ in their application to different localities, so that when this Bill gets into Committee I will give the Government an opportunity of satisfying all the objects to which this money might be beneficially employed short of providing for the rates. To give the money to the rates will be a gross and a clamant injustice. It is a shocking thing to find the working man taxed 30 per cent. on his gross income. Certainly the Government are most unwise in setting a precedent of this kind, a precedent which may at no distant day be used as an instrument, not for the purpose of taking money out of the pockets of the poor and putting it into the pockets of the rich, but taking it out of the pockets of the rich and giving it to the poor.

MR. A. H. DYKE ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I am afraid it is a very daring thing for an English Member to intervene in a debate of this kind; but as more than once the question of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act has been referred to, we, who are interested in secondary education in Wales, look with great hope to Scotland to see that she will continue in the front rank in educational matters, and will continue to set an example of a progressive character. The present proposals of the Government, however, do not seem to me to show that Scotland is going to be able to maintain her pre-eminence. With reference to money, our position in Wales is more liberal than that which Scotland will occupy under this Bill. We have a halfpenny rate, the Treasury grant, the drink money, all of which have been allotted to the purpose of secondary education, and the result is we have in Wales between £50,000 and £70,000 applicable for the purpose of secondary education. Scotland is three times as large as Wales, and, therefore, if Scotland were doing what we are doing, there would be a sum available for secondary technical education of £200,000. In founding the secondary schools in Wales, we have applied to the localities to help, and they met our request by providing considerable local funds for the erection of schools in which the Act is now being worked. Before the work is completed, I expect that we shall have £100,000 for buildings and sites. If Scotland were doing the same work, she would have £200,000 per annum, and a total fund of £300,000. One other objection of a fundamental character in connection with our work is this: that it is a local initiative, and is not controlled by any centralised Department. When the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill was brought in, we had been told that the money would be given by an Order to be laid upon the table at some distant date, those interested in Welsh education would not be looked at the scheme. I have tried to follow the Lord Advocate, but it is not clear now how this money is to be allotted. So far as I understand the Scotch Education Department, and the localities, are to have the initiative.

R. C. J. PEARSON: I explained that there will be a local initiative in the School Boards.

R. A. ACLAND: I do not see how a local initiative can come from the School Boards; you want an independent body representing the whole of the counties to consider all the public representations, and to consider what may or may not be the best kind of scheme. That is how we have proceeded in Wales. We have gradually framed schemes for each district. If we had acted without this full local inquiry I think we should have entirely failed. I venture to say that this bureaucratic, this centralised system altogether unequal to the necessities of the case. The whole experience of a poor country like Switzerland and a poor country like Wales turns out to be that in many cases, especially in rural districts, you must group your children together if you are to give them secondary education of the fullest and best character. You cannot, by alone teaching the higher branches in elementary schools, give them the same opportunities as where you have one large school with teachers told off to each section, instead of making one or two teachers teach a number of subjects, thereby overtaxing them and not giving the children the same opportunity as if they are in one school, grouped together and taught by separate teachers. Whatever may be the method, the essential thing is that each district or county shall be consulted, and that the matter shall not be settled in any Central Education Department, who cannot possibly know the needs of the locality when the inhabitants of the locality have not yet put their heads together to find out what their needs really are. I venture to say that even some Scotch professors have already seen that this centralised system would be a great mistake. I have recently read an interesting article by Professor Laurie, of Edinburgh, in which he strongly protests against this proposal of what he calls bureaucratic centralisation. I venture to say that though we proceed slowly in Wales we are proceeding soundly; and while we certainly should have looked at a scheme such as that which has been expounded by the Government to-day, we should rather wait for two or three years and get a good Act, an adequate supply of money, and fair treatment; allowing us to act in an independent way. On the other hand, we are well under the control of a Central Department. When we submit our scheme to the Charity Commission, and have a united public opinion, then I am bound to say that the Charity Commission is not able and is not willing seriously to alter that which we have made up our minds to. Nobody would be more willing to testify to the enormous value of those local inquiries than the Charity Commissioners themselves. It is with the feeling that we have more money than Scotland, as offered by this Bill, and that local inquiry and initiative, as distinguished from centralised action, is vital to any successful scheme of secondary education, that I venture to hope, in common with many Members on this side of the House, that this proposal will not be accepted as in any way complete or satisfactory.

MR. A. R. D. ELLIOT (Roxburgh): I have great sympathy with the remarks of the hon. Member who has just spoken; but I would point out to him that we are not discussing a Secondary Education Bill—we are discussing a Bill for the satisfactory allotment of £265,000 to Scotland. And I would submit, without any hesitation, that one of the first objects which the Government should have in allocating this money is that it should be allocated on some general plan; that it should not be allocated to any small class; but that they should try to make the relief go to as large a number of persons as possible. If the money must be raised from general taxation, let the relief be general and wide. In regard to education in Scotland, I hope we shall not go down from our high standard, as compared with other nations of the world, but when does it happen in Scotland, particularly in the rural districts, that any financial advantage you may give in order to assist University education benefits the inhabitants of those parishes? Very seldom indeed. I ask the House to consider what you really do for the poorer parts of the country by adding to the advantages of University education. I am not crying down University education in the slightest, but I ask the House to consider how often in the poor parishes of Scotland the people have obtained to the extent of a single penny any part of the money which has been given to University education, and the same thing applies in the case of higher education. I am in favour of doing all we can to perfect our system of secondary education in Scotland. But who are the people who in the main benefit by our excellent system of secondary education? They are not extremely poor persons, or those who live in the rural districts. Therefore, I think the Government are right in not devoting the whole of this money entirely for the benefit of secondary education, and I support strongly a general distribution of the fund. Let us make the best use we can of this national fund which is at our disposal for various purposes. We have lately got a very large amount in the case of primary education. I agree with a great deal that has been said by the hon. Member who spoke before me, as to whether there should not be some central authority between the Parochial Board and the Department in London. I think this is a matter which deserves our careful consideration. I support this proposal of the Government simply on the ground that they are making a general distribution of the money. They are helping University education very largely—£30,000 a year is a considerable sum—and £60,000 a year is not a contemptible sum for secondary education when we consider that we are a limited class of the community; and the bulk of the money is really being bestowed on a much larger class than would appear from what has been said. Therefore, on all these grounds, I support the proposal of the Government. As far as I can judge, this scheme is heartily supported by public feeling in Scotland. I have had representations on the subject from various public bodies and representative authorities, and I do not think I have had one single representation which does not really, with a considerable amount of heartiness, support the Government proposal.

*(7.15.) SIR LYON PLAYFAIR (Leeds, S.): The hon. Member who has just sat down seems to forget the whole history of University education in Scotland. The very spirit of education in Scotland has been to connect the lower schools with the higher schools and with the Universities, and the very glory of Scotch education has been that it has been accessible to the poorest of the country, and that the sons of Scotland have been able, by the education they have received in their native country, to succeed in life not only here but all over the world. Therefore, when he speaks of University education being extended to a limited class, or secondary education being extended to a limited class, he does not know how many of the poor of the country are really attending the Scotch Universities. Very often more than half of the students in some of the Scotch Universities are of the poorest class of the community, who have got to the Universities either by their own earnings or by means of bursaries and scholarships, for it is carrying out the traditions of the Presbyteries of old, who always searched for boys of pregnant parts in their parishes, and sent them by bursaries and scholarships to the Universities to do honour to the education of their country. Therefore, when he talks of any portion of education being devoted to a special class, he is totally ignoring the history of the country. I would call the attention of the Government to the fact that they are not carrying out by this measure the plans which always prevail where new educational funds have been given to Scotland. When you are giving £60,000 for the promotion of secondary education in Scotland why do you not appoint, as has been done for the Universities, a Statutory Commission in connection with the Local Authorities all through the country in order to ascertain what are the wants of these Local Authorities, and have ordinances regulating the best application of your funds? But you have not done so; on the contrary, you have given the whole allocation of the sum to your central Education Department. I have no doubt that Board will act according to its lights, but its lights are not those by which education is being spread amongst the people of this country. A great deal of the money which has been applied and is to be given to the County Councils of England has been applied for the promotion of technical education, but all the ideas of the Education Department of Scotland are simply for the old-fashioned education, and not for extending a useful technical education to different parts of Scotland in the same way as is being done in England. As long as you have a Central Department with an extremely able Secretary, you will have education going through one groove instead of consulting localities as to their wants and ascertaining whether those wants could be met by the allocation of certain money. It is proposed simply by centralisation to give the money without proper local co-operation. I do not deny that in burghs you may have local co-operation, because you have Corporations to deal with; but how are you going to do that with regard to the rural districts in Scotland? You have separate School Boards for each parish, and that is not proper local co-operation. You ought to have unions of parishes, with a proper secondary school, and a useful technical school. Therefore, I think when you go into Committee you must be prepared for our proposing an Amendment in order to obtain more local co-operation, more local supervision, and less centralisation with regard to education. We see Wales, with only one-third of the population of Scotland, giving a splendid scheme of education through the County Councils. You must not be surprised if in Committee we support the hon. Member for Aberdeen when he proposes that a certain amount of money should be applied to carry out the principle which is the vital principle of Scotch education. There is nothing in this scheme by which the ladder of education is to be carried, as it has always been carried in Scotland, from the lowest schools to the secondary schools, and from the secondary schools to the Universities. There is no organisation which joins the whole, although it is this junction of the whole from the lowest to the highest that has always been the distinguishing feature of Scotch education. The Bill, I think, is a crude and ill-conceived Bill, and I hope, before it goes through Committee, we may be able very much to amend it.

(7.25.) MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.) This Bill has been discussed very much as an Education Bill, but it seems to me to be more of the nature of a Financial Bill, and a very bad Financial Bill to my mind. It aggravates what is already the existing and growing evil of throwing upon the Imperial Funds what are properly local burdens. It calls itself an Education and Local Taxation Relief Bill. Well, I do not know on what principle education has been put first, unless it has been on the alphabetical principle, and I can hardly suppose that the Lord Advocate would endorse that as a principle in constructing the title for his Bill. If he were sincere in putting education first, he would be more anxious about education than about local taxation relief. That seems to me to be in reality what was called by a famous character in literature a derangement of epitaphs, for, as between the two subjects of education and local taxation relief, what the Bill does is to give a smack in the face to education, and a pat on the back to local taxation relief. The arithmetic of the Bill only needs to be looked at to show this. At present, from the local taxation account of Scotland, educational interests have an income of £344,000, and the rates have an income of £381,000—i.e., the rates are at the present moment ten per cent. better off than education is. But under this Bill they are to be altered as follows:—Education will have out of the Local Taxation Account £421,000, and rates £562,000—i.e., the rates will now be 33 per cent. better off than education; in short, the original advantage that the rates enjoyed over education will be more than trebled by this Bill. It seems to me this financial aspect is more emphatic than these educational recommendations. I say this is really making bad worse. To devote Imperial money to education is perfectly consistent by itself, because education is a matter of Imperial concern and of universal benefit; but to devote Imperial money to local purposes is an indefensible abuse. Local rating may not be on a satisfactory footing; there are many persons who are not paying who ought to pay, and many persons who are paying ought to pay a great deal more; while others are unfairly dealt with; but to take Imperial taxation, which is half paid by the working classes, and return them a fourth or a fifth, and to give three-fourths or four-fifths to the better classes is simply doubling the original wrong, besides giving a very disastrous lesson to Local Authorities in general carelessness. The true remedy for any error in local rating is not to deal with it in this irregular and anomalous fashion; it is to reform local rating, and make the right people pay the right rate and the right amount of that rate. I decline on the present occasion to regard the arrangements of the Bill as permanent, and I support the proposal that we should either go against the Bill, or support some Motion or Amendment for limiting its operation to one year. Perhaps, by that time, there may be a state of matters in this House which will allow of attacking the anomalies and disadvantages of the local rating system and creating a true and scientific system of national economy. The Bill seems to me in several ways to be disadvantageous to educational interests. Free education still remains to be developed and made permanent, and the Bill, instead of doing anything to fill in the incompleteness of free education, offers no encouragement to it, if it does not positively discourage it. At present free education gets out of the Licence and Probate Duties a revenue of over £277,000, and the Bill names the sum of £265,000, which may probably be less any year, according to the variation of the English grant. That is suggesting that free education in Scotland is too well off by more than £12,000 a year. We who are acquainted with the facts know that it is by no means too well off, and that in many quarters it has to eke out a precarious living. It is true that free education will get what happens to be left in the local taxation account, but if that should fall below £265,000, and the Licence and Probate Duties fall below the fee grant, free education is left out in the cold. In the Bill £165,000 is fixed for other objects—in addition to £365,000 given by other Acts to the same objects. I should have thought that in this Act, at all events, they would have said that whatever loses, free education shall not further be endangered. No one can say that in the most important aspect of national education this measure does its duty as an Educational Bill. It is reactionary with respect to technical education. It restricts the Town and County Councils in dealing with the £100,000, more or less, which is to be given to them. Such residue as there is of this description is to be used exclusively for the reduction of their rates, and in that respect it is a falling away from the Bill of 1890, which gave them the option of devoting it to technical education. The fact that that option is taken away is not only astonishing but alarming. In the ratio of 25 to 20 the Urban and Rural Authorities of Scotland have preferred to give the residue from the Customs and Excise to technical education, rather than to fling it into the gutters. The worst blow the Bill proposes to deal at education is the bold proposal to divert £175,000 of the Licence and Probate Duties to the relief of local rates, leaving only £90,000 for education. The iniquities of this proposal have not been sufficiently noticed by preceding speakers. If the Bill gives £265,000 with one hand it takes away with the other; it takes away two-thirds of our rightful share of the free grant of £175,000 and uses it for fixed non-educational purposes, thus leaving only £90,000 for secondary and University education. I want to know by what right, or principle of equity, or justice, or history almost, the Lord Advocate takes this away from us? It is admittedly ours by right, and we, being the owners, choose to devote it to educational purposes. I want to know by what right the traditional defenders of the highest rights of property propose to take away the elementary conception of property, that when a man has property he can do what he likes with it? Leaving us the one-third shows that the Government feel they have no right to take the money, and if we have a right to one-third we have a right to the whole. If the Government say we have the Equivalent Grant, I say we have a right to both, and it is for us, and not for you, to say what we should do with it in both cases. The Bill puts educational objects in the wrong order of importance, and to that extent is a discouragement and not an auxiliary to education. I would say all I could in favour of devoting money to secondary and University education; it is a proper devotion of public money to what are national purposes. Let them be made as accessible to the intellectual ability of the poor as to that of the rich, and we have an unmixed blessing. But there are educational claims even antecedent to these. The true order of educational claims is that of national necessities; the order in which one is more necessary to national conditions than its successor, and on that footing they should be supported by national money. I range them thus: first, free primary education; next, evening or continuation schools for the great mass of the people to carry on such education as their opportunities allow; next, technical education; next, what is called secondary education, as I understand the sense of the term; and last, University education, to finish up the matter perfectly. We have, at this, one of the most serious junctures and important crises in the history of our country, to consider the question whether this great endowment shall be wisely used, or, to a large extent, wasted and frittered away. We have sufficient money at our disposal to organise education in this way in Scotland, and to make it a complete system; complete in the education it gives, and the assistance it affords to poor but meritorious ability to approach the fountain of knowledge. The Government made one great financial blunder in creating the evil of assisting local burdens by Imperial funds, and in the little contribution they have given towards education they have begun at the top instead of the bottom of the ladder; and they have made a second mistake in restricting even the little portion they have saved out of the general wreck to the fourth and fifth branches. On these grounds I hope almost against hope that some impression will be made on the Government, so that if they will not do their duty by the entire sum, they will be led to give more liberal assistance in the direction in which, in my opinion, this money can only be profitably expended. The people of Scotland do not put very much value on the distribution of the small amounts in the way it is proposed to deal with a large part of this money. There are, I am sorry to learn, people in Glasgow, if they are properly represented on this point, who seem to wish for a lower, less honourable, and, in the end, less profitable distribution of the money. The great mass of the people, the working people, however, know perfectly well that three-pence or fourpence in their pockets in the year is not for one moment to be compared with the erection of a splendid system of popular education, popularly devised; they think that the highest interest of any nation is the intellectual and moral elevation of its people.

(7.48.) MR. J. P. SMITH (Lanark, Partick): I think the people of Scotland will feel that one pound is as good as another pound, whether it be called a Free Grant or a Probate Grant, and I do not see the financial objections of the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down. I think he is under a misapprehension as to the Free Education Grant; whatever happens the grant will be the same as that paid now. The Debate has been very much an education Debate throughout, and no one except the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Hunter) has gone into the general figures of the finance, and there one cannot follow him on the spur of the moment. It seems to me, he says, that a man having a £10 house, with 35s. a week, and taking 10s. a week for the minimum for the necessaries of life, would have 25s. a week left, and he would be taxed to the extent of one-third of this, or 8s. a week; if he consumes two pounds of tea, a half-pound of tobacco, and a half-gallon of whisky.

MR. HUNTER: The figure is the average for those between £10 and nothing, and in the case of the £10 it would be more rather than less.

MR. J. P. SMITH: I was simply giving the case as it occurred to me. The method of division between counties and boroughs will be more conveniently raised in Committee. The main point of the Debate has been the question of secondary education, and it seems to me that this opportunity has been taken, and that a scheme is being worked out which will go a long way towards meeting the needs of Scotland. In the Bill it is a very skeleton scheme, and we can hardly criticise it without further time for consideration. One needs to compare it with Wales. I have read the Reports of the Conference under the chairmanship of the hon. Member for Rotherham (Mr. A. H. D. Acland), and I was almost ashamed to do so. We in Scotland thought we were leading in educational matters, but we have been left behind in secondary education by Wales. What strikes me most in Wales is to see how the hon. Member and his friends have succeeded in calling out local enthusiasm, working through local agencies, and waking the feeling of the country to the necessity of secondary education for the benefit not of the few but of the many. I do not know that the things which suit them in Wales will suit us in Scotland, as circumstances differ to a considerable extent. We have been accustomed to secondary education in our parochial schools, and have no such things as elementary schools. The success of the Dick and Milne bequests in Aberdeenshire shows that much can be done in this direction by having extra teachers in country schools. By this means you would meet the requirements of the rural districts for a proper share of attention. I do not think, however, it is a fair expression of the opinion of the people concerned to say that the rural districts are being neglected. In regard to secondary education, it seems the difficulty will be to do the work. The big towns are perfectly capable of doing it, but I am afraid there will be waste if you take simply the basis of the parochial district; to take counties and form an Educational Committee for the county as in Wales, would probably be the best way. But where you have large counties it might be well to take such groups of parishes as geographical circumstances favoured. You want full power of combining. By establishing committees of this kind you will get warm and enthusiastic support, and vigorous work as in Wales, and you should give both secondary and technical education into the hands of these committees. To make technical education anything more than mere manual facility, you must have some secondary education to base it upon. At present the thing is left very much at large; money is put into the hands of the County Councils, and they act as they see fit. All that is necessary is to say fiat and technical education would be brought into being. You will have to consider local circumstances because the money will certainly not be enough to meet the development of secondary education. You must get more money than that you can only do by stimulating localities. You will get a certain amount out of fees, but you must create interest in the matter as in Wales. You do not find this interest in the County Councils in regard to secondary education. The County Council of Renfrewshire, of which I am a member, voted the money to the relief of rates, though there was no objection to devote it to technical education. There is another Welsh precedent we might follow with advantage. That is the power to rate counties for the purposes of secondary education. Under the Act of 1878 Scotch School Boards have power to spend money out of the rates on higher class schools, but I should like to have that power extended, so as to remove certain restrictions in spending it. If that were done it might further follow the precedent, and have the sum raised met by corresponding sums from the Treasury. We should also desire for Scotland the provisions of the draft Treasury scheme for developing the details of the Welsh Education Act now under discussion. It proposes to make a Secondary Education Board for Wales, which shall consist of representatives from the County Councils, from the University Colleges, from the College, Oxford, the head masters and teachers of different schools, and I should like to have a general control over secondary education throughout Wales. It has considerable discretionary power in regulating between the different County Boards. Such a Board might be formed for Scotland, and have power to regulate the grants to different counties, because the main objection to any system of local distribution is that some counties, as Glasgow and Glasgow, have already enormous endowments, and we should like to see the benefit spread over the whole of the counties. I should like to see a Central Board arranged with the power of controlling matters according to the real convenience of the people without regard to mere geographical distinctions. Then, again, I regret that the burghs and counties have not the same liberty that they had under the legislation of 1890. Under that authority they had the option of spending the money either on the relief of the rates or on technical education. I regret that as the Bill stands at present they have not the same power, or a wider power, because I should like the new Bill to include technical education as well as secondary education, and to give the County Councils and the Town Councils power to divide it between those purposes. In the counties at present the grant is divided—£16,000 going to technical education, and £7,000 to the relief of the rates; and in the big burghs the Town Councils devote £8,000 to technical education and £3,000 to the relief of the rates. In the small burghs, where the money is given out in dribs and drabs, it is being wasted, because it affords no relief to the rates. When a small burgh receives a sum, say, of £5, what can it do with that for the purposes of technical education? You should establish a system which would enable the benefit to be spread over the small boroughs and neighbourhood round about, and then you would no longer have the inequalities you now see—namely, that the counties and the big burghs devote three times as much money to technical education as they do to the relief of the rates, and the small burghs spend ten times as much on the relief of the rates as they do on technical education. This Bill is being generally accepted in this House, and still more in Scotland, as a compromise. The Municipalities came here originally when this scheme was first put forward to demand the whole, but now they say they do not want more than £150,000. The Parochial Boards asked for half the sum to be divided; now they are all petitioning for this Bill, and say they do not grudge the money spent on education. The School Boards asked for £75,000, and now there is no grumbling over the £60,000 that is proposed, and I have not heard a word of complaint with respect to the Universities. What all these bodies want is a final settlement; they do not want to have this question raised year by year, and I am sure Members of Parliament are the last people who would desire to be beset by importunate suitors, as we have been for the last two months. For my own part, I should have liked to see the money rather differently divided; but the country is prepared to take it fairly as a compromise and accept the scheme.

*(8.39.) MR. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): This Debate has been somewhat varied in its character, and has ranged over a variety of subjects. That was natural to expect, because the Bill itself is one which deals with a variety of subjects, and embraces within its limits a considerable variety of topics. With regard to the financial part of the Bill I will not say anything except this: that I think it is a mistake, and a bad system of finance, first to raise money that you do not want, and then not to know how to distribute it—to send it down to the Local Authorities for them to scramble for it. That is practically what has taken place, not only in the present year, but ever since this system of finance was inaugurated by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer some years ago. I think that not only shifts the responsibility, which he ought to bear, off himself, but it places a responsibility upon the Local Authorities which they ought not properly to take on their shoulders; and in the result it is certain to lead to a good deal of waste and extravagance. The Lord Advocate has said hardly anything regarding the Grant in Aid to the Town and County Councils, and he has said nothing at all with regard to the sums to be granted to the Parochial Boards for distribution. I am not going to occupy the time of the House to-night by discussing what has been so often discussed before—the crudeness and the wastefulness of these proposals, of simply doling out sums of money from the Exchequer to the Local Authorities to be given in aid of rates. The gift of £25,000 in aid of the charge for pauper lunatics represents a proposal which on the face of it has most to recommend it; but I was somewhat at a loss to discover on what ground that sum of £25,000 was fixed upon. The Lord Advocate stated that it was necessary to make it proportionate to the demands made by those who are to administer this fund at the present moment; but the additional amount which they are asking now is, so far as I can make out, entirely out of proportion to the increase in the years previous to 1890. By referring to the Report of the Lunacy Commissioners for Scotland, I find that the amount of the charge for this purpose was in 1875, the first year in which the grant was made, £60,000; in 1882 it had increased to £80,000; and in 1889 it increased to £90,000. There is a growth, therefore, for the first seven years of £20,000, for the second seven years of £10,000. The rate of increase had declined, and during the second seven years was not more than £1,500 per annum. Unless some facts can be set before the House and the country to show that there has been lately a very abnormal increase in pauper lunatics—either in the number of pauper lunatics, or an abnormal increase in the expense of maintaining pauper lunatics—it seems to me very extraordinary and very unaccountable that the Government, after the lapse of only three years since the contribution was fixed, fixed on such a large additional sum as £25,000 to give in aid of the charge for pauper lunatics. The Lord Advocate did not explain on what ground that increased sum was fixed, and I think we should like to get some further explanation on that subject. It appears to me that the Bill, not merely with regard to the educational proposals, but with regard to some of its other proposals, is somewhat crudely drawn, and that the sums to be given to the Local Authorities have been fixed more by the rule of thumb, and to satisfy importunity, rather than in accordance with a careful investigation of the real wants of the Local Authorities. Upon the subject of the aid to be given to Town and County Councils I shall merely say this: that the Town Councils of Edinburgh and Glasgow have undoubtedly demanded that the sums which they asked for to be given in aid of local taxation should be given to them with a free hand, to be applied by them to such urgent local purposes as may come up requiring special aid. As to the unanimity of opinion among Local Boards with regard to the distribution of this money, of course when you put down a large sum of money for Local Authorities in Scotland or elsewhere and say—"I am willing to give you this money, if you ask me, in reduction of the rates; and the more you ask the more you are likely to get," you are certain to have a unanimous desire on the part of these authorities to obtain as much as they can from the Public Exchequer; but it does not in the least follow that the constituencies of these Local Authorities are equally anxious for the money being given from the Public Exchequer into the hands of these bodies for the abatement of rates. As a single instance of the somewhat different interest taken in the subject between the Local Authorities and the constituencies of these Local Authorities, I may mention that during the last Town Council elections which took place in Edinburgh in the beginning of November last—though there were contests, and very close contests, in all the wards except one in the City of Edinburgh—not a single question was asked from any single one of the candidates as to what he proposed with regard to the distribution of this money. In Edinburgh, and Glasgow also, and in Aberdeen—I am not sure about Dundee—there are a considerable number of public bodies, like the Trades Councils, who are desirous of getting this money primarily for education, and naturally for the aid of that education which they feel the most need of, and which most immediately comes home to them. Their demands have been first that absolute security shall be given not for the present, but for the future, that the sum shall be sufficient for freeing all the elementary standards—that there shall be no risk of any failure of the funds in the hands of the Central Authority; and, secondly, their demand is that aid shall now be given to evening schools and continuation schools when money is available. From what I have seen of the evening classes at present being carried on in the School Board schools in Edinburgh, I think that if anything can be done—if there is any money available for the further promotion and encouragement of secondary and higher education, those children who show such zeal in attending these classes for the purpose of obtaining instruction in the various subjects after their business hours have, at any rate, the very foremost claim on any aid that may be given. Since we heard the Lord Advocate's speech, just as before it, I think we must all come to the conclusion that the money offered is too little for any really good secondary education scheme in Scotland. The sum of £60,000 is very small compared with the sum of £36,000 which Wales, with a much smaller population and educational needs, gets from the Public Exchequer at this moment. We have got no properly elaborated scheme for organising a scheme of secondary education in Scotland; and no information has been set before us by which we can criticise even the skeleton details laid before us by the Lord Advocate. I think we have a fair cause of complaint against the Government on this score. The first question I have to ask in this connection is, when will the Minute of the Scotch Education Department be issued? Before we go into Committee on this Bill we ought to have this Minute of the Scotch Education Department before us, that we may be able to judge what are the proposals of the Government with regard to secondary education. I should like to ask the Lord Advocate one or two questions—Is there any definition of secondary education, and who is to make it? We ought to have some idea as to what this secondary education is to be, and I should also like to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will explain to us what his proposals are in regard to it? Then, again, who are to select the schools in the country districts to which this secondary education is to be given?

Next arises the question as to the principle which is at the root of the Lord Advocate's proposals—namely, the mode in which this money is to be distributed—whether by a local or by a centralised system? I would urge the Lord Advocate to make some modification in his proposal, so that the scheme should not be worked in particular districts without the full sympathy and support of the Local Authorities. I have been told that the Municipal and other Local Authorities have had no difficulty in working out their scheme in Wales; and I am perfectly certain there would be no difficulty in doing it in Edinburgh and Glasgow. So far also from the County Councils not being, as the Lord Advocate stated in his speech, a convenient basis for educational arrangements, they have shown themselves, if anything, more enlightened than the smaller Town Councils with regard to educational interests in their distribution of the residue grant under the Act of 1890. Altogether the general conclusion to be drawn from the figures on the subject is that the large School Boards and the large County Councils are bodies which can safely be trusted with the distribution of this grant.

(9.12.) MR. SHIRESS WILL (Montrose, &c.): The character of the support which has been given to this proposal of Her Majesty's Government is somewhat remarkable. The Bill gives the Government an opportunity of applying the money to some tangible and useful purpose; but instead of taking advantage of it, they propose to throw the money into the sea—to give it in reduction of rates. There are many good purposes for which it might have been used, and one of those purposes is undoubtedly education—not only that known as secondary education, but also technical education. Although the Government recognise the claims of secondary education, they propose, without rhyme or reason, to fix the amount to be given for it at £60,000, which we on this side of the House say is utterly inadequate. Another objection is that the Government propose to put the whole matter under the control of the Central Department in London. Notwithstanding what has been said by the hon. Member for South Lanarkshire, the £60,000 for secondary education is unquestionably stereotyped by the Bill, and I have been unable to gather from the speech of the Lord Advocate what are the reasons of the Government for doing so. If I followed the Lord Advocate rightly, some 12,000 children in the burghs and 5,000 in the rural districts will get the benefit of secondary education. Reckoning that at £3 a head that will amount to £51,000, which, with the cost of inspection, will absorb the whole grant. Now that we are dealing with secondary education, is it right to fetter it at the commencement in this niggardly manner? Surely it would have been better to allow some elasticity, so that the movement for secondary education might be allowed to grow as it certainly was destined to grow. I think the arguments of the hon. Member for Partick with regard to placing secondary education under the control of the Central Department in London deserves some answer from the Government. It has been said by the hon. Member for Roxburgh, "Oh, this is not an Education Bill, but an Allotment Bill." I deny that entirely. It is an Education Bill, although you may have starved education in it. The hon. Member for Roxburgh said that it was a distribution of money from general sources. That is a fallacious argument. The money is obtained from Imperial taxation in order to reduce local taxation, and you are taking away a large proportion of the distribution from those who have obtained it—namely, the working classes—and given a greater proportion to the wealthier classes. For these reasons no one has been able to justify the proposals contained in the Bill.

(9.24.) MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): The hon. Member who has just sat down must know that this Bill is founded on compromise, and consequently the Government had no opportunity of making heroic proposals. The speech of the hon. and learned

Mr. Buchanan

Member for Aberdeen was more in the nature of an academic lecture on education than a speech on the Bill before the House. It was so full of issues of the most complex character that it occurred to me that the hon. Member was qualifying for the post of Chancellor of the Exchequer in the same Rule Government which he wishes to set up in Scotland. I may say, however, if I had had the disposal of this money, I think I should have been inclined to have used it in a different way to that the Government proposes. In the first place, I do not think that the grant to the Universities is money which should have come out of what we may term our own money, but should have come out of the Consolidated Fund. I should have been inclined to have given a larger sum to the development of secondary and technical education, and more particularly technical education. There cannot be the slightest doubt that foreign countries are far ahead of us in regard to technical education—especially the Germans. They happen to be interested in an industry in which dye forms a very important part. A few years ago the dyers of this country found it impossible, under the system prevailing in it, to get colours to stand the test of the sun and of sea-water. Well, to Germany, and to Germany alone, are we indebted now for having solved that difficulty. I think it is a great reproach to this country that Germany should be so much ahead of us in technical education, and I should like to see largely developed in this country a thorough system of technical education. In my own constituency I have received no end of petitions and letters in favour of the Bill, and I have not had one adverse to the proposals of the Government. For this reason I feel bound, whilst regretting that technical education is not receiving a larger sum of money, under this grant, to support this measure.

(9.28.) MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): The hon. Member who has just sat down says that he feels bound to support the Government in regard to this Bill, but he does not approve of their proposals as to how the money should be used.

MR. THORBURN: I said I regretted that the Government had not proposed to use the money in some other form.

MR. ESSLEMONT: My hon. Friend has spoken of petitions in favour of the Bill. Now, I can give him some information with regard to them. The petitions are stereotyped, and have been issued by a Central Authority. In the City of Aberdeen it was proposed that those grants should be applied to the reduction of rates; but a very strong public feeling arose against that proposal, an election of the Town Council took place, and since the election the proposal has not been further pressed. With respect to the deputation of teachers which waited upon the Scotch Members in support of the dedication of the money to technical and secondary education, the gentlemen composing that deputation said they only represented the secondary teachers and the School Boards, and they conspicuously did not represent the rural districts. In respect to the necessity for secondary schools, they said £75,000 was the minimum which would place the existing secondary schools in a satisfactory position. Being interrogated it came out quite clearly that no calculation had been made with regard to the county parishes and the rural districts. Therefore, if you add to the £75,000 which they declare to be the minimum sum necessary for the purpose of equipping existing schools, and putting the teachers in a proper position—if you add to that the rural districts, and what I am most anxious should be taken into consideration, namely, the institution of evening continuation schools throughout the rural districts—it is perfectly clear that the sum of £60,000 is altogether inadequate. It is quite humiliating that Scotland, which has gloried in its interest for education for generations past, should be approached with the idea of giving it pro rata—about one-fourth—to secondary and continuation schools of the sum which has been found to be absolutely necessary to similar work in Wales. The Lord Advocate said nothing about evening schools, and it is not disputed, that unless you have evening and continuation schools, you necessarily exclude a large proportion of the population from receiving any benefit from secondary education whatever. Now, Sir, something has been said about the 12,000 young people attending secondary schools. If the right hon. Gentleman will go to Aberdeen he will find that in Robert Gordon's College over 2,000 pupils are receiving instruction in secondary education, either at day schools or at evening schools. I never heard anything more humiliating than the proposition that only four children per hundred are to go beyond the compulsory classes. I quite admit that we have, by the existing system of education, forced the number down to the very lowest possible point by the pressure we have put on the elementary education. We have turned our teachers so entirely on to this that they have neither the opportunity of teaching, nor have the young persons the opportunity of attending, the schools as they used to do under the parochial system, and what we want to see is that the money is not in those districts given away for the benefit of one or two children. In each school throughout the country we really want a system of secondary education. In that scheme we shall be entirely missing the mark in regard to the demands of Scotland, unless we have evening schools both for secondary and for technical education. Now, Sir, what sum of money is necessary for the mere inception of technical education? There are laboratories to provide, workshops are wanted for applied mechanics, and the other expenses which are unavoidable show that nothing like justice is possible unless we have a sum of at least £200,000. We have outlived the state of things when the Mechanics' Institutes, provided by the benevolence of the people, supplied what was requisite, and what we now want is encouragement and assistance as regards the highest stages of education. There are a considerable number of boys and girls of brilliant intellectual parts to whom it would be an advantage if they received continuing education at evening schools. How is that to be provided? If they had the best secondary schools within their reach, the parents of these children are placed at this disadvantage: that they cannot afford to dispense with their wages; so that if these children are to have a chance, it must be by opening bursaries and scholarships for which they can compete. Now, Sir, this £60,000 will do no more than supply this purpose, and this purpose alone. The hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for the University of Aberdeen (Mr. J. A. Campbell), takes broad and enlightened views of educational matters, and I should like to know if he thinks it a fitting thing for the people of Scotland to give away £50,000 in the reduction of rates which will not benefit anybody except the landlord and the capitalist, and that at a time when education is languishing, when Scotland is not only getting behind the Continent, but behind England, and, indeed, last in the race in which at one time she was first. Surely, Sir, there ought to be some increase of this paltry sum of £60,000, which is to be devoted to so enormous a work. Ever since the Act of 1872 Scotland has complained that secondary education was being neglected. Now, here is an opportunity of putting things right. Here is a quarter of a million of money which nobody in Scotland has sought—because the Scotch people are altogether opposed to Grants in Aid—and as there is no general demand for its application in any other direction, let the Government come boldly forward and say that they will spend the money in founding a scheme for the universal abolition of school fees in all elementary schools and for putting within the reach of every boy and every girl in every rural district and parish in Scotland that secondary education which is now essentially necessary in all branches of industry. Now, Sir, as regards the grant of £30,000 to the Universities, I think the money ought to have been provided from some other source, justice being in the first instance done to those educational institutions which the feeders of the Universities. Meeting the system mentioned by Lord Advocate of secondary education with a graduated fee, I object very much to the introduction into our educational system of any such arrangement. In the Universities these vicious distinctions have been abolished, and will redound to the honour of the Government if they do not countenance revival, but take the step which I suggested and make education free and available to all.

55.) MR. MARK STEWART (Glenbright): The majority of the Opposition are against the grant of money altogether, at any rate in any way that it is proposed to be granted. I do not think, with all submission, that that is the opinion of the majority. My hon. Friend who has sat down seemed to think there is a need to revive distinction between classes of society. The time has passed by when that can be called a vital question. There is no practical distinction in education. The well-to-do parent is quite willing to send his child to a better academy than the village school. The labouring men will do the same thing if they could afford it. My hon. Friend appears to think that £60,000 is all the money Scotland has, or will have, for the purposes of secondary education. If my hon. Friend chooses to examine into the case of the different towns throughout the country, of which not one word has been said, he will find that in many parishes and burghs there are large sums available for the purpose of secondary education. This £60,000 is only to be compared to those funds. It was said, the Lord Advocate said, only a few would attend the schools in the country districts. My experience is that if you have driven children of five and upwards as hard as you can for learning, they do not pursue their studies beyond the Sixth Standard in large towns and large parishes. It would be absolute folly for the Government to give in the first instance large sums for secondary education when there is nobody to take advantage of it in the rural schools. In the towns it is no doubt different, and there are greater means provided for these schools than is the case in the country districts. I cannot think this is throwing money into the sea in order to relieve the rates in every county or burgh, and, I am perfectly certain, if you poll Scotland to-morrow you will find the vast majority of voters taking this view that they should get under this Bill a large sum for the relief of rates. I received letter after letter and petitions from Local Authorities in Scotland, both urban and rural, urging that the House of Commons might vote a large portion of this amount to the relief of rates. In regard to technical education I am bound to say that it is a very difficult matter to carry out a scheme for such education. I cannot for a moment blame the Government for not devoting a portion of the fund to this particular branch of education. We have tried it in two of the southern counties of Scotland. In company with others I attended many meetings, and we had a scheme sketched out which was thought would be very advantageous. One county rejected it altogether. In the other county we got a considerable portion of the amount voted for technical education. But the country is not ripe for this yet, and you want a large district in which to work out the problem. You want classrooms, professors and lecturers, and a general system which cannot be set up in one day. In due time I hope it will be the case that we shall have such a system, but we are not in a position to talk much about it seeing the country has not taken it up at the present time. A great deal has been said about the Scotch Education Department in Edinburgh, and its being moved up to London. As far as my memory goes it was the Party opposite who were in favour of having it in London. I have spoken on a hundred platforms in favour of non-centralisation, and of having the Education Department in Edinburgh, and not in London. But now that a change has taken place, and seeing we have got a most able Secretary of the Scotch Education Department, we may well rest satisfied when we are in his hands that this money will be well spent and well looked after. There is one point in regard to secondary education I would press upon the Lord Advocate. There can be no doubt, if we had more money, we could set up separate schools in every district in order that the parents might have their children educated without incurring the cost of sending them a distance. It would only be in large centres, and large centres are often too far removed from the habitations of the working-classes, that you could have those technical schools at present. What I would like would be to give a certain sum to each school in certain districts, which would go to pay the teacher, and enable the head teacher to devote his time and ability to secondary education. If that were done it would bring secondary education within the reach of many persons who cannot now afford to send their children a distance of several miles. I know there is a system by which a School Board or the Board of Education could be formed extending over a wide district, that Board having committees of three or four members. And if there were something of that sort in Scotland more impartial justice might be obtained in distributing this grant. I cannot suppose that a centralised Body in London could actually say where this grant would be required or not required; but there might be a Board in the locality who could suggest to the centralised department in London as to where the money might be voted. In that way you would promote secondary education very largely. I shall conclude by thanking the Government for bringing in this measure. It is a measure which I cannot conceive anybody will seriously oppose. I can conceive hon. Members opposite having a grudge against the Government because they have manipulated the financial affairs of this country in a wise and statesmanlike manner, and to complain that it is only on the eve of a General Election they find they have £265,000 in hand. But, I do not remember the Party opposite ever having such a surplus to give away to a legitimate object even before a General Election. I cannot conceive anyone who can really oppose this Bill. I can conceive hon. Members in this House taking a stand against it and criticising the proposals of the Government, but I have heard nothing to-night to alter my opinion in any way that this Bill is a good Bill and one likely to benefit the country. The hon. Member for Montrose called this a stereotyped sum of £60,000. I suppose he has not taken the trouble to read the Bill, for if he had read Sub-section 6 of Clause 2, he would see it is no such thing. It is possible this fund may grow and in that case the £60,000 will grow with it. At the same time I would urge upon the Government that the £30,000 allocated to the Universities might have been found somewhere else, and that that sum might have been added to the £60,000 for secondary education. But with that one exception I am satisfied on the whole with this measure, and, I think the reception which it will meet with in the country will be highly satisfactory to Her Majesty's Government.

*DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College) : It is a pity that my hon. Friend who has just sat down allowed Party prejudice to influence him in charging hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House with being actuated by a grudge against the Government for their success in manipulating the finances of the country. But I thought the term he used was a happy one. He said the Government had this sum at their disposal. They have not; but, as a matter of fact, they are going to raise taxes in Scotland in order that they may have it at their disposal. The Government have adopted what I think is a thoroughly vicious course in raising a tax for some object which they had not defined before raising it. We cannot, however, remit taxation; we cannot remodel the finances of the three Kingdoms, because Ireland has also to be dealt with, and we must deal with the money taken out of our pockets as best we can. Well, the hon. Member allowed his Party spirit, of which he accused us on this side of the House, to run away with him in his historical reminiscences, for it was not a Liberal Government that removed the Education Department from Edinburgh, it was done by Mr. Disraeli, who was then Prime Minister. The question is, what shall we do with the money? As to the primary question whether it should be disposed of by Motion or Bill, I am decidedly in favour of the latter. Some hon. Members talked about throwing money into the sea, but there is nothing of that sort in the Bill as I understand it. I have no doubt you will get some value for the money proposed to be spent on secondary and University education, for the Universities are the most important technical schools we have. But the proposal to devote the money to the relief of the rates is less open to the charge of throwing money into the sea than any other proposal in the Bill, though the money taken from the taxpayers' pockets will not go back in the same proportion. The poorer classes will be most heavily taxed towards the Equivalent Grant and receive less in the shape of remission of taxation, but they will get something. The question is, whether any proposal has been made by which they would get more than in that way? It is said that remitting rates is simply putting money in the landlords' pockets. I can only say that if there is any proposal to increase the proportion of the rates to be paid by the landlord he opposes it tooth and nail, while the tenant heartily supports the proposal. It is said that the smaller ratepayer will get no appreciable benefit. Will the small ten pounds householder in Glasgow get more than half-a-crown if the money is devoted to any other purpose? We have plenty of money for secondary education in Glasgow, and there is also plenty in Edinburgh; and then what benefit will the small ratepayers in those places get if the money is devoted to secondary education? The proposal to devote the money to the relief of taxation was made last Session, and there have been eight or nine months for people to express their opinion, and that opportunity has not been allowed to slip by those who thought they could put in a claim to the money. If it be true that there was no general agitation in favour of its being devoted to the relief of the rates, it is equally true that there has been no general agitation in favour of its application to secondary education. What do hon. Members mean by secondary education? The hon. Member for Aberdeen talked about it, and then launched into technical education. Another hon. Member referred to the necessity for a higher class of secondary education because of the superiority of Germany, through technical education, in fabricating dyes. That is not what the right hon. Gentleman means by secondary education. The only speaker who appreciated this secondary education was the right hon. Member for Leeds (Sir Lyon Playfair), who feared that if it were left to the Education Department it would resolve itself into the old-fashioned secondary education of Latin and Greek, which few think of such pressing importance as to be worth the expenditure of a quarter of a million of money raised by taxation. As to the ratepayers, the poor workman who lives in a house of above £4 a year would directly benefit by the remission of taxation to a greater or lesser extent. Below that rent the rates are paid by the landlord, and I do not know if he would take the amount off the rent. But those who live in the £4 to £10 houses are often very poor, and in many cases the rates have had to be reduced by 2s. or 3s., because they cannot possibly pay them. It may be said that 1s. or 2s. is a trifle, but it is always something, and is much more likely to be appreciated than secondary education, especially by persons in a town where there is plenty of secondary education, than even secondary education given for nothing, which he cannot avail himself of so far as his children are concerned. People in such poverty cannot afford to send their children to secondary schools. The right hon. Gentleman said that only one out of six children between the ages of 13 and 16 were likely to attend these schools. Which of the six? In nine cases out of ten the richest. As a matter of fact, secondary education is a luxury the poor cannot afford, and unless you enable them to support themselves, or to make a revenue out of education, I do not see how you can do much good in that connection with it. I think all the speakers are agreed that we should have some idea of how the £60,000 is to be spent. We know how the money devoted to the rates is to be spent, and though Parochial Boards have been sneered at there is much to be said in favour of allocating a large portion of the money to them. The incidence of parochial rates is practically the same in boroughs and county, and in making any remission of rates you adopt the simplest machinery by giving the money to the Parochial Board. If you give them the money you know what they must do with it. I do not care how the money is given, provided it is given in the way which affords most relief. If the inhabitants of the counties desire secondary education so much let them have it, but in the large cities like Edinburgh and Glasgow, where we have ample, and more than ample, funds for the purpose, both of technical and secondary education—if those funds were well managed—it is absurd that we should have this fresh grant thrust down our throats when we do not want it. If this £60,000 is awarded according to population, Glasgow, which has a population of one-sixth of the whole of Scotland, would, I presume, get £10,000. Why should our £10,000 be appropriated to a purpose for which it is not required? It may perhaps be said then this money need not go to Glasgow, let it go somewhere else. But I contend that if the money is to be divided on the principle of population Glasgow is entitled to £10,000, and why should we be taxed for the benefit of other places? I do not see why you should not make the proposal more elastic, and if we do not want this money for one particular purpose let us have it for another. I do not see how you can carry on this system of secondary education in the sparsely peopled districts, and the only possible way of overcoming the difficulty is to enable the population to reach the efficient secondary centres. But I must say that, for many reasons, I think the best way in which this money could be applied is to the relief of the rates.

(Glasgow and Aberdeen Universities):

Dr. Cameron

I do not propose to hold the balance between the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow and his friends around him. My object in rising is to respond to the appeal which the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire did me the honour to make to me. I agree with all that has been said in favour of continuation schools and with all that has been said in favour of technical education, and if this were an opportunity for doing all that was desirable for education of all kinds I should support hon. Members in standing out for assistance both for continuation schools and for technical schools. But it seems to me that many hon. Gentlemen have made the mistake of treating this measure as if the Government, in introducing it, were acting with an entirely free hand in the way of assisting education. This is not primarily, certainly it is not exclusively, an education measure, and this money with which we are dealing came to us, when we remember its history, with what I may call a certain presumptive destination in favour of the relief of rates. Last Session there was a general movement in Scotland to secure the whole of this money for the relief of the rates, and I regard the proportion—which is complained of by many hon. Gentlemen as contemptibly small—which is proposed to be given to education as so much saved by the Government from the relief of the rates. I should have been glad if this Bill had proposed a larger sum for education. The sum of £60,000 for the assistance of secondary education would well bear to be increased to at least the sum that has been asked for by the Educational Authorities in Scotland, which is £75,000. If the Government can see their way in Committee to add £15,000 to the £60,000, taking it from the Parochial Boards, for instance, I should be very glad. At the same time I think this sum has been spoken of in an unnecessarily contemptuous tone, for hon. Members should remember that £60,000 is £60,000, and not only that, but it is £60,000 more than we have at present; and although it may not do all that is desirable, I have no doubt it will do a great deal for the herance of secondary education. I am not able entirely to follow the scheme which was sketched out by the Lord Advocate, and I believe we shall be able thoroughly to understand it until we see it in the form of a printed Minute. But this feature in itself is commendable, that it proposed to build upon existing foundations and to proceed in something of a tentative fashion. Some objection has been made to the proposal that the Education Department should have the bringing forth of the regulations under which the money is to be distributed; it appears to me that that is rather an advantage than otherwise. The Education Department is to do this in Minutes to be submitted to Parliament, and in printed Minutes I think there is more elasticity and less stereotyping—more room for alterations and improvements—than if the details of the plan had been embodied in a Bill. Members have asked what is meant by secondary education; but I think I gathered from the Lord Advocate some notion of what the secondary education is to be. It is to be education suitable for youths of from thirteen to sixteen years of age; it is to be something that is to follow the standards of the Code. I trust that it will be kept in view by the Education Department, that wherever secondary education is organised there will be a satisfactory staff, a satisfactory standard and a satisfactory curriculum, and that nothing that does not comply with these simple conditions will be recognised as satisfactory. Local organisation is certainly necessary to encourage the institution of higher departments in the rural schools, and I hope the time will soon come when that organisation will take a better form. I should be very much pleased to see the interesting experiment that the hon. Member for Chesham (Mr. A. Acland) described so successful in Wales applied to Scotland, but we cannot have it all at once, because we have not the facilities or the material for instituting such a system at present, but there is no reason why, under the system sketched out in connection with this Bill, we should not come to that in a very long time. Objections have been raised by some hon. Members to the grant of £30,000 to the Scotch Universities on the ground that the money ought to have been taken from other sources, but it appears to me that the Government, in saving something from this sum which was provisionally destined for the relief of the rates, have thought of what was most in need of assistance. No doubt secondary education was more in want of assistance than any other branch of education in Scotland, for what has been done of late years for primary education has rather thrust secondary education back than assisted it. And again, the Universities Act which was passed by Parliament the other year throws great additional expense on the Universities, and without some further assistance it would be impossible to carry out the object of Parliament in passing that Act. Therefore, it was of very great importance to have that assistance for the Universities at once. But in supporting this proposal I hope that I may be permitted to put in a caveat against being supposed to accept this as payment in full of what the Universities have a right to seek from the country. The Universities are national institutions; they are also popular institutions; and we do not know what their position may be in the future, or what their circumstances may be, so as to give them a claim upon the Imperial resources; and whatever we do now must be understood as not shutting the door against applications afterwards should circumstances arise to render such application necessary.

*(10.43.) Mr. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): I do not entirely share the view of my hon. relative who has just spoken, but I am glad to find that he does not give that cordial and sweeping approval to the whole of the scheme of the Government that has been expressed by only one Member who has spoken. My hon. relative can speak with as good authority on educational questions in Scotland as any man, and he agrees with us that a larger sum ought to be given to higher education. He is not frightened by the difficulty of defining secondary education, and he agrees with us, at least, I agree with him, that this sum which is to be given to the Scotch Universities ought not to be considered as a final grant for that purpose. But I would point out to my hon. relative that once he votes for this Bill and for the clause in it which gives £30,000 to the Universities, he will have precious little chance to get any more money for that purpose for many years to come. I will endeavour to bear in mind that I took pretty full advantage of my privilege of speaking on the introduction of this Bill, on which occasion I urged many objections to it. And I can say with perfect honesty of this measure—using the classical phrase which Sir John Burgoyne employed as he gazed upon the fortifications of Sebastopol—the longer I look at it the worse I like it. In the first place, there is a difficulty about the amount we ought to receive; and I must say that I have seldom studied and considered a measure of so intricate and confusing a character. There are different funds, and sums are changed from one to the other, until at last it is difficult to see under which particular thimble the pea is to be found. I think it is almost perfectly impossible accurately to explain the particular meaning of some of the sub-sections of Clause 2, Sub-section 5 especially, as compared with Sub-section 6; and I think, in the painful ingenuity of these proceedings, it is easy to detect the master-hand of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am rather astonished and not a little sorry that, during the discussion to-night, though we have had the presence of the Lord Advocate and his colleague, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has not been here. Now, the attack that has been made upon the proposals of the Government in this Bill has really been much more an attack upon the policy of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than upon the policy of the Scotch Office. I doubt very much whether the Scotch Secretary or the First Lord of the Treasury would have thought of giving this large sum of money for the relief of the rates in Scotland, because they know very well the position of Scotland and the opinions of the people of Scotland; and they know that it has never been formulated as a general desire until it was suggested to the people of Scotland by the measure of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. We have urged that this should be made only a temporary arrangement, either by proceeding by Vote instead of Bill or by making the Bill to be effective only for one year; and I admit at once that there is a great deal in the argument that is used that any uncertainty as to the sums to be allotted to them would cause inconvenience to the Public Bodies who were to receive these sums. That is obvious. But the reason we argue for a temporary arrangement is this: that this is obviously, on the face of it, a mere make-shift arrangement, and that it is nothing short of ridiculous that we should stereotype it for all time as the best arrangement that can possibly be found. Undoubtedly, last year we hoped that the Scotch people would indicate to us some particular object for which this money might be used. We have received no such indication; and, therefore, we must make the best use we can, for the time, of this money. It is on that ground most undesirable that we should fix it for all time, until we had an opportunity, at any rate, of seeing whether some better disposal might not be arrived at. There are two or three of the objects of this Bill to which it is proposed to apply the money which are entirely good in themselves, and of which, in themselves, I approve. There is, in the first place, the sum which is to be allocated to the Universities. I approve of that money being given to the Universities; but what I say is, it ought not to come from this source. This is a special wind-fall coming to the Scotch people, and they ought to use it for some special purpose. The money that is due to us for the Universities is a debt owing to the Universities, and ought to come out of the monies voted by Parliament in the ordinary way. Well, then, I come to the proposal for £25,000 being given for pauper lunatics. Again, I say, it is a purpose for which I approve money being given. We do not receive our proper share of money for this purpose, as compared with England; but what are we doing? That, again, is money which ought to be voted by Parliament in order to publish something like equality between the two countries; and in the case of England it is a movable quantity, a sum which increases according to the expenditure of the Local Bodies, whereas this sum is to be fixed and embodied by being embodied in this Bill.

The third purpose for which the Bill is, I think, properly applied by the Government is the purpose of education.

I was astonished to hear my hon. Friend the Member for the College of Education (Dr. Cameron) take up the question which has been used before, based upon the supposed ignorance of what secondary education is, and making a distinction between secondary education and technical education. I am sure my hon. Friend, when I speak of secondary education, I include technical education. By secondary education I mean, as I think it was defined by my hon. Friend the Member for Perth on that occasion, education which is beyond the usual standards and beyond the usual age of children, whether it be technical or of any other kind; and in this sense I do not think there is anything either very fossilised or objectionable in the idea of higher education. We object to the Vote for education, because the sum is insufficient to begin with—obviously and broadly insufficient. If the thing is to be done let it be done. We have undoubtedly fallen behind in Scotland in this matter of higher education, of the intermediate education, or whatever name by which it may be called; and when we have this large sum to deal with we should give a large part of it for the purpose of setting secondary education on its feet again. Different proposals have been made by my hon. Friends. The hon. Member for East Aberdeen has urged forcibly the claim of evening schools. I am myself not so much concerned about the interests of thickly-populated parts of the country or of the inhabitants of towns as I am about the interests of the inhabitants of rural districts, who at present are very much left out in the cold in these matters; and undoubtedly it is by evening schools, as much as by anything else, that good may be done for them. In the rural districts to which I have referred, if there is one thing which I should have thought should be very clear that ought to be the local control. The right hon. Gentleman the Lord Advocate said that the schools in the rural districts were, as I understood him, to be under the control of individual School Boards; but what is wanted now is a very clear statement of the intention of the Education Department as regards the rural district. There is to be a higher department in the ordinary schools, but not in every ordinary school. Well, but we must have some authority in the county, some proper authority responsible to the public, to say in which of the ordinary parish schools a higher department may be most conveniently set up; and in order to choose properly between separate small parishes, I think it would be most desirable to have an authority representative of, and responsible to, the public, which would command much more confidence on the part of the Scotch people than any Minute whatever from the Scotch Education Department, however ably conducted—and undoubtedly it is ably conducted—that Department may be. But now the right hon. Gentleman has detailed to us, in a most interesting speech, a general scheme for the application of this money. We listened to it as best we could, and followed it as best we could; but I would urge upon the right hon. Gentleman that, at least before we get into Committee, we should have some of the data upon which he proceeded. I would ask him to present, as a Return to this House, a Paper by which we can study the main heads and lines of the scheme, if we cannot have the actual Minute of the Department—because without that we are really moving very much in the dark; and I think that nothing would conduce more to facilitate, and therefore to accelerate, the discussion and the progress of this question than our being placed in possession of the particulars to which he referred. It is proved, in fact, by the Debate that we ought to have that information. There is one phrase used by the right hon. Gentleman to which I have a great objection. He said “free places” would be given in the schools. That is an old friend of last year. Last summer we heard of “free places” being given in certain schools where the fees were not to be altogether abolished in England. Nothing, to my mind, is more objectionable than that some of the scholars should be ticketed as free scholars. That is an unfortunate distinction. We have attempted to meet the case in Scotland by the use of bursaries which the children can compete for, and which involve no direct degradation but an honour to those who secure them; but the idea of having a few places set apart as "free places" for the children, like the "free seats" provided in churches, is, I think, inconsistent with that spirit of equality that ought to prevail among the children who are being taught in the same school. Having disposed of the third of the objects which I think are good objects upon which the money is to be spent, I come now to the fourth object, to which I cannot give the same praise. The balance of the money is to be handed over to the Town Councils and County Councils for the relief of the rates. Well, even my hon. Friend the Member for the College Division—while he supports the Bill—admitted that there is some evil in it; that it is not a sound method of administering local affairs, and also that the money which is raised from the working classes will not return to them, in the shape of advantages, in the same proportion as it is taken from them; and that injustice will be done to them in the matter to some extent. But I have already said that this idea of the relief of the rates is an English idea altogether. It was not known or thought of in Scotland until this Fund was created, and until it was known that the Chancellor of the Exchequer was anxious to give it to the Scotch people for this purpose. I have on previous occasions expressed my views on this subject so strongly that I need not repeat them now. I will only suggest that if the Government have not been able to discover any better object for which this money should be applied, they should, even at this hour, give it to Town and County Councils to do what they like with it. We have heard a great deal about the unanimity of Local Authorities in favour of the proposal of the Government, but I should like to point out that the Town Council of Edinburgh has asked that this amount should not be specially assigned to go to the relief of rates, but that they should be allowed to use it for any purpose for the general good of the community to which they found it could be well applied. If this suggestion to give a free hand to the Local Authorities were adopted, it would, in my opinion, largely modify the excessive hostility which is felt to this part of the measure. The Bill as a whole is so open to objection—what is good in it is so badly done, and what is bad in it is so objectionable—that I am bound to say I will gladly give a vote against it. But that does not involve the rejection of the money. I do not want the Chancellor of the Exchequer to have this money merely to swell his balances; I wish to see it applied to some Scotch purpose more useful and more beneficial than that which is proposed. Therefore, in protesting against this Bill—which is all we can do under present circumstances—we protest against the scheme and the method by which this money is proposed to be applied, and in doing so, notwithstanding what has been said, I am satisfied that we shall have the support of the great bulk of Scotch opinion. I have no fault to find with the Town Councils and County Councils and Parochial Boards who have memorialised in favour of this Bill; they have only been doing what it is their right and their duty to do in asking for a large share of the money; but I think that the more enlightened of them will gladly accept the modified proposal which I have suggested—namely, that the money should go to them without the restrictions which the Government would would impose.

(11.6.) THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR SCOTLAND (Mr. GRAHAM MURRAY, Bute): The ambit of the Debate which has taken place has been rather a wide one; but in the observations I have to offer to the House I shall attempt rather to follow the logical order of the topics dealt with than the particular order in which the speakers came. First, I think, comes the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen. He began by waving the flag of a national grievance, and by suggesting that the first thing we had to find fault with was that Scotland does not this time get quite enough money. He based his arguments upon some figures which he had collected for himself, because he saw no hope of getting them from the Committee. I need not follow him through those figures, it will be enough to say that the proportion fixed by the Treasury officials has been borne out by the experience of three successive years. Further, the matter has not been concluded once for all. By the words which now find a place in the Bill it will always be left open till the House comes to a more perfect state of knowledge than it at present possesses. Now, the amount is described as £265,000—

“Or such other amount as Parliament may determine having regard to the amount of the fee grant under the Elementary Education Act, 1891.”

Therefore, if the determination of the Committee on the Financial Relations of the three Kingdoms—the appointment of which, I think, has been delayed by the wish of the Welsh Members to rush into the fray rather than by any action of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—should make for the result arrived at by the hon. and learned Member for Aberdeen rather than the figures brought up by the Treasury officials, Scotland would get the credit of those different figures. Having settled the amount of money with which we have to deal, the next question is what we have to do with it. I need not remind the House of the way in which this Fund has come into existence. The result of the particular genesis of the Fund has been almost to earmark it as one to be apportioned, at least to a certain extent, to the relief of rates. It has been said that this plan of Government Imperial Funds in aid of local rates is a plan which is unsound, and which has never been countenanced by the Members from Scotland. To that argument I entirely demur. When once you have adopted a general policy, I cannot admit that it is to be departed from at the request of the Members for one part of the United Kingdom. So far from these proposals being put forward as a bait by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, they have been pressed upon him by deputations from Public Bodies, and I can only admire the ease with which Members of the Opposition discount the views of elected bodies when they do not approve of them by saying either that they have lost their mandate, or that upon the question at issue they do not represent the people. Nor can I admit that in this case money has been taken out of the pockets of the poor and put into the pockets of the rich. It has been said that the £100,000 of License Duties are contributed by the rich, and also the moiety of the Probate, amounting to £160,000, making altogether £260,000. The sums given in “bare, naked, and brutal” relief of the rates under the Acts of 1888 and 1889, and under this measure, including the £25,000 which has been given to enable the Lunacy Boards to treat lunatics more generously, amount to £210,000, compared with the available £260,000 which it has been said is the contribution of the rich. Now, Sir, there was a second argument used against the proposition of the Government. It was said—and the matter was more developed on the First Reading than it has been to-day—that the amounts, when you come to consider the actual relief, are so shabby and trumpery, amounting to a penny or twopence, that it was really throwing money into the sea. I entirely demur to measuring the usefulness of a reduction of rates by this penny arithmetic to find out how much the rate actually comes to on anybody's property; and I think I may certainly appeal with confidence to those hon. Members who have had something to do with municipal administration. Take as an instance the great City of Glasgow; experience has shown that when that Municipality sets itself to arrange its taxation, it is not guided and governed so much by what I may call the statutory limit on each particular tax, but it is guided by the rough and ready idea: what will the rates come to? In the long investigation we had connected with the neighbouring burghs, the thing ever fixedly kept before the eye and in the mind was this: what the total amount of the rates would be. Therefore, Sir, when you are given an enlightened

Municipality—and it does not lie in the mouths of hon. Members to say that we are not dealing with enlightened Municipalities—when you are giving them this money you are really giving them a free hand to go on with their various schemes of improvement without having their good endeavours throttled by the feeling that they would raise the rates beyond the given amount. There are many rates which go for the use and the benefit of the poor man, and the poor man entirely. Take a rate like the improvement rate in Glasgow. There an immense work was done, at very great cost, by what I may call the Hausmannising of Glasgow. The real gainers were not the wealthy inhabitants, but the working men, owing to the dens and slums being cleared away. You really give an enlightened Municipality a chance of going on in that way when they would be otherwise fettered if you gave them money to be applied in the reduction of rates. Now, Sir, the next point is as to the £25,000 to the Parochial Boards. I have told the House the justification for that in answer to a question addressed to me by the hon. Member for Caithness. Next, Sir, we come to the Universities, and there, again, I really need not detain the House, because there has been undoubted unanimity to-night; I do not think anybody has grudged the sum set aside for the Universities. The hon. Member behind me has reminded me of the extreme good fortune that puts it within the power of the House at this time to apply money which makes a certainty of practical success of that large measure of University reform that was carried by the present Government. I say also that there again we are doing truly national work, although I think one hon. Member rather misunderstood the observations of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Roxburgh. At the same time, I entirely agree with him that the Universities of Scotland are truly the possession and the appanage of the poor. Now, I pass to that portion of the Bill on which much of the Debate has ranged, as to the provision of a certain sum of money for the purpose of secondary education; and here, Sir, I would like to say that it seems to me that there has been a fallacy which has lurked behind and has penetrated many of the arguments used by gentlemen opposite. This is not an occasion on which the Government are coming forward to the House with a scheme which they themselves consider, or which they wish to be considered, as a complete scheme of secondary education. This is an occasion on which, there being a sum of money at their disposal, and there being a widespread and openly-expressed desire on the part of the people of Scotland that secondary education should be given a fresh trial, they have seen their way to ask that this money should be devoted to that object. The only test it was fair to ask the Government to meet, and it was fully met in the speech of my right hon. Friend in introducing this Bill, was that the Government were bound to show that the sum they ask the House to devote was sufficient to make an adequate beginning, and that the plan should be so far sketched as to show that it was not an illusory but a practical plan, which could be carried out with the money that it is proposed to devote to that purpose. Now, Sir, the hon. Gentleman the Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Bryce), although he did not for the reasons he stated formally move the Amendment standing in his name, at the same time indicated in his speech that one of the reasons why he did not approve of the Government proposal in favour of secondary education was that he thought any measure of this sort ought to have been preceded by some sort of inquiry into the resources of the country. I already indicated why, from the Government point of view, no such inquiry was necessary. The Government were only called upon to answer two questions, and these two questions have been answered. The first question is: Is secondary education wanted? Sir, the tone of the Debate shows that, in the views of all, secondary education is wanted. Then the only other question is this: Are there funds already available sufficient to meet that want? There, again, I think the answer is not in doubt. No doubt we have in Scotland very many endowed schools which have lately been dealt with under an Act and under a Commission; but I think we are all agreed that these endowed schools and their funds are, in many instances, tied up according to the wishes of the pious founders, and are not available for any national system of education. Next comes the question, if we want secondary education, and there are not funds enough, and we propose to supply these funds, who are the parties to carry out this scheme? There, again, I think this Debate has exhibited a curious feeling of distrust on the part of hon. Members opposite to the Scotch Education Department. I cannot help again expressing my wonderment that so many of those in whose speeches I have found an extraordinary desire that the State should step in and manage everything yet, when they have any department created, grow somewhat jealous and frightened of it. These hon. Members have got an extraordinary love for their unborn children; but when they come to birth, they turn upon them like the paternal rabbit and devour them. Sir, the Committee of Education in Scotland was the creation of the Liberal Party in 1872. The House knows how it is appointed; and if the prophecies of gentlemen opposite are true, before these arrangements can be carried out, they will be in a position to nominate the Members who are to have the supervision of this scheme. Now, I indicated before that the Government have fairly met the question of whether the plan they have put before the House was a practical plan. I think that the figures given by my hon. Friend behind me show that it is a practical plan. One hon. Gentleman spoke—I think it was the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Mr. Esslemont)—as if that plan only dealt with 4 per cent. of the children, but the figure 4 per cent. was not given by the Government, but by another speaker, and the Government proposal is calculated on 16 per cent., not on 4 per cent. of the available children. It must be kept in mind that this scheme, such as it is, will all be embodied in a Minute, and that Minute will be laid upon the Table of the House; and if there is anything wrong in it, it will then be within the province of the House to put the matter right. It is impossible that a scheme of this sort should rise fully armed like Minerva in the shape of a Bill. The great thing is to make a beginning; and when that beginning is made, and you see something of the practical working, then the House will be able to have that control of the matter which hon. Members would seem to wish. If this works well, there is no reason why more money should not be got. I am not looking forward to any such change, but certainly it will be in the power of hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, should they find themselves in a majority, to obtain money from other sources. The hon. Gentleman who opened this Debate said he had no desire to attempt to get butter from a dog's mouth. I suppose the difficulty does not arise in respect to dealing with the dog—but then butter melts; but I imagine he will foresee no difficulty in supplementing this money as occasion offers. And now I pass on to a few other sporadic criticisms on the scheme which have been addressed to the House. One hon. Member has complained that there is no provision for erecting secondary schools. Well, of course, our object is a modest one, and we begin by utilising existing schools; and in regard to those burghs which do not possess such schools they will be treated exactly as counties in the formation of educational centres. Then it has been said that all School Boards should have to do with secondary education, that one should not be picked out; but surely, the arrangement being made with due regard to the requirements and ages of the children, there is no grievance in the fact there is a School Board contiguous which has no hand in the government of the school, seeing that the whole thing will, after all, be subject to the Central Authority? Then from several hon. Members there have been claims put forward in the interest of technical education. Of course, technical education is viewed in different senses, but taking it in its ordinary sense I think it must be a matter of common agreement, first of all, with a modest sum of £60,000 we cannot go in for any scheme of technical education; secondly, technical education is a matter which ought not to be mixed up with the Education Department at all. It seems to me the Education Department are not the proper supervisors of such things as cooking and butter-making. It is rather in another direction we should look for assistance to technical education. Without pledging ourselves, we are anxious to meet the wishes of Public Bodies, and, therefore, with reference to what the right hon. Gentleman opposite has said, we shall certainly gladly consider any proposition that is made to us by Public Bodies, through Members of this House or otherwise, to allow a certain amount of elasticity in the way they should deal with the money which is to be allowed primarily to be applied to the reduction of rates. Then it has been said that the great object to be kept in view is the benefit of poor children. Now, there it seems to me the strong point of our scheme comes in, for as hon. Members will have gathered from the details given by my right hon. Friend, these poor children are to be assisted by having free places allotted to them. I know this drew a storm of criticism from some hon. Members, but I do not sympathise with the remarks about the stigma attaching to a person who, sending his children to school, has a certain amount of assistance given him. I am not aware that any stigma attaches to those who go to Eton or the foundation at Winchester, but I am aware that most distinguished men have had assistance in their education there. For the assistance of poor children only two other alternatives offer—the total abolition of all fees or a system of bursaries. We cannot face total abolition of fees for all schools, and for my part I must prefer a system of free places to the creation of bursaries. Then the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Shiress Will) objected to the stereotyping of this particular sum, but I may remind my hon. Friend that in such a case as this, as in making a testamentary arrangement, it is usual and convenient to have a residue clause after stereotyping other arrangements. On another point I may say that it is quite impossible ever to sketch any educational system without an element of permanency, and when the right hon. Gentleman opposite criticises these proposals as makeshifts I think he rather ignores the words that fell from him in the Debate on the First Reading, when he excused himself in taking the unusual course of discussing a Bill before he had seen it, by saying that the proposals in the Bill were perfectly familiar. Now I think I have dealt with most of the criticisms. [Mr. ESSLEMONT: Evening schools.] I have great sympathy with this part of the subject, but remember the work of evening schools may be divided into two classes. So far as they are elementary schools they are outside our present proposals; but so far as they are secondary schools they fall within the ambit of our proposition, and there is nothing in our scheme to prevent a local teacher from arranging for evening classes if he thinks that is the best means of carrying out the work. Now I have answered criticisms as best I can, and I must remind the House of this. It is not only the case that we have with us the opinion of the people of Scotland, as shown in deputations and petitions, but we have a divided set of opinions from right hon. Gentlemen opposite. This we saw from the first from the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bradford (Sir G. Trevelyan) and the spirit of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Stirling Burghs (Mr. Campbell-Bannerman). Then we had a sort of Judgment of Paris conducted by the hon. Member for Dundee between the competing claims of the two right hon. Gentlemen for his allegiance. I do not gloat over the fact of these divided counsels, but I look upon them as a compliment to the wisdom of the proposals of the Government. Even the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron), who began by telling us the whole thing was a mistake, and who came in like the month of March now expiring, went out like a lamb, saying the money was here, and probably the Government proposed the best method of distribution. It has been hinted that there is some sinister electioneering object in the proposals of the Government, that they have made an attempt to propitiate every class, and this was said more openly in our first Debate than it has been said to-night. I will make hon. Gentlemen a present of that contention. If I have been able successfully to show that the objects to which this money is to be applied are legitimate objects, and that it is applied in a practical way, then even though the result should be to bring electioneering success in its wake, if it satisfies all classes in Scotland I wish for no better test of what is true legislation.

(11.47.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): The position of the Government after the criticisms from this side of the House has been made very much more clear by the fresh and able speech we have just heard. But I confess that speech has not removed in any degree the objections which I and some of my friends entertain to the Bill. As time is short, I will address myself to one or two of the new arguments brought forward rather than to the more general features of the Bill sketched out by the Lord Advocate. To one argument used by the Solicitor General I must strongly demur. He said, in reference to the allocation of the money to the relief of rates, that when we urged that there was no demand in Scotland for this allocation of the money we ought not to be listened to, because, he said, this was a matter of general policy, and the Imperial Parliament having decided this, the precedent of England must be followed, and the Scottish people had no right to refuse this. It is a serious way of putting the case, and one I hope the Scottish people will take note of. In the first place, I say it was not we on this side of the House who divided the Scotch money from the English and put it into a separate Budget, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He took away the Scotch money and said, "This is the amount you are entitled to," and when he tells us the sum Scotland is entitled to I think he can hardly refuse to concede to us the right of saying how we are to dispose of it. Surely, on a question of devoting the money to local purposes, the wishes of localities should be considered? I am perfectly certain that the Government have misinterpreted the true opinion of the Scottish people, which is that the money ought to be devoted to some more useful purpose than the relief of rates. The proposals of the Government have been described by the First Lord of the Treasury as a compromise, but I deny that they have that character. It is no more a compromise than a decision on the tossing of a halfpenny; it is a haphazard conclusion, not a compromise arrived at after an attempt to harmonise conflicting views. We do not claim the whole of the money for secondary education, but we say that the amount given is too small, and the great majority of Members are willing enough that you should give the residue to Local Authorities if you give them a free hand in the disposal of it. If you relieve the rates of a county, it is only an inducement to increase the rates; you do not enable them to spend the money in any improvements, however beneficial they might be to the public. With surprise and great regret I learn that the Government have determined to divorce technical from secondary education. Intermediate education is the right word as it is understood in Wales. A county constituency like mine does not want Latin and Greek, but we do want a higher department for technical education set up in our midst. The Solicitor General admits this is not a complete scheme for secondary education, and the Government, having no definite idea for the disposal of this sum of £60,000, propose to hand it over to the Scotch Education Department. Now that is not the way to deal with such a question. Scotland is not so abundantly wealthy that this £60,000 is not an important sum. It is too small for the purpose, but it would be a great and serious loss to the country if it were uselessly and thoughtlessly expended. It is not too much to say that for the cause of secondary education the misuse of this money might be worse than no money at all. It would be easy, with the full consent of the great majority of Scotch Members, to take a sufficient sum from other objects and devote it to secondary education. The Solicitor General sneered at our demand that representative bodies should control the administration of this money. "Why," he said, "should you not be satisfied with the Education Department?" We have not sufficient confidence in that Department. In the case of elementary education we have administration by local representative bodies, though, to a certain and proper degree, they are under the supervision of the Education Department, as such bodies should be. Here is a golden opportunity to organise a system of secondary education, and depend upon it, though it be not done to-day, it will have to be done to-morrow. What is there to prevent the creation of such a system as works successfully in Wales for intermediate education, the conditions being more favourable in Scotland? There is, the Lord Advocate said, to be a certain local initiative. But how in rural districts will you have an agreement so that there may be a local initiative? The School Boards are duped if they think they are going to be taken into confidence by the Education Department; they will have nothing to do with the matter, it will be entirely and absolutely handed over to the Education Department. That is the proposal to which we have the strongest objection, and which I am sure when it comes to be thoroughly understood in Scotland will be emphatically condemned. But for the lateness of the hour I would prolong my remarks, for I feel the deep importance of the subject to Scotland. Mistakes will be made which will be very difficult to repair, and unless in Committee the Government make concessions they will leave to their successors a legacy difficult to deal with.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Provand.)

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am aware of the great interest felt in the Bill, but I may remind the House that we had a very long Debate on the introduction of the Bill, and we have had a full night's discussion on the Second Reading. Most of the points raised may very well be discussed in Committee. I hope the House will feel that if we adjourn the Debate now the Second Reading may be taken after a further brief discussion.

Motion agreed to.

Debate adjourned till Monday next.

Mr. Crawford

BURGH POLICE AND HEALTH (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 230.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling, &c.): No one can be more strongly in favour of proceeding with the Bill than I am, but at the same time I must object; the Bill is not yet in the hands of Members.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

TAXES (REGULATION OF REMUNERATION) BILL.—(No. 219.)

SECOND READING.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."

(12.0.) MR. BONSOR (Surrey, Wimbledon): I hope objection will not be taken to proceeding with the Second Reading. I and several other Members have given notice of objection to the Bill, because we have feared that friction would arise between the Treasury and the Commissioners of Taxes in the appointment of subordinate officers. But my right hon. Friend the Secretary to the Treasury has given me an assurance that he will in Committee introduce Amendments which will absolutely remove all possibility of such friction, and therefore I hope the Second Reading may now be taken, for it will enormously benefit a large class of public servants. I hope the Bill may be allowed to go through.

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): It is of importance to the class concerned that the proposals in the Bill should take effect in the current financial year, but I fear that cannot be done if the Second Reading is delayed.

It being after Midnight, and Objection being taken to Further Proceeding, the Debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

COLONIAL PROBATES BILL [Lords.]
(No. 231).

COMMITTEE.

Considered in Committee.
(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not know that I have need to object to the Bill, but I think we might have some explanation of it.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Bill is a very simple one; it gives effect to the wish expressed in the Colonial Conference of 1887. Several of the colonies—Victoria, New Zealand, South Australia, West Australia, and Tasmania—have passed Acts, providing that where a competent Court in this country has granted probate or letters of administration for deceased persons having property in those colonies they shall have the same effect as if they were granted in the colonies. This Bill proposes reciprocal legislation, and provides that the Queen may, by Order in Council, on being satisfied that the Legislature of any British possession has made adequate provision for the recognition of probates and letters of administration granted by Courts of the United Kingdom, direct that this Act shall apply, so that probate and letters of administration granted in the colony for persons having property in this country may be recognised here.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): Does the right hon. Gentleman propose that probates and letters of administration issued in a colony shall be recognised here without registration?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, they must be registered.

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported without Amendment; read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

EAST INDIA OFFICERS BILL.
[Lords.]

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 246.]

GAMING ACT (1845) AMENDMENT BILL. [Lords.]

Read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 247.]

PUBLIC LIBRARIES LAW CONSOLIDATION BILL.—(No. 143.)

Order for Committee read, and discharged.

Bill committed to a Select Committee.

MOTIONS.

SEDUCTION BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Patrick O'Brien, Bill to amend the Law relating to the Seduction of Women, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Patrick O'Brien, Mr. John Redmond, Mr. Walter M'Laren, Mr. Octavius V. Morgan, and Mr. Dillwyn.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 254.]

CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS BILL.

On Motion of Sir Horace Davey, Bill to amend the Law relating to Chartered Accountants, ordered to be brought in by Sir Horace Davey, Sir Albert Rollit, and Mr. Dixon-Hartland.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 255.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That this House do now adjourn."

FINANCIAL RELATIONS (ENGLAND, IRELAND, AND SCOTLAND) COMMITTEE.

(12.12.) DR. CLARK: I wish to ask if the Government have really any intention to move the appointment of the Committee on the financial relations of the three countries? The Motion stands on the Paper for to-night, and for three years this Motion has been in suspense and has been brought before us at such times when it has been impossible for us to consider it. Is the Committee really to be appointed? We have been told in reference to Bills in which these financial relations are concerned, that if there is anything wrong in the proportion of grant for Scotland, then this shall be set right by and by when the Committee have reported, but the Report of the Committee will never get us back our arrears for these years. Scotch Members feel that they are being defrauded by the course the Government are pursuing, and it is time for the First Lord to say if the Government really mean that the Committee shall be appointed. The Welsh Members insist that the position of Wales shall also be discussed by the Committee and I think they are quite right. The only way to secure the appointment of the Committee is to make the Motion some night at eleven o'clock. I believe the discussion would be concluded in an hour, but it is not the slightest use putting down the Motion night after night when it cannot possibly be taken.

(12.14.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I quite agree with the hon. Member that there is a certain amount of inconvenience in having the Motion down day after day, and Session after Session. But the Government are not to blame for that. If we are unable to get the Second Reading of a Bill to which on principle there is no opposition after eight long hours of Debate and after a long discussion on the First Reading, it is not likely that we can find time to discuss at length an intricate and controversial question connected with the financial relations of the various parts of the United Kingdom. The hon. Member suggests closing another Debate at eleven o'clock, but we have no certainty that a Debate on this subject commenced at that hour would conclude at twelve o'clock, and the result would probably be that we should waste an hour and get no nearer to the appointment of the Committee. Under the circumstances, I am afraid, seeing how Government Business is in arrear, that I cannot give such a pledge as the hon. Member asks for.

(12.16.) MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): The appointment of this Committee was promised in the course of the Budget Debate in 1890, and part of the grievance is ours. I must say on behalf of the Irish Members, that the blame for the non-appointment of the Committee is with the Government alone. The right hon. Gentleman speaks of the subject being intricate and controversial, but the Motion is for the appointment of a Committee and surely there is nothing intricate about that whatever may be case with the labours of the Committee when appointed. The point of controversy is the inclusion of Wales, and this must be determined after a comparative brief Debate. Three Sessions have been allowed to pass, and no reasonable attempt has been made by the Government to settle the question. I am bound to say I think the Government are trifling with the House, and this is a mockery of the Irish and Scotch Members whose interests are primarily concerned. If the Government do not intend to take any definite action in this matter it would be better that they should withdraw the Motion altogether.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: May I ask the Welsh Members would be satisfied with half an hour's Debate?

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): That is not a reasonable proposition seeing that the right hon. Gentleman has himself said it will require more than an hour.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I said it would take more than that. I do not say it requires that time.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I will not attempt to define the distinction. We desire that Wales shall be included in the Investigation, and it is only a pedantic objection of the Chancellor of the Exchequer stands in the way. The right hon. Gentleman argues that Wales has no claim to be considered a separate entity.

MR. SPEAKER: The question cannot be debated now, though a question may be asked.

MR. S. T. EVANS: I was endeavouring to induce the right hon. Gentleman to accept the Amendment standing in my name. If he will not do that, then let him take the discussion at a reasonable hour in the evening but he may be assured that there is not the slightest intention on the part of Welsh Members to withdraw the Amendment.

House adjourned at a quarter after Twelve o'clock

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Friday, 1st April, 1892.

SITTINGS OF THE HOUSE.

QUESTION.—OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : Might I ask the noble Marquess when he proposes to adjourn the House for the Easter Recess, and for how long?

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY): I think the noble Lord will sympathise with me when I say that we have not been overburdened with work, and that, at the pace the House of Commons is going, an immediate excess of work is not probable. I therefore propose that we should adjourn on Thursday next to Monday the 2nd of May.

DURATION OF SPEECHES IN THE HOUSE OF LORDS BILL. [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN : My Lords, I see no notice on the Orders of the Day for the postponement of this Order, and, as it has been for three years before your Lordships in one shape or another, I trust you will have patience with me whilst I explain the reason for which I have endeavoured to bring it forward. My Lords, since the last postponement of it a noble Lord on this side of the House made an extremely long speech, and during the whole of that speech it was impossible to say on which side his vote would be given. Well, my Lords, no noble Lord would have interrupted the speaker in the course of that Debate. Now this Motion of mine is really the most inoffensive measure that could possibly be submitted to any Assembly. My Lords, you have an hour glass for the time of taking a Division,—two minutes; you might have an hour glass as the preachers formerly had their hour glass and turned it over, and sometimes spoke for two hours. My Lords, I have bestowed great pains upon this Bill, and if it is read a second time it will neither commit you nor myself to any further steps in the matter. It is not intended as an insult to the House, but it really is for the protection of those who do not wish to hear long unnecessary speeches. My nearest neighbour in Scotland has introduced a measure for reducing speeches at the County Council to ten minutes; and the noble Lord, the late High Commissioner of the Church of Scotland, wished it to be 15 minutes. But, my Lords, there was nothing to take away the invidious position of the chairman, because he alone would have to pronounce whether the time were up or not. What I have seen at the Diocesan Councils has operated extremely well; it has given offence to no man; and at Westminster Town Hall I was present at a meeting at which Dr. Cameron was chairman, when a foreigner wished to exceed his time for his paper, and was very indignant at being stopped. I ventured to interpose, and, I believe, gave offence to no one. My Lords, in a large meeting of delegates from the different Poor Law Unions the important question was discussed whether out-door relief should be altogether refused or granted with discrimination. Twenty-eight speakers spoke at that meeting, 18 for discrimination and ten against everything but the offer of the house to those who probably would not accept it. This occupied only one day; but, if unlimited time had been given to the speakers, of course a great deal more time would have been occupied. My Lords, I ventured to include the other House, but I was told that it was quite beyond the power of this House. At the same time it is perfectly well understood that, if any measure is introduced in this House, it can be adopted, if palatable, in the other House. That was the case with the Newfoundland Fisheries Bill, and it is a pity it did not begin in the other House. My Lords, I have had a very long experience in this House. I have spoken less, certainly not more often, than any other Member of the House, and I defy anyone to deny that proposition: and, if it be said that I have brought forward this Bill with any selfish motive my position shows that I have no such motive. My Lords, I earnestly beg you not to postpone the Second Reading. I shall be for ever grateful to you if you read the Bill a second time; but, if you do not let it pass, I shall think it is from a personal antipathy to myself, and a determination that nothing which I propose shall ever be accepted. My Lords, with the utmost respect, I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Denman.)

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: I trust the noble Lord will not draw, from any conduct which I may pursue, any such gloomy inferences as those he has suggested. He appears to me, I confess, to be very similar to those saints of old of whom we read, who were accustomed to inflict upon themselves the most frightful sorts of discipline on account of sins from which they were notoriously free. I do not think that this House is guilty of many long speeches. The noble Lord appears to have heard some noble Peer make some long speech,—I wondered who it was, and I do not know now who it was. I think he might almost as well bring in a Bill to prevent too much business being transacted in this House, or the attendance on these Benches being too large. As the noble Lord says, the Bill will do no harm. I believe that is true. But, on the other hand, I am afraid it may give unintentional offence. I think that, when Members of the House of Commons read what we have been doing in our votes, they will say to themselves: "It is perfectly impossible that the House of Lords can have been serious in intending to apply to themselves this prohibition against long speeches,—it must have been a covert and circuitous way of reflecting upon the characteristics which some of us believe belong to the House of Commons;" and I am afraid that that Assembly might take it ill if we attempted, in this indirect fashion, to correct a deficiency which public opinion sometimes charges upon their proceedings. Desiring therefore to maintain perfect peace between the two Houses, I feel I have no other course but to move that this Bill be read a second time this day six months.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and add at the end of the Motion ("this day six months.")—(The Marquess of Salisbury.)

On Question whether ("now") shall stand part of the Motion, resolved in the negative.

Bill to be read 2^a this day six months.

Lord Denman

LORD DENMAN: I beg leave to say that I should have wished the House to be divided upon this point. I really do not think I have deprived myself of the right to name a Teller. I have never called upon any noble Lord to support me, or done anything but what is open and straightforward; and to be deprived of the power of seeing which noble Lords wish to speak at great length, and which do not, is really a very great deprivation.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (ACQUISITION OF LAND) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

*LORD BASING: I have to ask your Lordships to give a Second Reading to a small measure which has passed the other House of Parliament, and has also I believe received the sanction and approval of the Government. It is a Bill to extend to all assurances by deed of land to Local Authorities for any purpose for which such Authorities are authorised to acquire land, certain exemptions from the provisions of the Mortmain Act which have been granted already in the case of elementary schools, public museums, dwellings for the working-classes and other such objects, the effect of which would be, if those exemptions were in force, to render it impossible for the conveyance of land to be made to any Public Authority for any public purpose except upon valuable consideration, or unless twelve months expired before any use could be made of it. By way of illustration I may say that one of the objects of the Bill is that Country Road Authorities may thus acquire land by deed from neighbouring proprietors who may be willing to give it without selling it, for the purpose of improving their roads, straightening and rounding off corners, and so on. I believe the want of this provision has been found inconvenient in many cases. I can conceive of no possible objection to its being granted in the cases described—namely, where Local Authorities are authorised to acquire the land.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."
—(The Lord Basing.)

LORD HERSCHELL: My Lords, I only want to say a word in support of this Bill. I think it is a useful measure, although the noble Lord opposite said it was a small one. I should have introduced provisions of this sort last year into the Mortmain Bill, which I introduced myself; but for the fear of weighting it too much I strictly confined it to matters that appeared then to be more or less urgent. I am quite sure it will be a useful reform to amend the Act in this manner.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I do not want to interrupt the harmony and agreement that appears to have been entered into between my noble Friends on my right and on my left; but I must say that I regard this Bill with something like despair. We thought that we had settled the Mortmain Act, and I confess that I have never myself been very much enamoured of the Mortmain Act; but if once you are to have a codification of the Mortmain Act, and then you are going little by little to introduce exceptions, I do not know to what extent the codification of any branch of the law will extend. I must say I very much protest against the mode in which this alteration is effected. Is there any noble Lord in the House who knows the extent and degree to which this Act will extend? I do not believe there is one of your Lordships who does, for this reason: that instead of saying plainly what is wanted, by this Bill Section 6 of the Mortmain Act is to apply—

“Not only to the assurances therein mentioned, but also to any assurance by deed of land to any Local Authority, for any purpose or purposes for which such Authority is empowered by any Act of Parliament to acquire land”; and then,

“For the purpose of this Act, ‘Local Authority’ has the same meaning as in the Local Loans Act, 1875, and ‘assurance’ has the same meaning as in the Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act,” 1888.”

I cannot help thinking that this is a very bad example of a very bad system of legislation, by the reference of one Act to another without giving in the slightest degree the true effect and meaning of the Act as it is proposed to be passed. And I myself do not know (and I must confess the same ignorance that I have imputed to your Lordships) to what extent it will go. I must say to my noble Friend in charge of the Bill that, between this time and the time when it comes before the Standing Committee, I will take care to make myself acquainted with it; and, although I do not propose to oppose the Second Reading, I shall certainly see whether it will not be necessary to excise some of the powers by this Bill given to any Local Authority for any purpose whatever. It seems to me much too wide, and, at all events, to require very careful consideration.

LORD HENNIKER: My Lords, I do not wish to make any remark of course upon what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said. He knows far better about these things than I can pretend to do; but so far as this Bill concerns the Department I represent in this House, there is no objection whatever to the Second Reading. At the same time, it is thought that a great many Amendments may be brought forward when the Bill comes into Committee; and of course when notice is given of those Amendments they will be considered.

LORD HERSCHELL: I may perhaps be allowed to say one word, with a view to the next stage, with reference to my noble and learned Friend’s observations about the codifying of the Mortmain Laws. My noble and learned Friend does not mean of course that, because you codify, you are never to amend; but what he has said does suggest, I think, that it would be desirable to consider whether the title of the Bill should not be altered. It really is an Amendment of the Mortmain Act by the extension of Section 6, and the definition of “assurance” is that which is in the Mortmain Act; and I suggest that the title, instead of being the “Local Authorities (Acquisition of Land) Act,” should be the “Mortmain and Charitable Uses Act, 1892, to be read with the principal Act.” I think that would be an improvement in view of the fact that the law has been codified.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: With regard to something that fell from my noble and learned Friend as to legislation by Reference, I wish to throw out for consideration by the authorities in this House,—I do not like to propose it until it has been sufficiently considered,—whether it would not be possible to adopt a useful reform in that respect into our proceedings here. Nobody imagines of course that the system of legislation by Reference is more convenient for those who have to administer or interpret the law; but it is much more convenient for those who have to pass the law. It is found that many Bills actually would not pass at all unless some such contrivance were introduced. I believe we owe to Lord Thring the original devising of that plan, or at least the extending of it to a large area; but I would suggest that, without interfering in the least with the salutary practice of passing Bills in that way, when they get to the last stage of this House we should then substitute for the Reference the quotation from the enactment to which we refer, which would very greatly assist the researches of those who have afterwards to ascertain what the law is, and how it is to be administered. The only evil would be that it would add slightly to the printer's bill; but I do not think that would be a formidable drawback.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House on Tuesday next.

HARES BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

LORD DENMAN: My Lords, there is an extraordinary inconsistency in this Bill, for hare hunting is prohibited during the whole of March. Living in a very inclement county, we find it very difficult even to begin hare hunting, because the frost comes and stops us; and now we shall be obliged to stop before March. It is said in the almanacks that hare hunting ends on the 20th of February. It has gone on a great deal longer; but, at the same time, masters of harriers must recollect that they will be subjected to a penalty if they hunt the hare after February. My Lords, I am extremely glad to see this protection afforded to hares, for I much prefer stag hunting to any other sport. My Lords, I point this out,—that masters of harriers may prepare and get as much hare hunting as ever they can. I am very glad the Bill is passed. The late Clerk of the House, the most distinguished Clerk that ever lived, Mr. Cooper, was so fond of hares that his history of his attachment to them, and their attachment to him, makes me very glad when anything can exempt them from pain: and we know that being torn in pieces must be dreadful pain. It has always been my object to be at the end of a run and take the hare up and break its neck, and I should like to break anybody else's neck who opposes the Bill.

Bill read 3^a (according to order), with an Amendment, and passed and returned to the Commons.

House adjourned at ten minutes before Five o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 1st April, 1892.

The House met at Two of the clock.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

BIRMINGHAM CORPORATION WATER BILL.—(by Order.)

SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I rise, Sir, to a point of Order. The hon. Member for Mid-Glamorgan (Mr. S. T. Evans) had yesterday a Notice on the Paper of a Motion to add two Members to the Select Committee upon the Birmingham Water Bill, both of them to be chosen by the House, and he named the hon. Members whom he desired to add. I then objected to the Motion, which accordingly stood over for to-day. The Motion appears on the Paper to-day in a totally different form and raises a different question. The hon. Member now proposes that two Members shall be added to the Committee, but he nominates only one Member to be added by the House, leaving the other to be nominated by the Committee of Selection. This raises a wholly different issue, and is not the Motion which stood over for to-day on objection being taken yesterday.

*MR. SPEAKER: The alteration has not been made in consultation with me; and certainly, as it stands, it is a new proposition, and if opposed must stand over for Monday.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I oppose it.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid.): It appears on the Paper "by Order," Mr. Speaker.

MR. SPEAKER: It does not appear by Order in the altered form, and that it is so printed on the Paper is an error.

MR. S. T. EVANS: By the indulgence of the House I may be allowed to say that I made the alteration to meet the view, as I thought, of the right hon. Gentleman himself, and if I may appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the matter might as well be discussed to-day.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The matter is not one to be settled between the hon. Gentleman and the right hon. Gentleman, but is a matter for the House at large.

QUESTIONS.

LETTER CARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the amount paid by his Department per million for the new letter cards to the contractors who supply them?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The price of the letter-cards is 12s. 4d. per thousand, which amounts to £616 13s. 4d. per million. There is a prospect that lower terms may shortly be arranged.

INLAND POSTCARDS.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will supply the public with an inland postcard of a size uniform with that of the postcard for the Continent and Colonies; and whether he is aware that the inland cards sold on the Continent are generally much larger than the British inland card?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The dimensions of the inland postcard have been the same from the time of its introduction in 1870, and may be considered to afford a reasonable amount of space for a written communication at half the ordinary rate of letter postage. The inland cards in use abroad are of somewhat larger size. The new card for transmission abroad which comes into use in this country to-day is of a size midway between the card which it replaces and the inland card.

THOMAS FLINN, V.C.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he is aware that Thomas Flinn, formerly of the 64th Regiment, is now a pauper inmate of the Athlone Workhouse; that he holds the Victoria Cross for valour, and wears also the medals for Persia and India, having been present at Cawnpore and Lucknow, where he was severely wounded in attacking some guns, one of which he brought off himself; whether he is aware that Flinn was awarded a pension of £10 a year for his valorous conduct, which sum the Guardians of the Athlone Union appropriate towards his maintenance; and whether some small increase could be made, so as to enable him in his old age to end his days more comfortably than in a workhouse?

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY WAR DEPARTMENT (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): This case is well known at the War Office. Flynn did very gallant service and was awarded the Victoria Cross, but I regret to say that he was discharged with a very bad character, he having been entered in the defaulter-book 47 times, and tried by Court Martial 15 times. The poor man is a victim to drink to such an extent that when he had the control of his money he only left the workhouse for the purpose of drinking up his annuity as soon as received. It would consequently be useless to consider his case for an increase.

SALE OF POSTAGE STAMPS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether a licence is required for the sale of postage stamps; and whether shopkeepers in rural districts in Ireland, who accept stamps in payment of goods, can sell such stamps?

SIR J. FERGUSON: Under Section 4, Sub-section 1, of the Stamp Duties Management Act, 1891, no person not licensed by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue, except persons employed in post offices, may sell postage stamps to the public. Shopkeepers who accept stamps in payment for goods can therefore sell the stamps to the Post Office only, on the terms given on page 30 of the Post Office Guide.

REFUSAL TO ISSUE A GUN LICENCE, IRELAND.

MR. MACDERMOTT (Kilkenny, N): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, in the month of September last, Sergeant Morris, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, stationed at Rossmore, County Galway, seized on a gun belonging to Mr. John S. Burke, of Clondagaff, County Galway, notwithstanding that Mr. Burke had obtained a licence for same, merely because the licence had been lost during Mr. Burke's eviction; and whether he was justified in so doing; if he will explain why Mr. Hickson, R.M., subsequently refused to issue a new licence to Mr. Burke; and whether it is proposed to refund the amount which Mr. Burke paid in the month of August for the Excise Licence Duty for the gun for twelve months?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The gun referred to was taken by the police authorities because the holder was unable to produce his licence. The Licensing Magistrate did, in the exercise of his discretion, refuse to issue a new licence. The Inland Revenue will, no doubt, give due consideration to an application for the return of the amount.

MR. MACDERMOTT: On what ground was the licence refused?

MR. JACKSON: I understand it is not necessary to give the ground for a refusal to grant a licence of this kind.

SUB-POSTMASTERS AND COUNTY COUNCILS.

MR. S. T. EVANS (Glamorgan, Mid): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether sub-postmasters who are not occupied solely with Post Office duties are eligible as candidates for the position of guardians, overseers, and members of Local Boards, while they are ineligible as candidates for County Councils; if so, what is the reason for the distinction made in the case of County Councils; and whether the Department can see its way clear to abolish the distinction and the restriction upon such sub-postmasters?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The case is as stated in the question. Until December, 1888, there was no rule prohibiting Post Office servants from taking part in parochial or municipal matters. In December, 1888, when County Councils were first established, the late Postmaster General made these an exception to the general rule. Postmasters (including sub-postmasters and letter receivers) were prohibited from mixing themselves up in matters connected with County Councils. Later on the Treasury issued a Minute prohibiting all Civil servants from being candidates for County Councils. As to the abolition of the restriction, this is obviously a matter now not for the Post Office alone, but for the Government.

MR. S. T. EVANS: May I ask what raises the distinction between County Councils and other Local Boards?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Well, political matters are sometimes mixed up with the proceedings of County Council elections, and it is undesirable that persons in the position of postmasters should take a prominent part in such matters.

THE CONTROL OF THE POLICE.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if there should be any abuse of authority on the part of policemen or Inspectors of police in England in the administration of the law, which Minister of the Crown is responsible to this House for such abuses, and whose duty is it to answer questions in this House relating to the same?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): In reply to the abstract question of the hon. Member, I have little to add to what I said yesterday. With regard to the action of the Metropolitan Police, the Secretary of State is responsible to this House, and is bound to answer questions relating to the manner in which they have exercised their authority. With regard to the provincial police, the case is different. The Secretary of State is the Minister to whom Local Authorities refer for advice and guidance, and who in proper cases would direct legal proceedings to redress violations of the law; but neither he nor any Minister of the Crown is responsible to this House, in the strict sense of those words, for abuses of authority in the administration of the law by the provincial police, who are under the control of the Local Authorities. Those Authorities are responsible for taking the proper disciplinary measures. When questions are put relating to the action of the provincial police, the Secretary of State, as a matter of habitual Parliamentary courtesy, obtains the desired information from the Local Authorities in proper cases, and communicates that information to the House.

FEMALE PRISONERS.

MR. H. CAMPBELL (Fermanagh, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if it is true that during last year 66 women were either released from prison or had their sentences reduced in view of their approaching confinement?

MR. MATTHEWS: During the last financial year for which there are statistics the number of women who were released before the expiration of their sentences on account of advanced pregnancy was, not 66, but twelve. In these cases the probable date of the confinement was such that, if it had been allowed to take place in prison, the women would have had to remain there after the expiration of the sentence.

THE PREROGATIVE OF MERCY IN IRELAND.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in the case of the boy James Handley, aged 15, now under sentence of death at Wicklow as "a party to" a murder, he will act upon the precedent for commutation, on the ground of youth, afforded by the case of Constance Kent, formerly convicted of murder and now at liberty?

MR. MATTHEWS: The exercise of the prerogative of mercy in Ireland rests with the Lord Lieutenant, to whom any memorial on behalf of a condemned person should be addressed.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Perhaps the Chief Secretary will take it into his consideration?

MR. JACKSON: The ordinary and proper course is to memorialise the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman tell me, is the prerogative of mercy presumably exercised by the Lord Lieutenant or the Minister?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member will put down the terms of his question I will give him an answer.

INDIAN OFFICIAL EMOLUMENTS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Secretary of State for India will consent to the granting of the Returns relative to Indian matters in to-day's Notice Paper, standing in the name of the hon. Member for Donegal?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Mr. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): A Return is now being prepared on the Motion of the hon. Member for Elgin (Mr. Keay), showing the grants of pensions of 1,000 rupees and upwards, and this, with the exception of the names, will give the hon. Member the information he asks for in the first Return of which he has given notice. As regards the salaries of persons in the Council or office of the Secretary of State, very full information is given in the Return, East India Council, No. 147 of last year. In view of the labour and expense involved, the Secretary of State does not consider it necessary to compile a special Return.

MR. MAC NEILL: Does it show the names of gentlemen in the India Office who, at the same time, are receiving pensions from the Indian Government?

MR. CURZON: The hon. Member, having the Paper in his hands, can find out exactly what it contains.

IRISH FISHERIES REPORTS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, by 5 and 6 Vic. c. 106, sec. 112, the Inspectors of Fisheries are, before the 31st January in each year, to make a Report on the Fisheries of the preceding year, and a copy is to be laid before Parliament within three weeks after the commencement of sitting; when will this Report be laid upon the Table; and why have the provisions of the Statute not been complied with?

MR. JACKSON: The provisions of the Act are, I believe, as stated in the first question. It has not in recent years been found possible to give the full information desirable and up to date within the time mentioned, and an extension of time has been allowed. The Report will be presented as soon as possible.

CERTIFICATES OF CHARACTER AT WOOLWICH AND SANDHURST.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office what is meant by the expression "good moral character," a certificate of which signed by tutors or heads of colleges must, under the regulations prevailing at Woolwich and Sandhurst, be produced by candidates for further examination for the Army; whether he is aware that Lieutenant Colonel Begbie, R.E., has brought an action against Mr. Lascelles, an Army tutor, for refusing to give his son, who was for a few months a pupil of Mr. Lascelles, a certificate of good moral character, and has claimed damages—

"For trouble and expense in obtaining a dispensation with the production of such certificate from the Military Authorities; and inducing them to admit his son as a candidate without such certificate"; is this the case to which the Secretary of State for War alluded as the only case which had occurred during three years in which the certificate of good moral character was dispensed with; from whom have the fullest inquiries into this candidate's character been obtained; and have the War Office authorities asked Mr. Lascelles for any explanation of his refusal to give the certificate of character?

MR. BRODRICK: This is the case to which I alluded in which an exception had been made to the rule. The fact that the question is sub judice in the Law Courts would render it unfair to both parties that any statement should be made on the subject.

MR. MAC NEILL: Was not the War Office aware that action was to be taken, and was Mr. Lascelles allowed to withhold the character?

MR. BRODRICK: The War Office have the whole case before them. It is not desirable I should now go into it.

MR. MAC NEILL: I do not ask that. But is it a fact that the tutor has never been asked for information?

MR. BRODRICK: The War Office have received such information.

Mr. Jackson

THE TENANTS ON THE LETTERILLY ESTATE.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the tenants on the Letterilly estate of Mr. Orr, near Glenties, County Donegal, are about to be evicted through inability to pay law costs of ejectment decrees, which have been inflated three or four-fold by reason of the agent, who is ignorant of the locality and a non-resident, having inserted, as parties in the ejectment, the names of persons as sub-tenants who had no connection with the holdings; that Charles Gallagher, whose judicial rent is £2 2s., was required to pay £2 6s. 8d. in law costs before the decrees were placed in the hands of the Sheriff, whereas the costs legally leviable in his case were little over £1; and that Gallagher, who is wretchedly poor and without stock, sent on two occasions rent to Londonderry to the agent which was returned because unaccompanied with costs; and whether, having regard to the destitute condition of these tenants, the forces of the Crown will be employed to aid in their eviction?

MR. JACKSON: I am afraid I can only refer the hon. Member to my reply to a similar question put by him on the 10th of last month. I do not know the details of the particular case.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman take it into his consideration? it is a case of awful hardship.

MR. JACKSON: I do not know that it is in my power to take any action.

MR. MAC NEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that a predecessor of his in office refused to grant the forces of the Crown to assist evictions on Lord Clanricarde's estate?

MR. JACKSON: I am not aware.

SICKNESS AT THE MOORGATE STREET TELEGRAPH OFFICE.

MR. M'CARTAN (Down, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he will instruct the medical officer to inquire into the cause of the heavy sickness among the staff at Moorgate Street Buildings Telegraph Office; whether the clerks have petitioned respecting the unsanitary conditions under which the principal meal of the day is obtained and the absence of any time allowed to obtain other meals; and whether he will allow these clerks the 20 minutes allowed for meals other than luncheon, and put them on an equality with their provincial colleagues similarly placed?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The sickness is not heavy—as stated in the reply to the question of the hon. Member for West Aberdeen on the 18th March. There is nothing to add to that reply; for one meal in the day they are allowed 30 minutes. Other refreshments, if required, must be taken at their seats.

LONDON WATER SUPPLY.

SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he will consider the expediency of adding to the Royal Commission on the subject of the water supply of London the names of one or more influential residents of that part of the County of Surrey which is interested, as being supplied by one of the existing Water Companies, and because their present supply is drawn from the River Thames, which is being exhausted of all its water, to the great detriment of that county?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): Before the Royal Commission on the Metropolitan Water Supply was appointed the question of its constitution was very carefully considered. The Commission has not, however, been formed on the principle of obtaining representatives of different districts, but of securing the services of gentlemen who are specially qualified for the important inquiry which the Commission have to undertake. The Government cannot, therefore, accede to the suggestion of my hon. Friend. It will be borne in mind that the Royal Commission, by the terms of their appointment, are in their inquiry to have regard to the needs and claims of the localities not supplied by any Metropolitan Water Company, but within the watershed of the Thames.

GOVERNMENT CONTRACTS—HOME INDUSTRIES.

MR. J. LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, inasmuch as the practice of giving contracts to foreign manufacturers for the supply of pencils, matches, and other articles used by the Public Departments involves a contravention of the Resolution passed by the House of Commons upon 13th February, 1891, the Government will, in view of the serious depression prevailing in so many home industries, make it a condition that all such contracts shall be executed within the British Empire?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): In reply to my right hon. Friend, I have to say that it does not appear to me on the face of it that giving contracts to foreign firms is directly connected with the Resolution to which he refers in his question. That Resolution was directed against what is called "sweating" in English manufactories, and has no reference to what may be done in manufactories abroad. Of course, in regard to the rest of the question, I, like everyone else in the House, desire that Government contracts should be executed by manufacturers and workmen in this country; but I cannot accede to the novel principle, as deduced from that, that we should deliberately buy in the more expensive market at the cost of the general taxpayer when elsewhere, at a cheaper rate, we can get such goods as we require.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if the hours of work abroad are not very much longer than in this country; and I would further ask his attention to the Resolution of the House last Session on the subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: If my recollection serves me right, the Resolution of this House referred to the wages and labour of workmen in this country, and not to wages and labour in foreign countries.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he is aware that the hours worked by foreign workmen are much longer than those of English workmen? The Resolution adopted by the House was—

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, it is the duty of the Government in all Government contracts to make provisions against the evil which has been disclosed before the Sweating Committee, and to insert such provisions as may prevent the evils arising from sub-letting, and to make every effort to secure the payment of such wages as are generally accepted as current in such trades for competent workmen."

I wish to ask whether there was anything in that Resolution which contained an exception in favour of the foreigner?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The evils exposed before the Sweating Committee were domestic and not foreign evils. They examined into the hours and work of British working men and the wages paid to them. Their inquiry had no reference to the hours of work or the wages given to foreign workmen.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I beg to give notice that on an early date I will call attention to this subject.

IMMIGRATION OF DESTITUTE FOREIGNERS.

MR. J. LOWTHER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the information officially conveyed to the Foreign Office by the British Ambassador at St. Petersburg, to the effect that the exodus of destitute persons from Russia is expected in well-informed quarters to assume extended proportions in the near future, it is the intention of Her Majesty's Government to introduce a Bill to prohibit the admission into the United Kingdom of all persons likely to become a public charge or to increase the difficulties of obtaining a livelihood already pressing upon large numbers of the native labouring population in this country?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Her Majesty's Government are not of opinion that anything has occurred as yet which would justify the introduction of such a Bill as that suggested by my right hon. Friend. The expectation of Mr. Arnold White that a large number of Russian Jews would come to this country this summer appears to have been mainly based on the belief that the United States—to which about 70,000 went last year—would be closed to them. We have reason to doubt the correctness of this belief and are making inquiries on the subject. It has also been stated that both the Austrian and German frontiers are, or will be, closed to such emigrants. If this be so, the length of the voyage from any Russian port would make it much more difficult for them to come to the United Kingdom than it has hitherto been. But I can assure my right hon. Friend that we quite appreciate the gravity of the matter and are watching it most carefully, for we feel that such an invasion as has been suggested, and as to which apprehensions were expressed (though entirely without adequate grounds) in last June, would be an intolerable abuse of the system of emigration.

TREATIES WITH BELGIUM AND GERMANY.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if, having regard to the frequent requests made by the Government of Canada to the Colonial Office during the past eleven years to be freed from the Inter-British Trade Disabling Clauses of the Treaties with Belgium and Germany, and particularly to the Address to the Crown of September last from the Dominion Senate and House of Commons, and the joint representations on the subject twelve months ago by the Agents General of the Self-Governed Colonies, and to the approving resolutions adopted by numerous public meetings in England and Canada and transmitted to Her Majesty's Government, including one from the delegates to the Birmingham Convention of the National Union of Conservative Associations, any progress has been made towards the redemption of the announcement on 19th June, 1891, by the Prime Minister to the United Empire Trade League—

"We shall be glad indeed to take every opportunity that arises for delivering ourselves from these unfortunate engagements."

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Prime Minister entirely adheres to what he stated on the 19th of June last year, and has no desire to withdraw from it in the least degree. I can only say at present no opportunity has occurred for delivering ourselves from these unfortunate engagements.

REDEMPTION OF TITHE RENT-CHARGE.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Government intend to take any steps, and, if so, what steps, to carry out the recommendations contained in the Report of the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the redemption of the tithe rent-charge?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know that I can give any definite answer to this question. The matter is under the consideration of my right hon. Friends the President of the Board of Trade and the President of the Board of Agriculture.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Is there any likelihood of its being done this Session?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: That is a question of which I must have notice.

INDIAN COUNCILS BILL.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether a few days' notice will be given before the Indian Councils Bill is taken in Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I shall be glad to give as much notice as I can in reference to this Bill. As the hon. Gentleman is aware, it is not a Bill on which there is much difference of opinion. It is a Bill which it is very important we should pass as soon as possible into law; and I should, therefore, desire to take every chance of getting it through the preliminary stage.

MR. SCHWANN: Will the right hon. Gentleman take it after twelve o'clock to-night?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We have no power to take it after twelve o'clock.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS AT BARNMEEN.

MR. M'CARTAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General, with reference to the necessity for establishing a post office at Barnmeen, near Rathfriland, whether he is aware that the district is thickly populated, and the inhabitants have no postal accommodation; and whether, considering the inconvenience involved to such a large number of people, he will make further inquiry into the matter, in order to provide this district with postal accommodation similar to that at present enjoyed by other districts about Rathfriland?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is feared that further inquiry would be of little, if any, use, as the postal accommodation desired at Barnmeen, near Rathfriland, would entail additional expense, which could not be sanctioned because the service in the neighbourhood of Rathfriland generally is already carried on at a loss to the Revenue. The loss is a heavy one.

THE VALUATION OF BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that no general valuation of the City of Belfast has been made since 1864, notwithstanding that the valuation of the city has since then increased from £273,537 to £713,616; and whether, considering the alteration in the real value of buildings not recently erected, owing to the rapid growth and development of the city, and in view of the complaints made as to the present valuation being an uneven basis of taxation of property in Belfast, he will take steps to have a general re-valuation made without delay?

MR. JACKSON: The valuation of Belfast appears to have been first made in the year 1862. A re-valuation now would undoubtedly be advantageous, but could not be made under the existing law, there being no provision for the cost that would be incurred. I fear it would not be practicable for the Government to consider such legislation, as a Government measure, at the present time.

MR. SEXTON: Considering the advance which has been made in the valuation of Belfast is almost unparalleled, would the Government agree to consider a Bill for the re-valuation of that city if such Bill were introduced by a private Member?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member is aware that several attempts have been made to introduce Bills dealing with the question. At least four attempts were made in more or less recent years, I think one by my immediate predecessor. The question is a very important one, and it presses also as regards Limerick, Cork, and Dublin—I mean it presses in the sense that application has been made in regard to these cities. I think probably that before any practical steps can be taken it might be desirable to have some inquiries as to what form the Bill should take. Of course the cost would be considerable, and I presume that, following precedents, some arrangement will have to be made for a re-payment of the costs by the localities. I admit the importance of the subject; and if I have any opportunity of getting the matter into practical shape I shall be glad to take advantage of it.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman cause some general inquiry to be made during the Recess?

MR. JACKSON: Well, Sir, I will do the best I can.

LABOURERS COTTAGES IN MALLOW.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many cottages have been built under the Labourers (Ireland) Acts in the Mallow Union; whether he is aware that numbers of labourers in this Union are now living in houses long since condemned as unfit for human habitation; how many schemes under the Acts have been adopted in this Union; and whether any of these schemes have been dropped; and, if so, for what reason?

MR. JACKSON: The total number of cottages authorised up to the present to be provided in the Union is 111. Of this number 105 have been built. The Guardians have before them schemes for the erection of additional cottages.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman try to make these Guardians, being more or less of the Conservative Party under the domination of the ex-officio Guardians, take some steps to provide that these labourers shall not have to live in cottages which are unfit for human habitation?

MR. JACKSON: The Guardians appear to have taken these steps already.

THE SEED RATE IN IRELAND.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in view of the recent severe winter in Ireland, and the dearth of employment, an extension of time will be granted by the Local Government Board to labourers to enable them to pay the seed rate?

MR. JACKSON: There is no reason to suppose that the circumstances of the agricultural labourers are such as to warrant the course suggested in the question.

DR. TANNER: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen from the Press of the last few weeks that these unfortunate labourers are being sued at the present time for seed rates, they being not in a position to pay?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member's experience is probably similar to mine. I see very many things in the Press for which there is no foundation.

DR. TANNER: I shall raise this question on the right hon. Gentleman's wages.

POST OFFICE LIABILITY.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General under what rule of the Post Office the Department refused to pay compensation to the Hamilton Association for Providing Trained Male Nurses for a loss incurred through the admitted negligence of the Department in failing to transmit a telegram on 14th November, 1891; whether compensation has been paid in some similar cases, and whether he would take steps to assimilate the rule on the subject to that in force with regard to parcels for which damages were paid?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The Regulations which were laid before Parliament declare the non-liability of the Department, and are quoted on every telegraph form. I cannot find that compensation has ever been paid in any similar case. The circumstances of parcels are so different that the same rule could not be applied.

COUNTY CESS IN IRELAND.

MR. STACK (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether his attention has been called to a resolution unanimously adopted at a meeting of the North Kerry Ratepayers' Association, held in Listowel, on 2nd March last, in which attention is directed to the system of appointing baronial constables for collection of county cess in Ireland, wherein it is stated that, at the last appointment of baronial constables by the Grand Jury of the County Kerry, a solvent and respectable gentleman offered to give sufficient security and to collect the cess for half the poundage given to the gentleman afterwards appointed by the Grand Jury; and whether it is in accordance with the law for the Grand Jury in such a case to appoint a constable; and, if so, will he introduce a Bill to amend the law relating to the appointment of baronial constables in Ireland?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): The matter referred to in this question is one which rests with the Grand Jury, who have the power to appoint baronial constables. The Government have no intention of introducing any legislation on the subject beyond that which is contained in the Local Government Bill.

PRISON WARDERS IN IRELAND.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland the number of Roman Catholics and Protestants respectively that have been appointed warders of prisons in Ireland within the past three years; what are the number of dismissals of warders of Irish gaols within the said period, particularising whether Roman Catholics or Protestants; the number of promotions of warders above the rank of ordinary men within the said term, particularising as in last paragraph; and the number of prisoners in Irish gaols within the past three years, stating number of Catholics and Protestants?

MR. JACKSON: The records of the office do not afford the information asked for in the question.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is it not usual for the Governor to tell off the men to attend Catholic and Protestant services in the prisons, and could not he by that means know the religion of the warders?

MR. JACKSON: No, Sir; I am not aware of that.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Then I am.

COUNTY COUNCIL ELECTIONS.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware of the circumstances under which the recent election of a Councillor to represent the South Liberty Ward of the Gosport Electoral Division of the Hampshire County Council ended in failure, through the unfortunate death of the only candidate previous to the day of election; and whether any means are provided by "The Local Government Act, 1888," or other Statutes incorporated therewith, by which the difficulty can be met, and a new election ordered to take place?

MR. RITCHIE: My attention has already been directed by my hon. Friend the Member for the Eastern Division of Sussex to the circumstances connected with the election of a Councillor for the South Liberty Ward of the Gosport Electoral Division. As there appears to have been a failure, in consequence of the death of the candidate, to elect on the day appointed for the election, the case seems to me to come under the provisions of Section 70 of the Municipal Corporations Act, 1882, which is made applicable to elections of County Councillors by the Local Government Act. Under that section the High Court may, on motion, grant a mandamus directing an election for the electoral division referred to on a day named by the Court.

FROZEN MEAT FROM QUEENSLAND.

MR. JEFFREYS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been drawn to the report in the Times of 30th March, that at the opening of the Queensland Parliament the Governor announced that the Government intended to introduce a Bill to give bonuses on the export of frozen meat; and whether such proposed legislation will receive the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): In answer to my hon. Friend, I have to say that I have seen the report referred to, but have no further information as to whether the Bill has been introduced or the terms of it. It appears, however, to be a matter within the competence of the Colonial Legislature.

YELLOW FEVER ON A TRANSPORT.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether he can give the House any information respecting a reported outbreak of yellow fever on board the transport Atlas, conveying troops from St. Lucia to Halifax; and whether he can inform the House what has been the percentage of sickness amongst the troops at St. Lucia since a portion of the garrison of Barbados has been transferred to the island?

MR. BRODRICK: Two cases of yellow fever occurred during the voyage.

of the Atlas to Halifax; and since arrival one case has been sent to the hospital. The percentage of sick to strength among the white troops at St. Lucia has been fairly constant since the increase of the garrison, and it has averaged 9·9 per cent.

LABOURERS DWELLINGS IN THE MOUNTMELICK UNION.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether representations, duly made under the Labourers' Acts, have been before the Mountmellick Guardians since May in last year, and not yet acted upon; whether the Guardians have made any report in regard to them to the Local Government Board, under Clause 10 of the Act of 1883; whether many labourers within the Union are now living in dwellings declared by the sanitary officer unfit for human habitation; and whether the Local Government Board will put in force the powers conferred upon them by Section 4 of the Act of 1891?

MR. JACKSON: Representations appear to have been submitted in 1890, and also about the date mentioned in the question, having in view the erection of labourers cottages in addition to the number already authorised in Mountmellick Union. The Board of Guardians have not yet made any scheme in pursuance of the representations, but the previous schemes are still in progress. Of the 61 cottages authorised, 24 are finished, and of the remainder ten are now in process of erection. No complaints on the subject have been made to the Local Government Board with a view to their taking action in the direction indicated in the concluding paragraph of the question.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Might I ask whether some of the cottages still unfinished were decided upon as far back as the year 1885, seven years ago, and whether the Local Government Board will listen to any representations which may be made to them under the 4th section of the Act of 1891?

MR. JACKSON: My recollection is that that section gives power to the Local Government Board to make inquiries on such representations, and I have no doubt it will act in accordance with the section.

Mr. Brodrick

THE OFFICE OF SUPERVISOR OF INLAND REVENUE.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it has been brought to his notice that much dissatisfaction prevails in the Excise Service in respect of the mode of conducting the examination for the position of Supervisor of Inland Revenue; whether the name and station of the candidate are written upon each paper sent in instead of numbers, so that the examiners are made aware of the author of each paper; whether it would be possible to arrange for the examination of the written answers by the Civil Service Commissioners, while the technical or Service portion of the examination is dealt with by the Somerset House authorities; and whether, in view of certain alleged irregularities at the last October examination, the candidates not then successful may be allowed to compete on the next occasion?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am not aware of the alleged existence of dissatisfaction in the Excise Service or of the occurrence of any irregularities at the last October examination for the position of Supervisor of Inland Revenue. It is the fact that the name and station of the candidate are written on his paper. The practice has been pursued for the last 40 years, and has never been objected to. The whole of the examination is technical, with the exception of book-keeping, the examination in which is conducted by a member of the Accountant General's Department, who is, practically, as much a stranger to the candidates as the Civil Service Commissioners themselves.

THE POSTMASTER OF ENNISKILLEN.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if a postmaster has yet been appointed to Enniskillen; if so, has he taken charge; and, if not, when will he do so?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Mr. W. Cornwall, telegraph clerk in Dublin, was appointed postmaster of Enniskillen last month. He has gone to Enniskillen and taken up duty there to-day. The cause of delay is not known in London.

IRISH COUNTY COURT ACTS.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland when he will introduce his promised measure to amend the Irish County Court Acts?

MR. MADDEN: The matter requires very serious consideration. The Bill is nearly ready, and I hope to be able to ask leave to introduce it in a few days.

POSTAL FACILITIES AT MULLAGHDUN CROSS.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if a Requisition has been received by the Secretary to the General Post Office, Dublin, signed by the principal inhabitants of the district, asking for a post office at Mullaghdun Cross, midway between Belcoo and Letter Breen, in the County Fermanagh, and will he grant their request?

SIR J. FERGUSON: Such a Requisition has been received; and, as the result of the inquiry which has been made in the matter, authority has been given for extending the official delivery of letters from Letter Breen Post Office as far as Mullaghdun National Schools. The correspondence affected is too small in amount to warrant the opening of a post office at Mullaghdun Cross.

PROTECTION OF THE RIVER SHANNON.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if, through the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, he has received a resolution unanimously passed by the Grand Jury of the County of Clare, at the Spring Assizes, 1892, in relation to the unprotected and defenceless state of the towns situated on the River Shannon and the counties through which it runs; whether, in consequence of the action of the Military Authorities, who some time since dismantled the forts on Scatterry Island, in the estuary of the Shannon, the Limerick and Clare Artillery Militia regiments are, at considerable expense, drafted to Cork; and will he take into consideration the suggestion of the Grand Jury to erect on each side of the Shannon west of Kilrush strong forts with suitable guns and supply of men?

MR. BRODRICK: In view of the very heavy expenditure on places more open to attack, it is not contemplated to incur expenditure on the forts at the mouth of the Shannon. The Limerick and Clare Artillery, prior to 1885, used to practice at Tarbert. They now train in Cork Harbour, where heavy guns of modern type are available.

CLAREMORRIS AND COLLOONEY RAILWAY.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what was the result of his conference with the Directors of the Waterford and Limerick Railway Company and of their Board meeting on the 10th instant on the question of the proposed agreement between the Government and them for the completing and working of the Claremorris and Collooney line; whether he has received any definite reply to his proposals; and to what length of time will he extend these negotiations before he adopts some other alternative by which the new line will as speedily as possible be made available for the public in that district?

MR. JACKSON: I am not in a position to make a definite statement on this question, but I hope in a day or two to be able to do so.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It would perhaps meet the convenience of the House if I were to say that in consequence of not having been able to finish the Debate on the Scotch Education Bill on Thursday, I think it would probably be convenient to us and to the House to finish that Debate, of which, I think, little remains, the first thing on Monday. The House is aware that the subject was nearly exhausted last night, and I trust hon. Gentlemen who have still remarks to make will abbreviate them as much as possible and enable us to get to the Small Holdings Bill Committee, which the House is desirous of dealing with as speedily as possible. I shall, therefore, put down the adjourned Debate on the Second Reading of the Scotch Bill as the first Order after the Resolution I have to move on Monday.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I am afraid the announcement which the right hon. Gentleman has just made will come as a very disagreeable surprise to hon. Members. The right hon. Gentleman must be aware that a great number of Members have made arrangements to attend on Monday with the express view of proceeding at once with the Small Holdings Bill. He has told us that there is an understanding that the discussion on the Scotch Equivalent Grant Bill will take a very short time. He did not tell us what he means by a very short time, but from what I am told as to the number of Gentlemen who rose when the Adjournment was moved he can scarcely look forward to the time being so short as not to take all the first freshness out of the Debate on the Small Holdings Bill. The right hon. Gentleman has given, not one, but repeated pledges that this Bill should be taken first on Monday, and I hope he will still see fit, in view of these pledges and the great inconvenience which would undoubtedly be caused to many hon. Members, to adhere to that arrangement.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that in reply to the last question on the subject, he said, "I have already answered that question four times," and that the taking of the Small Holdings Bill in Committee was as certain as anything in this House can be? May I also ask whether he is aware that many Members on both sides, at some inconvenience, have made arrangements to be here on Monday in order to attend the Committee in accordance with the distinct pledge of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken in his recollection of the facts. The statement I made regarding the certainty of the first Order had reference, not to next Monday, but to yesterday, in answer to the question of the hon. Member for Edinburgh who asked whether the Scotch Education Bill was certain to be the first Order on Thursday. I stated that it was as certain as anything in this House can be. The right hon. Gentleman has not, I think, used the strictly proper words when he says I gave a pledge last Monday. What happens is, that the Minister-in-charge is asked from time to time if he can forecast the course of business, and to meet the convenience of Members he does give a sketch of the course of business, and for that purpose he has to estimate the length of time that the various Bills will take. I confess that after the prolonged discussion we had on the Scotch Grant on the First Reading, it never occurred to me for a moment that we should not be able to get the Second Reading in the course of a whole evening's Debate. Had I had the least suspicion that that result would have occurred I should have requested the House to suspend the Twelve o'clock Rule on Thursday, and we should have sat till we finished it.

MR. H. GARDNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman go on with the Small Holdings Bill de die in diem, including Monday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I cannot give any pledge, and have not ventured even to give a forecast for next week.

MR. MORTON: Does the right hon. Gentleman intend to go on with the Ordnance Vote before Easter.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am afraid I cannot give any pledge on that point.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman if his attention has been called to the fact that a Minister of the Crown, the Comptroller of the Household, presided at a meeting of Members of Parliament yesterday, at which a resolution was carried to intimidate the electors of the United Kingdom, and in a certain event, to excite a certain portion of the people of Ireland to civil war?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have no knowledge of the facts referred to in the hon. Member's question.

MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby): Will the right hon. Gentleman consider, during the evening, if it would not be possible to take the Small Holdings Bill as the first Order on Monday, and the Scotch Grant Bill on Tuesday morning?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: My hope is that the Scotch Bill will be over by half past six, and that we shall be able to go on with the Small Holdings Bill on Monday night, Tuesday morning, Thursday, and Friday. That would be more convenient than interrupting the Small Holdings Bill by a Scotch Debate on Tuesday morning.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): Do I understand that the right hon. Gentleman is going to move that the Small Holdings Bill be taken on Tuesday and Friday evenings?

Mr. J. Morley

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I only propose that the Government should be allowed to take Tuesday and Friday mornings and the Bill.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in view of the Resolution to which his attention has been called, he will fulfil his promise as to visiting Ulster, and will he support the terms of that Resolution?

MR. SEXTON: I give notice that I shall move that, as the Member who occupied the chair at that meeting was a Minister of the Crown, a copy of the Resolution be laid on the Table.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1892-3.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

CLASS I.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £29,850, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1893, for Expenditure in respect of Royal Palaces and Marlborough House."

(3.0.) MR. MORTON (Peterborough): Before moving the reduction of which I have given notice I wish to ask a question with regard to the Auditor General's Report. He says in reference to a previous year that, in regard to new works, expenditure has been greater in cases than the amount provided, whilst in one case no provision at all was made. I wish to ask whether when we vote money for one purpose a Department of the Government can use it for other purposes without the consent of the House of Commons? I find that in the Estimates the Departments ask for a great deal more money than they want, and then having a surplus they apply it to purposes that are not brought before the House at all. I wish to ask the Leader of the House or the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether they are legally right in so doing?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not know to what purposes the hon. Member refers. I should like to have a concrete example before I answer an abstract question.

MR. MORTON: I refer to the case mentioned in the Auditor General's Report; I do not think he gives the exact item, but says that in one case no provision was made. I am asking about the principle, which I see carried out through all Government affairs—namely, that they get money voted for one purpose and use it for another. I wish to ask if the money is voted to build a house in one street it can be used to build a house in another?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): No. The money must be spent on the items stated in the Estimate.

MR. MORTON: Then I understand it is illegal for a Department or the Government to spend money voted for one object on another not mentioned in the Vote. I am very sorry that I was not able to refer to the question before the Speaker left the Chair, owing to the sharp way in which the right hon. Gentleman used the Forms of the House. I wish to call attention to item one, £81 for salaries and allowances, and £270, fuel, fire, water, and household articles. There is, of course, the large sum of £3,000 for maintenance, repairs and new works also. I do not object to the agreement that these palaces should be kept for the use of Her Majesty, or desire to interfere with it, but it appears that the allowance of £385,000 should cover the cost of servants, fuel, light, water, and household articles. As to the servants, I see there is a turncock at £1 5s. a week, with an addition of £8 for acting as ratcatcher. There are no particulars as to the fuel, &c. It may be our duty, as the buildings are public property, to keep them in repair, and I do not raise the question now. I see there is one item for Windsor Castle, £202 for servants and allowances, for Windsor Home Park, Windsor Royal Kitchen Gardens, Frogmore House and Grounds, and White Lodge, Richmond Park. Will the right hon. Gentleman inform the House who inhabits Frogmore House and White Lodge? And also give the information on the other items I have mentioned. I move the reduction of the Vote by £350.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £29,500, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Morton.)

*MR. PLUNKET: The two questions raised by the hon. Member are as regards £81 for Buckingham Palace principally, and £270 for fuel, light, water, and household articles. As regards the salaries and allowances, the hon. Member will find them set out on the following page (page 6) of the Estimates; the whole sum is there accounted for. The £81 represents the salary of a turncock, who is also employed to discharge the important office of ratcatcher. That sum is necessary to enable us to take care of the palaces we are bound to take care of, as it is necessary to have a supply of water in case of fire breaking out. The rule on the subject of fuel, light, and water, and household articles is that they are only supplied to the servants who are employed by the Office of Works in the different palaces and houses they have to look after. They are not supplied for the use of the inmates at all. Water is supplied to all the palaces. As to the palaces that are not in the occupation of Her Majesty, we pay for fuel and household articles for the State Housekeeper and Under Housekeeper, who take charge of those portions of the palaces which are open to the public, and we pay these sums in the same way that we subscribe to and keep up the Offices of the great Departments of the State. I can assure the hon. Gentleman that this part of the expenses is for servants or other persons who are employed in the way I have described.

MR. MORTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman kindly give me the information I asked for on the subject of Frogmore House and White Lodge, Richmond?

MR. PLUNKET: I cannot at present tell him who occupies Frogmore House, but the hon. Member, and, indeed, all hon. Members, must know that the Duchess of Teck and her family occupy the White Lodge.

(3.12.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I should be indisposed to question the keeping up of this ratcatcher, but if he has any spare time he might be brought down here, and on this side of the House he would find good sport. But what really underlies this Vote is the excessive sum which is expended on the palaces which are not wholly, or even partially, in the occupation of Her Majesty. In this Vote I find that £15,000 is for palaces in the occupation of Her Majesty, £2,800 for palaces in partial occupation, and £16,900 for palaces which are not in occupation. A portion of that, no doubt, is legitimately expended, for there are items for Hampton Court Palace, for Holyrood

Mr. Plunket

House, and for the Military Knights of Windsor, but deducting those items there is still £10,000 per annum spent in the maintenance of palaces which are not even partially occupied by Her Majesty. And this is not an exceptional year; it is the same every year. I will take one item. Kew Palace is a place that I have for years sought to discover. I have frequently been down there and have wandered about trying to find where this Palace is that costs so much. I suppose there is some small house there that belongs to Her Majesty, but to call the thing a Palace is absolutely absurd; it does not exist. Last year £1,177 was spent upon Kew Palace, and this is only one instance of the way in which public money is spent. Then there is Kensington Palace, on which we are to spend £2,300, and the amount last year was £2,500, for maintenance and repairs. Would it not be more reasonable to entirely sweep away Kensington Palace? For I do not believe it is of the slightest advantage to anyone, and certainly not to Her Majesty, that palaces like this should continue to exist. If we did away with these palaces, which really are not wanted, we should only do what any private owner would do; but, instead of that, we keep on paying £8,000 or £9,000 per annum, at a minimum, for their maintenance and repair. I think some arrangement should be entered upon by the Government, with a view of preventing the expenditure of these large sums in this way. There should be some inquiry as to whether these palaces are really required, and whether, admitting that they are required, it is desirable to spend each year on their maintenance such large sums.

(3.16.) MR. MORTON: I should like to recommend, with regard to Buckingham Palace, that, as it does not seem to be used by Her Majesty or anyone else, terms should be arranged so that we can make some use of that building and the grounds. As we have felt the difficulty of finding a site for a British Gallery of Art, it would not be a bad idea to give up either Buckingham Palace or Kensington Palace for that purpose. I ask leave to withdraw my Motion for the reduction of the Vote, and I do not wish to move a reduction with regard to Buckingham Palace, because it might seem in some way to reflect on Her Majesty, which I do not wish to do. I desire to speak of Her Majesty with the utmost possible respect, as I believe she is an example, not only to other Sovereigns, but to the people of this country. I ask leave to withdraw the Motion for reduction.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

(3.19.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I should like to ask a question on this Appropriation in Aid. In England and Ireland Royal Palaces are open free, but in Scotland a fee of 1s. is charged for admission into Holyrood Palace. I thought that in consequence of the discussion we had last year this payment was to cease, but it is still in force, and I should like to ask what is going to be done in the matter, seeing that there is a reduction in the Vote this year?

(3.20.) MR. MORTON: I desire to move a reduction of this Vote by £1,000 on the item of palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty. Following up the remarks of the Member for Northampton, I would ask the First Commissioner if he can see his way to allow a Committee to be appointed to consider the subjects that have been raised? I should like to ask a question specially with regard to Hampton Court Palace, where there is a very fine vine, on which there are every year hundreds of bunches of grapes. I wonder what becomes of those grapes, which I am sure are not sour, though I never get any of them myself. These grapes belong to us, and I think some proper use should be made of them, and I should like to learn that the right hon. Gentleman had made a present of some of those grapes to some hospital or institution either in or out of London. These grapes belong to the nation, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will allow a Committee to be appointed which, along with other matters, will inquire into this. The Member for Northampton has made some reference to this question of the palaces not in the occupation of Her Majesty, and I do not wish to detain the House, but will move the reduction of the Vote by £1,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an amount, not exceeding £28,850, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Morton.)

(3.22.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Every year we have received assurances from the right hon. Gentleman whose pleasant manners have endeared him to the Committee, but those assurances always end in smoke. Every year we are called upon to pay large sums for this system of external patching—every year it ends in a promise and we vote the money. Kensington Palace is a big place with which nothing is done, and yet we spend large sums of money upon it. Hampton Court Palace is a place that I think is worth paying to keep up. There are two of these places in which everyone takes an interest—Hampton Court Palace, where there is a very valuable collection of paintings, and Kew Gardens, which has been made very useful in connection with the colonies for the propagation of plants.

THE CHAIRMAN (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): Kew Gardens are not included in this Vote, which refers to the Royal Palaces.

DR. TANNER: Speaking then with respect to the palaces, I suppose it is quite right that we should do something to Marlborough House, but it seems to me that £300 for repairs to the roadway outside is a large sum. But what I object to is that these matters come forward year by year, and I think we are indebted to the Member for Northampton and the Member for Peterborough for bringing forward the facts. I think if there was a little money taken at the doors of these institutions on certain days in the week, as for instance, at the National Gallery and those places, and if people were admitted occasionally to Buckingham Palace by the payment of a small sum and permitted to see all that there is to be seen in this institution, as in the various other institutions, there would be no necessity for asking the House of Commons to vote anything for their maintenance, and an innocent source of recreation would be provided for the people, and if I had my way I would have them open on Sundays as well as other days. The money asked for would be very small; and these palaces are really not required, because they are only taken up occasionally by a German Prince, or something of that sort when they take up their abode there. That is a mistake. The people ought not to be called upon to pay these excessive charges; and, therefore, I have very great pleasure in supporting my hon. Friend, and I sincerely hope that the hon. Gentleman will go to a Division on this subject. There is no use in raising these questions unless we take a Division, and we should take Divisions more frequently than we do, and I hope that during this Sitting we will emphasise and endorse our opinions by going to a poll, and trying to force the Members of Her Majesty's Government also to go to a poll, and take the opinions of their constituencies.

(5.32.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I recognise the value of these discussions so little that I seldom venture to interpose in these Debates, because these are matters which might, I think, be left to Her Majesty's Ministers. But every now and then we come across a Vote which raises a principle, and I think my hon. Friend behind me has raised a principle, which I think may be a very serious one, by proposing his Amendment. I think it raises the question of whether it is right for the House of Commons, which is the trustee of the public, to use the public money for other than the Public Service. Now, the expenditure for these palaces, which are not occupied by Her Majesty, is clearly a private expenditure. It makes no difference whether those persons, to whom these palaces are let are Royal or not; they are private persons and we have no business to spend the money in this manner. Every now and again this House is called upon for the expenditure of public money, and one Minister after another rises and says he is obliged to admit that there is some substantial reason why this might be done, but the unfortunate exigencies of the Public Service and the savings of the Treasury will not permit them to expend the money. I will give an illustration. There is a class of public servants at the present moment whom I have in my mind, and who are, I think, unfairly treated at present, whose just demands are not being met; and when we ask for an improvement of their salaries the answer is that there are no funds which the Minister can use for the purpose. Why, the money that is deliberately wasted by the House of Commons over these private matters would enable the Minister in charge of that Department to make this legitimate and rightful provision for these public servants. That is only one instance. Every Member of this House knows that every now and again we are called upon to consider cases where we should be very glad to give effect to the wishes of the person who appeals to the House, but we are always met with the same contention. Really, out of justice to the public, we ought not to vote for or support this additional charge. I am not going into details. I do not want to convince the judgment of the right hon. Gentleman; but I want to appeal to him as the custodian of public money, and I submit to him he has no right as a public servant to come here and ask the House of Commons to vote this sum of money which he asks for now, as an eleemosynary grant to private persons very well able to pay the money themselves. On these grounds I sustain my hon. Friend; and when the Minister rises, if he does rise, to say something in defence of this Vote, whatever he says he will not have answered fairly the criticism I have made, unless he shows that he is justified in taking the public money for the purpose of maintaining palaces which are let to private persons without rent. I submit to the Committee that the public duty of the Minister is to say to his fellow Minister, "I do not care whether it is a Princess or whatever other private person it may be to whom the palace is let," and to tell this private person that he has no right to take the public money for any such purpose; and if I happened to be in his place—as I do not suppose I ever shall be—I would venture to insinuate to the person concerned that it is uncommonly shabby for a person of large position and large means to come here at the expense of the ratepayers of the country—most of whom are poor—and take from them not only the rent of these palaces, but positively to sponge upon the public for the purpose of having their palaces maintained at the public expense. I have used strong words, but I do not need to apologise for them, because this sort of thing takes place year by year.

(3.40.) DR. CLARK: I do not know who lives in Frogmore House at present, but the Duchess of Kent used to live there, and the White House is occupied by the Duchess of Teck. In Hampton Court there are a number of villas occupied by the widows of admirals and generals who served their country well. Pembroke Lodge, I think, is occupied by Lady John Russell, and I think that General Maude has Bushey House, he has it as a perquisite for the work he does. I think some of these buildings are occupied by a class of people who ought to be there, for they have some claim on the nation for services; but where you have got these people who have a legitimate claim for particular reasons of that kind you have got a number of people who are there who have no claim whatever, and I think we ought to differentiate between these two classes of occupiers. I only want some information as to the class of people who are living in these palaces and villas in reference to which this Vote is asked for.

*(3.41.) THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): I should like to answer first some of the questions of detail which have been asked in reference to this Vote before speaking on the general principle involved. In the first place as regards the vineries, to which the hon. Member for Peterborough has alluded, the expenses for those grapes are not paid by the Votes of the House at all, but they are paid by Her Majesty, and the grapes belong to Her Majesty. Next, the hon. Member for Caithness asked for a reduction of the fees charged to visitors to Holyrood Palace. I am glad to be able to tell him that since this matter was last discussed in this House I have been able to make arrangements whereby instead of one free day in the week there will be in future three free days for visitors to Holyrood Palace; so that in that way the amount of the fees will be considerably reduced, as on three days in the week visitors may go there without any charge. The hon. Member for Mid Cork asked me what was the additional expense for improvements outside St. James's Palace. It was not incurred with the view of improving the access to Marlborough House specially, but to close a rather dangerous piece of ground which lies on one side of Marlborough House between the two wood pavements, where a great many accidents have occurred. It is with the view of closing that space and making the whole place safe that this work is to be done; and I can assure the hon. Member that this work is very well worth the money, as many accidents have undoubtedly occurred there owing to the present state of the roadway. I think these answers cover most of the questions that have been asked me as to the details; but the main ground upon which it is proposed at present to move a reduction is that some of these palaces are not now in the occupation of Her Majesty, and ought not to be maintained at the expense of the State. The hon. Member for Northampton said that Kensington Palace ought to be swept away, and that Kensington Gardens would be very much better if it was not there, and why should we pay the amount required to maintain it. There are two views taken as to whether it would be an improvement to sweep away Kensington Palace. I think myself it would not be. The Palace, in my opinion, forms, from some points of view, a beautiful addition to the landscape; but I may say at once, as regards Kensington Palace, that we have no power whatever to sweep it away. Some 20 years ago the Minister who had charge of the same Department that I have now charge of considered that some of the smaller residences belonging to the Crown might be done away with, and he took the opinion of the Law Officers on the subject, and they advised that he had no power whatever to destroy any of these palaces, great or small, whether they were in the occupation of Her Majesty or not. I have often mentioned to the Committee before the simple grounds upon which these palaces are maintained, and I do not think the hon. Member has added anything fresh on this occasion, because this whole question is a question of principle. As the Committee may remember, the only expense which has been incurred by the State in this matter has been the expense of maintaining the fabric of these houses and keeping them in proper repair. The expenses of the inhabitants who live in these houses are in no way thrown upon the Estimates. The ground upon which the cost of the maintenance of these buildings is borne by the State, as I have often had the honour of explaining to the House before now, is this, that it is an obligation which proceeds at once from the principle upon which the Civil List was framed at the commencement of the present reign. Up to the year 1831 all these expenses of maintaining these palaces were borne out of the Civil List.

But at that time it was decided to make a new arrangement, and that arrangement was made on the advice of a very strong Committee which sat for the purpose of considering this question. They reported that these expenses, which were before thrown upon the Civil List, should in future be thrown upon the House of Commons, and that that arrangement should take place side by side with another process by which a very large reduction should be made in the Civil List, which was provided by the Sovereign. The hon. Member for Sunderland said it was very shabby for us to pay these expenses.

MR. STOREY: Not shabby for us, improper for us; but shabby on the part of those who took them.

*MR. PLUNKET: Well, shabby for those who took. That is a kind of strong language which it is easy for anyone to apply to a matter of that kind; but I do not wish to enter into any heated controversy with the hon. Gentleman. It was decided, as I have stated, in 1831, that all expenses of the maintenance of these palaces should be thrown upon the Estimates. That arrangement was maintained during the reign of the late Sovereign. The arrangement was again considered by a very strong Committee in 1837, and they reported that it was an excellent system in the interests of economy and of the nation, and recommended that it should be renewed; and it was renewed, and at the accession of the present Sovereign there was a further considerable reduction of the Civil List, and at the same time the nation undertook the obligation of defraying by a Vote of this House the expenditure, which included the maintenance of all these palaces and all the other buildings connected with them. In this way the expenses of these palaces and other houses which had been from time to time either built or purchased by successive Sovereigns, and which had for long been paid out of the Civil List, were thrown upon the Estimates. It would, of course, be open to the nation at a future time to re-consider and alter the arrangement; but I say that it is an arrangement which was solemnly made between the nation and the Sovereign at the commencement of the reign; and I submit to the Committee that that arrangement which we undertook we are bound in honour to carry out. There is, of course, the other view as to whether the duties of the Department which I represent here are performed in an economical manner. That is a matter for Parliamentary discussion and investigation; and I am prepared to meet any criticism of that kind. I can assure the Committee that if increases in the expenditure have been added to these Estimates it has been for the most part owing to the increase in the pay of the police who are required to look after our palaces and parks enjoyed by the people, and owing to the improved wages of labourers, tradesmen, and others who are employed by the Office of Works. I shall be very glad to answer any further questions that may be put to me.

(3.54.) MR. STOREY: I would like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this is a question that has nothing to do with Her Majesty's position. If this Vote was necessary to secure Her Majesty's comfort and convenience it would be agreed to without opposition, but it is not, and the right hon. Gentleman has not answered the point we have raised. We say that the least the person should do who occupies such a residence for nothing is to keep it in decent repair. Nor does the right hon. Gentleman deny the substantial justice of that claim. He knows much better than I that in the old days there were many more charges inserted in this Vote than there now are, and that by the efforts of Radical Members of Parliament from time to time one charge after another has been struck out. It is, therefore, a much more moderate Vote than the right hon. Gentleman's predecessors asked for 20 or 30 years ago. All that we now ask is that in 1892 the last of these charges should be removed. The only argument in support of the Vote is that there is an old agreement under which the money is paid, and that the object of it is to administer to the comfort and convenience of Her Majesty. But that again does not affect the point we have raised. I should think it must be very disagreeable to Her Majesty to have these criticisms recurring in the House with regard to this paltry sum. We say the last charge ought to be struck out, and on that point we propose to divide the House.

(4.0.) MR. MORTON: I desire to acknowledge the courtesy with which the right hon. Gentleman replied to my observations, and the readiness with which he accepted responsibility for the expenditure of this money. He has referred to an agreement under which the money is paid, and it is unfortunate for him that he should have done so. I would be most anxious to adhere to the agreement strictly, but it has been broken so often in the way of increasing the expenditure that we cannot now pay much attention to it. The agreement was that the sum of £385,000 should be given for the purpose, whereas the expenditure is estimated at a million per annum. If the agreement can be altered by way of an increase, it can also be altered by way of a decrease of expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman said we were bound to keep these palaces in repair. Well, perhaps we are, but the Vote goes farther than that. There is furniture, fuel, and other things to be paid for with it, which does not come under the head of "Maintenance." When the right hon. Gentleman alluded to what had been done before, he forgot that a few years ago both the outside and the inside of these buildings used to be repaired and decorated, and that only the outsides are done now; that being so, let us go a step further and call upon the persons who occupy them rent free to repair them at their own expense. It is on a question of principle that I move the reduction of the Vote.

(4.5.) DR. TANNER: I wish to call attention to the question of police expenses in connection with these palaces. The sum of £678 has been incurred in connection with the employment of the police at Windsor Castle and £845 at Hampton Court Palace, but at the other palaces we find there is no necessity for pay of anything extra for the police. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give us some information on this matter. Then, again, I would point out that at Hampton Court there have been drainage works for which £150 has been asked. The same thing occurred last year and the year before. They are always doing drainage works at Hampton Court, and I say it is becoming a burden to the taxpayer. It must be nothing but patchwork, and it is like throwing money away to spend it on that. We are also called upon to pay an additional sum in order to complete the ventilation and sanitary arrangements at Kew Palace. I hope we shall get some satisfactory replies in regard to these matters from the right hon. Gentleman, who so often tries to put us off with his genial manner and bonhomie. We should also like to have some information as to the works and alterations of a minor order which are put together in a lump sum.

*(4.8.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I think the Committee is entitled to more information than that which has been given by the right hon. Gentleman as to why Kew Palace is maintained at the public expense. I daresay most Members of the House are aware that there exists in Kew Gardens a peculiarly constructed palace. The people in the neighbourhood know scarcely anything about it, and I am told that nobody lives there. Why a palace should be kept up, and a hundred acres of ground should be railed off, is quite incomprehensible. The total cost of maintaining that palace, in which nobody lives, is £807. As, however, £144 has been expended in fuel, light, water, and household expenses, it would seem to indicate that somebody really does live there. Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner will explain.

*MR. PLUNKET: Under the sum of £807, to which the hon. Member refers, several buildings in addition to the palace are maintained. Kew Palace is not at present inhabited, but it is in the power of Her Majesty at any time to put anyone in possession of it.

DR. TANNER: I think the right hon. Gentleman should explain how it is that the sum of £1,292 comes to be charged for the cost of the police at Hampton Court, when there is nothing charged for the police at Buckingham Palace?

*MR. PLUNKET: The one palace is open to the public, and the other is not.

MR. CREMER: Can the right hon. Gentleman say how long it is since Kew Palace was occupied?

MR. LABOUCHERE: I can answer that question. It has not been occupied since the death of the late Duke of Cambridge.

MR. HOLDEN (Walsall): Would it not be desirable to allow the public opportunities to inspect some of the works of art in the private apartments at Hampton Court?

*MR. PLUNKET: My attention has not been called to that matter, but I will inquire.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman explain why Kew Palace, which is not occupied by anybody, should be maintained?

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I desire to record my humble protest against the theory the right hon. Gentleman has put forward as to the manner in which this Vote comes before the House. The right hon. Gentleman said these Votes were only on the Paper pro formâ, that there was an antecedent honourable understanding with the House that they will not be negatived, and that any criticisms must be restricted and limited to the point of any extravagance arising from his Department. Whatever was the understanding at the beginning of the reign that these sums should be taken off the Civil List and put upon the Estimates, this understanding must have implied that this House reserved to itself the power not only to criticise the details, but even to reject the Vote altogether. Otherwise it would be a mere mockery to put these sums on the Votes at all.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: In Kew Palace there is a very valuable house which, not being now occupied, might be used for housing the poor, and I, for, one would gladly vote a sum of money for that purpose. But I will not vote money for a building that nobody will occupy.

Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 107; Noes 205.—(Div. List, No. 62.)

Original Question again proposed.

(4.37.) MR. LABOUCHERE: I beg, Sir, to move that this Vote be reduced by about one-half, namely, £17,920. On a previous occasion we were asked to take a Vote on Account, and we took that Vote on Account in a cheerful and generous spirit. At that time I took the liberty of inquiring about the date of the Dissolution, and I cannot say that after hearing the answer I knew more about the date than before the reply. At the present moment we are asked to give Estimates for the entire year, for the additional ten months, making a year's Vote on Account. There are circumstances that may lead us to think that it is undesirable to give Estimates for the entire year without first having obtained some sort of assurance in regard to the future action of Her Majesty's Government. I am not going to raise the question when the Dissolution will take place, but there are one or two questions which I would venture to ask the right hon. Gentleman the First Lord of the Treasury. Our knowledge of the future can only be derived from experience of the past. I read, a few days ago, a speech made by my right hon. Friend the Member for Newcastle, in which he pointed out that, in accordance with all usage during the present century, no Parliament lasted by a month or two more than six years. The present Government are a Government essentially of precedents and old practices, and therefore I may assume that the Dissolution will take place some time this year. And in voting this sum of money for the whole year we may possibly be voting an expenditure which will take place when another Parliament has been elected, and over which that Parliament would have no species of control. Therefore, acting entirely upon precedents, before agreeing to the Vote being taken for the whole year, I would ask the right hon. Gentleman for two assurances, and I think he will see it would be only reasonable to give those assurances. The new register is made up to the 31st July, and it does not come into force until the 1st of January. On two previous occasions, in 1868 and in 1885, when there has been a Dissolution in the autumn of the year, the register of that year made up to July has been anticipated, an extra number of revising barristers are put on, with the result that if the Election takes place in October or November it is not always upon the register of the previous year, but upon that of the actual year. This, under all circumstances, is most desirable. A great number of persons of the artizan class, agricultural labourers, and others, move frequently in the course of the year, and to deprive every one of them of a vote who has not lived 15 or 16 months in the same place would be grossly unfair, and perhaps lead to us not obtaining the real opinion of the country upon the issues submitted to it. Supposing the Dissolution takes place, therefore, before the 1st of January next year, we may expect the right hon. Gentleman will bring in the usual Bill, anticipating the effect of the registration of 31st July of this year, and taking the Election upon the register of this year and not upon the register of last year? The first assurance I ask is that whenever there is a Dissolution, before the end of the present financial year, 31st March, 1893, the right hon. Gentleman will immediately call Parliament together. I would quote as a precedent a speech of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on a somewhat similar occasion in 1886. The right hon. Gentleman then asked for some assurance from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, who was then Prime Minister, that Parliament would be called together immediately after the Election, and he cited in favour of that view Sir Robert Peel, Earl Russell, and various other high authorities. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade said—

“Now, Sir, that is the question which I address to the right hon. Gentleman. Will he give us the pledge that was asked for, on the reasons quoted, by Sir Robert Peel in 1841, supported by him with all his constitutional authority by arguments which I do not believe can possibly be refuted, and which apply, to my mind, more strongly now than then, and which, I venture to say is a pledge that ought to be insisted upon by the House of Commons.”

And the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, in reply, dealt with the matter historically and said—

“Then I understand his question to be, ‘Will you undertake that Parliament will be called together at as early a day as possible, for the purpose of determining who are to be the Government, and what is to be their policy?’ I have shown that that has not been the course pursued on the occasions which have occurred of the defeat of the Ministry since 1841. But, at the same time, I am disposed to think that there is a good deal of weight in some of the suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman. It may be that the Dissolution may have results so unequivocal that they may speak for themselves. It may be, on the other hand, that they are of a more equivocal character. I am disposed to make this admission on my own responsibility. It is highly probable that it may be the better course that Parliament should meet for the purpose of determining this great question of policy at the very earliest possible moment. I think it quite certain that it ought to meet at an early period. I have stated that I feel very strongly that the country ought not to be allowed to remain in uncertainty after the General Election as to the policy likely to be pursued with regard to Ireland.”

The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian acceded to his demand, said it was a reasonable demand, and that, in the circumstances, Parliament ought to be called together at once, that the government of the country might be placed at once in the hands of those men in whom the country had expressed its confidence. I think the course of these Estimates would run more smoothly if we could obtain this assurance. But, in any case, I have only thought it reasonable to ask the right hon. Gentleman for this assurance before we give the amount for the entire year, and I move the reduction of the Vote accordingly.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £11,925, be granted for the said Service.”—(Mr. Labouchere.)

(4.45.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I note that the hon. Gentleman in the speech he has just made to the House has not put any question to the Government—and in this I think he was well advised—as to the date of the Dissolution; but he asks me for information on two quite different and separate subjects; and, first, as to the arrangement that ought to be made for carrying on the Register in the event of the Dissolution not taking place before the 1st of July.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Between the 30th of July and the 1st of January, or at the end of August.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In August or September. And the hon. Member quoted in favour of the course of action the precedents of 1868 and 1885; but if he casts his memory back he will see these were the two years in which this House passed Reform Bills, and in which a Dissolution was rendered necessary in consequence of the fact that the Reform Bill had been passed, and, as a consequence, it was equally necessary that the new voters brought on the Register in consequence of the Reform Bill should have an opportunity at the approaching Election of recording their votes. These were the only two precedents he was able to quote, and I draw from that fact the conclusion that there is no precedent where there was no Reform Bill for carrying out his suggestion. Therefore, if we be a Government of constitutional precedents, which he says we are—and I am quite willing to accept the compliment at his hands—we shall not carry out the policy he suggests, and I think he will see it would not be wise.

The Crown has the power of dissolving in any one of the seven years during which Parliament may legally exist. If the hon. Gentleman's policy were carried out the Crown would not be able to dissolve Parliament between the 31st August and 1st January in every year, and either the prerogative would be diminished by one-half in each year, or in each Session there would have to be a Bill brought in at the end of July supplying the additional register, which the hon. Gentleman desires, in order that if a Dissolution were required the register coming in force on the 31st July may be the one on which the Election should actually take place. I think the hon. Gentleman will feel that not only are the precedents against him, but that common sense and reason are against him, and that the very nature of the Constitution requires that full discretion and liberty should be left with the Crown in dealing with this question. The second point of the hon. Gentleman was this: He asked the Government to give him a pledge that if there were a Dissolution, Parliament should be called together immediately on the results of the next Election being known, and he supported that request by a quotation from Sir R. Peel, which was employed apparently by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. H. Beach) in 1886, who put a question, as Leader of the Opposition, to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, then at the head of the Government. Well, Sir, I have had no notice of this question being raised, and I can only take my history straight from the hon. Gentleman himself; but even on the version of the history he has given us it appears to me that he has no title to put this forward as a demand based on constitutional usage, for it appears from what he has just said, and from the answer given in 1886 by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, that though it is true Sir Robert Peel in 1841 contended that Parliament should at once be called together, Sir Robert Peel did not invoke invariable constitutional usage in favour of his plea, and since that occasion the practice is entirely the other way. I am taking this from the hon. Gentleman, as I have not looked the matter up for myself. The hon. Gentleman read out a glossary or commentary of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, upon Sir

Robert Peel's dictum of 1841, and as I understand that, after the historical survey by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian—and no one is more entitled to speak on such a subject—his opinion was that constitutional usage, at all events since 1841, had not been in conformity either with the contention of Sir Robert Peel in 1841, or the request made in 1886 by the President of the Board of Trade. Therefore, I conceive it would be a matter for the decision of the Government of the day, and I conceive also that the Government of the day would bear in mind, in coming to a decision, all the facts which the hon. Gentleman has set before us, and bear in mind the arguments which convinced Sir Robert Peel in 1841 and which appealed so strongly to the mind of my right hon. Friend in 1886. I understand that it was found convenient by the Government in 1886, after the Election, to call Parliament together in accordance not with the pledge, but with the indication of intention, given in 1886 by the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for Midlothian. I do not know, Sir, that there is anything more I can say on this subject. The hon. Gentleman and the House may rely upon it that whatever decision the Government have to make upon this question, raising the grave and important constitutional questions of Dissolution and calling Parliament together, whatever advice they may think it their duty to give to Her Majesty on these subjects, they will most carefully weigh and consider every constitutional argument and consideration which can be brought to bear on the subject.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): I do not suppose that it is the intention of my hon. Friend the Member for Northampton (Mr. Labouchere) to press this matter to a Division. I rather imagine his intention has been to draw as much explanation from the Government, to obtain as much light as to the probable course of events in the near future, as he could—a most laudable intention, no doubt, and greatly for the comfort and advantage of all Members of the House if he could have succeeded in cajoling or inducing the right hon. Gentleman to give us some effectual light on that great question which is in the minds of all of us, when the Dissolution is to take place. There is, however, a reason, perhaps there may be more than one, why the right hon. Gentleman has not elucidated it to that extent; one reason why he has not done so may be that he does not quite know himself. Therefore, I have no complaint to make of the right hon. Gentleman. However, I was not quite satisfied with his doctrine upon the first of the two demands made upon him by my hon. Friend. My hon. Friend, as I understood, demanded that if a Dissolution were to take place any year in or after the month of September that Dissolution should be preceded by a measure passed through Parliament for the purpose of accelerating the operation of the new register. My hon. Friend contended, and I agree with the contention, that it would not be satisfactory if, under the circumstances of the present year or any similar circumstances, a new Election should take place upon an extremely old and nearly exhausted register. I do not think there ever has been, within my recollection, any Election on a very old and nearly exhausted register, and as my remembrance embraces, or ought to embrace, the case of not less than 15 Parliaments, if I be correct, that is a considerable number of precedents and authorities. The right hon. Gentleman, in his argument on this part of the case, overlooked what appeared to me to be the most essential part of the argument of my hon. Friend. The right hon. Gentleman, with the ingenuity which characterises him on all these occasions, entered on this course of reasoning: He said the Crown has at all times the power of dissolving; and if your doctrine be sound that there never ought to be a Dissolution in the later months of the year without an accelerated register. Then, unless a Bill be brought in annually to accelerate the operation of the new register, the prerogative of the Crown must be virtually placed in abeyance. But I think he overlooked a consideration which appears to me to be essential—the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve at any moment; and it would be most inexpedient, perhaps even perilous, that that prerogative should be locked up as a matter of certainty for any portion of the year. But the probability in the first place, of its exercise in the later months of the year without notice, is a probability so faint that it can hardly be said to exist, and it would be ridiculous to pass Bills continually for the acceleration of the register with reference to a contingency of that kind which, so far as I know, has never occurred. Such a Dissolution as I have in my mind—a hurried, sudden, and unexpected Dissolution, an exercise on some sudden occasion of the prerogative of the Crown—I do not recollect to have ever occurred in the later months of the year. The point of my hon. Friend is, as I understand it, that it would be more reasonable at the present moment. No doubt my hon. Friend or some other hon. Member will find an occasion to revive the question he has raised to-day before we have advanced very greatly further into the business of the Session. As business is carried on matters will develop themselves, and, undoubtedly, when we come near to the natural death of Parliament it is very desirable that Members should have such light as can be given. I am making no censure on the Government. I do not say that the time has yet come, but I think the time may come, and, further, I think it obvious that should the business of Parliament, or any cause, lead the Government to withhold their advice for Dissolution till a late period in the year, the Dissolution being, as I say, a foreseen Dissolution, and not the result of a sudden emergency, with respect to which the hands of the Crown ought to remain entirely free—as I quite agree—but a Dissolution belonging to the natural and proximate extinction of the life of Parliament, I hold the opinion very strongly that, in such a case as that, if the Government see cause to postpone their advice with respect to Dissolution until the autumn months, it would be a wise and reasonable and constitutional thing that in our foresight of these circumstances we should include the introduction of a Bill which will facilitate the operation of the new register. I say this, without calling for any fresh declaration from the right hon. Gentleman on the subject, and while I should think it entirely premature to press him at such a moment as this, I do think the general contention of my hon. Friend is a rational contention, and that it would be far more in the spirit of the Constitution to operate with a register one month old than with a register ten or eleven months old. With regard to the other subject of the proposed pledge as to the meeting of Parliament, there again I think, till we see our way further into the circumstances, we cannot require of the Government that they should lend themselves to any very precise and determinate conclusions. I think it might be not inconvenient in the circumstances of the time if we were to have laid before us the dates of all Dissolutions that have taken place since the Reform Act of 1832 and the times of the meeting of Parliament. I must admit that there is one case which occurs to my mind which shows that Dissolution has not always been followed immediately by a meeting of Parliament. That was in 1837, when a Dissolution took place in the summer on the demise of the Crown, and Parliament did not meet till the following November, and I am not sure, indeed, that even in November it was not called together on account of special exigencies connected with the demise of the Crown, and the necessity of settling the new Civil List. I do not think we can press the Government further at the present moment, but, at the same time, I do think these are questions upon which, when circumstances are mature, information ought to be given to us, and the veil of the future, as far as possible, drawn aside, because these are questions upon which such an amount, not only of personal interests, but of convenience, and even almost personal necessity, depends, and in the necessities of Parliament so many interests of so many classes are involved, that it is obviously expedient that at the proper time we should receive the best information the Government is able to give us. When that proper time is to arrive it would be premature for me to attempt to decide, but I do feel strongly that before many months elapse we should have a renewal of a discussion which at the present time I have no disposition to prolong.

MR. LABOUCHERE: I ask leave, Sir, to withdraw my Motion, and merely wish to say that no doubt I, or some other Member of this House, will ask on some future occasion to have the veil withdrawn. At present I have not secured the information; but as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian said, it is not a question of whether we ought to obtain it, but of when we ought to do so. I do not want to anticipate things at all, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take into consideration the observations of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, and when the time for the next inquiry comes he will be prepared to assure us that he is not going to the country on a register 14 months old.

DR. TANNER: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, as he has called attention to the fact that there was a Reform Bill on the two occasions quoted by my hon. Friend, we are to understand that the Irish Local Government Bill is not a Reform Bill; or, if it be, are we to understand that it is not going to be passed this year?

MR. MORTON: I think there is a general feeling in the country, among both Tories and Liberals, that it would be convenient that we should know pretty soon the date of the Dissolution. The present uncertainty causes a great deal of uneasiness, unnecessary expense, and, I am told, considerable disturbance to trade. I think it would be wise if the Government would take into consideration the question of the register, and let the country know as soon as possible whether the Election is to be in one, two, or three months' time. I do not think it should be late in the autumn; but if it were, the Government should get the voters' list accelerated, so that the new voters might have an opportunity of exercising their rights. I know it is not of very great importance to many hon. Gentlemen opposite, because they are well aware that they are not coming back, whether the General Election takes place earlier or later, on a new Register or an old one, but I can understand and sympathise with the desire of hon. Members who are coming back to know what time it will be.

(5.11.) MR. BLANE (Armagh, S.): The hon. Member for Northampton has asked the Government for pledges, but I think the Front Opposition Bench might give us a little information. Up to the present they have not told us what they propose to do.

THE CHAIRMAN: That topic is not connected with the present Vote.

MR. BLANE: I regret that before the hon. Member put that question to the Government he did not consult some of his friends, especially on subjects which concern Ireland. I may say that we have no belief in the absolute faith of any Party.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Question

before the House is the reduction of the Vote for the Royal Palaces.

MR. BLANE: It is absolutely indifferent to me what Government is in power so long as we make them useful to ourselves. The pledges and promises of the Government are valueless, and the same thing may be said of the Opposition. We intend to be hard taskmasters, and shall not be content with promises in future.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order!

MR. BLANE: I regret that the same latitude is not allowed to me as to the Member for Northampton. If I had followed him sentence by sentence I should be inclined to say that I am entitled to demand pledges as he did, as I care not on which Bench the men sit from whom I want the pledges.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must warn the hon. Gentleman that continued irrelevance will bring upon him the necessity of keeping his seat.

(5.16.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): I find in May's "Parliamentary Practice" that in 1841 only one half of the Estimates were presented to the House because a speedy Dissolution was anticipated, and the remainder of the Estimates were passed by the new Parliament. The same thing was done in several other years, and I find the same instances mentioned in Dod's "Parliamentary Companion." It seems to me that if we vote the whole of the Supply we may be going beyond what we have any right to do and voting money that should be passed by another Parliament. I should like to know whether precedents are to have any weight, and whether the doctrine laid down by these eminent authorities should not be respected in the present case. As no answer is given by the Government to this appeal we shall not agree to this Vote.

(5.17.) Question put.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 92; Noes 232.—(Div. List, No. 63.)

Original Question again proposed.

*(5.35.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to move to reduce the Vote by the sum of £807, which is the amount set down as the cost of the maintenance of Kew Palace and the buildings on Kew Green. I think the defence which the right hon. Gentleman set up for the maintenance of this Vote was of such an exceedingly weak character that it seems to me absurd to imagine that any real economist can consider the amount asked for as just. I content myself by just referring to two or three items which go to make up the Vote. The right hon. Gentleman has admitted that this is a palace in which nobody lives. He is not able to inform us how long it is since it was tenanted, and yet year by year we are called upon to vote sums of money for the purpose of keeping this palace in a state of repair and providing new furniture. Nobody can tell why these items are demanded from the House from year to year. The first item I find is £39, a small sum undoubtedly—all the items are small, but they make up a very considerable sum, nearly £1,000. £39 is set down for salary, wages, and allowances. Why a sum, no matter whether it is £39 or 39s., should be asked for salary, wages, and allowances for persons to look after a house in which nobody lives, I cannot understand. Then somebody is clothed at the cost of the nation. The item is a small one; but I hope to know who it is whose salary, wages, allowances, and clothing are provided at the cost of the nation. £50 is also asked for new works, alterations and additions, and why it is found necessary to increase the size of a building in which nobody lives justifies us in asking for an explanation from the right hon. Gentleman. There is also an item of £495 for the maintenance and repair of this palace in which nobody lives; and in addition to that, £144 for providing fuel, light, water, and household articles? for this extraordinary building, in which nobody has resided for a series of years. Why is it necessary to expend £144 on fuel, light, water, and household articles? I think the items which I have referred to, and upon which no information has been forthcoming, warrant me in moving that the whole sum of £807 should be expunged from this Vote. The item is a mere trifle, I admit, to many hon. Members sitting on that side of the House, and probably to many sitting on this side; but considering that the £807 has to be paid in great part out of the pockets of the poorer classes of our countrymen, who live, some of them, eight or nine together in one miserable hovel—very often in one room—in the East End of London, it seems to me that to keep up institutions such as are included in this Vote is to say the least an absolute injustice to the poorer classes of our countrymen. I want it to be understood that this is a protest vote, not merely against maintaining palaces in which nobody lives, but against excluding the public from the large area which is fenced in. I therefore hope that this may be regarded as a protest against the maintenance of this palace in which nobody lives, and the closing up of acres of ground on which nobody walks.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £29,043, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Cremer.)

MR. PLUNKET: I did not understand when I tried before to give the particulars of these expenses that further particulars would be required. In the first place, it is an entire mistake to suppose that the whole sum asked for in this item is spent upon a palace in which no person lives. If the hon. Member will look at the Paper he will see that this not only applies to Kew Palace, but also to the three cottages on Kew Green being all occupied; and there is only about £250 of the £807 which is spent on the palace itself. And then the hon. Member asks what are the particulars of expenditure under certain sub-sections. Well, as I have already said, there are four or five houses on Kew Green which are covered by this particular Vote.

MR. CREMER: Will the right hon. Gentleman state who lives in the cottages on Kew Green?

MR. PLUNKET: Certainly. Cambridge Cottage on Kew Green, which was purchased by George III., and so came into our hands, is inhabited by the Duke of Cambridge. Beach House is inhabited by Miss Harrison; and Kew Cottage is inhabited by Lady Helps and one other lady. The whole of Kew Gardens was presented by Her Majesty the Queen to the nation for its present purpose, and all that immense space is available for the public. The sum put down is not excessive, seeing that four or five buildings have to be kept up, and that small sums are paid towards the expenses of equipping and drilling a local volunteer brigade for the protection of these buildings in case of fire. I believe that I have now answered all the questions that have been put to me.

Mr. Cremer

(5.43.) MR. MORTON: I shall support my hon. Friend if he goes to a Division upon this matter. If these houses are to be kept in repair, they should be occupied by somebody. There are many deserving objects of charity for which they might be utilised. I would venture to suggest that the right hon. Gentleman should induce the authorities to give up Kew Palace to the Salvation Army. It would be a very excellent place for the reception of the waifs and strays which have been rescued from the worst classes of society. If devoted to that purpose it would not only be a saving to the Government, but it would be promoting a good cause. There are four other buildings to which this Vote refers. I think that one of them is occupied by the Duke of Cambridge. Now, I do not see why the taxpayers should be called upon to pay anything towards the upkeep of the Duke of Cambridge. He gets a large allowance from the taxes as a member of the Royal Family; he has a very big salary as Commander-in-Chief, and he also receives other perquisites as Ranger and in connection with other offices which he holds. Altogether, therefore, he gets a pretty good share of the taxes of the country without calling upon us to keep this house in repair. I think this part of the Vote, at least, should be struck out, and I shall support the reduction to that extent. It is disgraceful that the Duke of Cambridge should expect the ratepayers to pay it. If his salary is not enough, let him bring his application for more before us, and we will consider it. I certainly do not see why the public money should be frittered away in this manner.

(5.50.) MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I quite agree that the amount put down for repairs to the house occupied by the Duke of Cambridge should be struck out. The question has been raised as to whether some place could not be found to serve as a last resting-place for the brave old soldiers who have distinguished themselves in the Service of their country. I would suggest that Kew Palace might be used for the purpose, and be called a home for the brave. I am not myself in favour of wars; but if we ask our soldiers to go abroad to fight for the honour and glory of Great Britain, we should send them out with the hope that if they return they will find a last home (other than the workhouse) on their own soil. If it could not be set apart for that purpose, Her Majesty might let it at a profit rent, and not allow it to remain as a retreat for jackdaws. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will give some assurance that this demand will not re-appear on the Estimates. He must himself feel the awkwardness of having such a Vote on the Paper, and he must also recognise the advisability of appropriating it for some useful purpose. For instance, the London School Board might like to have the palace, and to turn it into a home for truants, or for those little children who in the courts and alleys of London hardly ever see the light of heaven. I shall support the reduction of the Vote.

(5.56.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Before the Division is taken, I would call attention to the extraordinary disproportion in the salaries, wages, and allowances in the Vote for Marlborough House; that is, if I am not out of order in discussing it on this Vote. I have taken the opportunity this year of studying the Estimates—

THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member is not in order in discussing this matter on an Amendment with reference to Kew Palace only.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 116; Noes 200.—(Div. List, No. 64.)

Original Question again proposed.

(6.8.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I would call attention to the fact that a shilling is still charged for admission to Holyrood Palace, Edinburgh, whilst the admission to every other Royal Palace is free. The money so obtained is sufficient to cover all the expenses, and leaves about £54 towards the expenses of Kew Palace; but I contend that the Royal Palace in Scotland should be opened free like the other Royal buildings. Holyrood has nothing in it except a few portraits of what are supposed to have been the early Kings of Scotland. I admit that there are three free days, but I hope that on the remaining three days the palace will also be thrown open free to visitors. It is really Englishmen and Americans who pay money to go into it, and I do not see why this last charge for admission should be allowed to remain.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I should like to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works to the new form in which the Estimates are presented, by which these Appropriations in Aid, which used to be taken as extra receipts, are now used by the Department and go to reduce the items voted. Whilst there is apparently no reduction, as a matter of fact, after deducting the Appropriations in Aid, the expenditure this year exceeds that of last year. In these circumstances, I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would not think it well that we should have in the future full particulars of what these Appropriations in Aid are, from what quarters they are received, and wherein their application differs from the practice under the old system? It is impossible for us to check these Votes unless the details are fully stated year by year.

MR. MORTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman for some information with respect to Holyrood Palace, which I am told has fallen into a state of disrepair. It is a thoroughly disgraceful proceeding on the part of the Board of Works to allow an historical building of that sort to go into a dilapidated condition. It is generally complained that the Government have neglected all the old and historical buildings in Scotland and have spent money elsewhere. I should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would give the Committee an assurance that the Palace of Holyrood will be kept in a proper state of repair. I should also like the right hon. Gentleman to tell us something further as to the one shilling charge for admission to the palace, and also why the chapel adjoining the palace has been allowed to fall into a ruinous condition. I think that is a most unwise thing.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): The one shilling charged for admission to Holyrood is paid not by the residents of Edinburgh nor even by the Scotch people generally, but by Americans and foreigners, and the ordinary disciples of Mr. Cook; and in respect of their shilling these people have the advantage of seeing a sight which is well worth the money. Holyrood is one of the most interesting of the historical buildings in this country, and the people who pay a shilling to see it get, I repeat, value for their money.

MR. LENG (Dundee): I should like to protest against the extraordinary doctrines that have just been promulgated by my hon. Friend, that a charge of this kind ought to be maintained simply because it is paid by Americans and foreigners. What should we think of the Americans, supposing they had, as I suppose they will have in time to come, ruins to which an historical interest attaches—what would we think of them if they levied a tax upon the Britisher simply as a means of making a certain revenue. The argument of the hon. Member would apply to Windsor Castle and to other buildings to which the public resort. The tendency in recent years has been to get rid of such imposts and to throw open these buildings upon fair and reasonable conditions to the public, whose property they are.

*MR. PLUNKET: Yielding to the demand that was made last year, the Palace of Holyrood will now be open to the public on three days out of every week.

DR. CLARK: Our claim is that this Royal Palace, like all the others, should be free every day.

*MR. PLUNKET: Last year the utmost demand that was made was that the palace should be open three days a week. That has been conceded; and I am told it is in consonance with the feeling of the people of Edinburgh. At any rate, before going further, I think we had better wait and see how the change works. The hon. Gentleman opposite has asked me about the Appropriations in Aid. I have spoken to my right hon. Friends who are specially conversant with those questions, and there will be no objection to giving, in future, fuller particulars of these Appropriations in Aid. There were really no such details in the former Estimates; but there will be no objection in future Estimates to give such details as can be supplied. In some instances, of course, we must lump the sums, because it must be obvious they could not be set out in detail in the Estimates.

MR. SYDNEY BUXTON: I do not want particular and minute details, but as full details as were given in finance accounts when these sums were paid into the Exchequer under their respective heads. I understand the Secretary to the Treasury will look into the question, and, if so, I am satisfied.

MR. MORTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered my question respecting the Palace of Holyrood. It is in a state of disrepair, which is a disgrace to the nation. I wish to say how much I agree with the brave and patriotic sentiments of the hon. Member for Dundee.

DR. TANNER: A great deal of money has recently been spent in providing pantries and everything in connection with the cuisine of Marlborough House. This year we are called upon to pay £550 for the building of wine cellars, and I should really like to know when this sort of thing is to end. Then, again, Sir, I should like to call attention to the extraordinary discrepancy between the salaries and wages of some of the officials. At Buckingham Palace the turncocks get a salary of £81; at Windsor Castle they are paid £127; at St. James' Palace, £91; and at Hampton Court only £57. Now, Sir, at Hampton Court there is a large and valuable collection of art treasures—valued, I suppose, at many hundreds of thousands of pounds—and I should like to know why the turncocks there are paid so low a salary. The warders have only 20s. a week, with five shillings extra per week in the case of eleven of them in lieu of apartments. Why should these men be treated in that miserable way, and why, in the item of £31 for controlling the fire brigade, paying charwomen and providing medical attendance, should the medical attendance be put after and rated lower than the services of the fire brigade and the charwomen?

*(6.30.) MR. PLUNKET: As regards the turncocks, their salaries are apportioned according to the responsibilities of their positions, they have to look after the proper supply of water to the various buildings. The charge for labourers will be found included in another part of the Estimate for the expense of maintenance and repairs. As regards Marlborough House the repairs were necessary, for instance, in the cellars, where owing to defects—and it is a result I am sure the hon. Member will deplore—a large quantity of valuable wine was destroyed.

DR. TANNER: Not an unmixed evil, considering the association of gout with port wine.

(6.31.) MR. MORTON: From a temperance point of view, and for the advantage of example in a Royal Palace;

I should be glad to find the cellarage diminished. I should like to have some information in respect to Holyrood Palace. Is it kept in good repair?

*MR. PLUNKET: I can assure the hon. Member Holyrood is in an excellent state of repair.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £75,643, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1893, for the Royal Parks and Pleasure Gardens."

(6.33.) MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): There is one question I should like to ask in reference to St. James's Park. Is there any objection to the removal of the steps at the Duke of York's Column and to making a roadway into the park there? I do not think there is any difficulty. The slope of the ground from Waterloo Place is the same as the slope into the park by way of St. James's Street, and it will be seen by anybody who examines the place that the steps are built into a partly artificial mound. It would be possible to construct a roadway without any very serious work and at slight cost. These few yards of roadway would give driving access from the North through the park to the South, and in a small way would add to the public enjoyment of the park. It would not deprive the houses in Carlton House Terrace of any privacy, for the roadway close by is already used by cabs and other vehicles. It would cause annoyance to nobody, and it would be a public convenience to have this drive open from Waterloo Place to Storey's Gate.

*(6.35.) SIR R. TEMPLE (Worcester, Evesham): I am in order, I think, in referring on this Vote to the establishment of gardeners and labourers at the Royal Botanical Gardens at Kew. I am anxious to secure from my right hon. Friend a kindly consideration of their case, which has been before him more than once, and doubtless he is familiar with it. There is among these men—trained gardeners and labourers—a considerable amount of discontent at the position of disadvantage or inequality, as regards pay, in which they are placed as compared with men of a similar class in parks within the Metropolitan area, and at Hampton Court almost in sight of them. It is urged on their behalf that the locality in which they live and labour is just as expensive as the Metropolis, and though they are just outside the borders of London it is a densely populated and expensive neighbourhood. The conditions of their employment are the same as those within the Metropolitan area, and they ask—I do not say demand—that they shall be put on an equality as regards remuneration. Their work must be excellent, for the Botanic Garden which they cultivate is admitted to be the finest in the world. I believe it has been replied that these men have various little perquisites in connection with their position in the gardens, but these have but a small financial value, and in no way make up for the difference between their pay and the pay of their Metropolitan brethren. In the same way the police in the gardens make a similar claim. They wish to have the same official status as their brethren in the Metropolitan areas. The case has been before my right hon. Friend in previous years, and there may be reasons why the request has not been granted. I do not know what the reasons may be, but I do earnestly press upon him that he should give consideration to the claims of a deserving class of public servants. It is understood that there is some discontent at Kew on this point also.

(6.40.) MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): It is high time attention was called to some of the items in this Vote. We have, it appears to me, sinecures of all sorts in connection with these parks. For Richmond Park we have a ranger, a deputy-ranger, an assistant superintendent under-ranger, and there is a salary for a gentleman called a bailiff. It is sometimes held on the other side of the House, and, perhaps, on this side also, that there is a certain invidiousness in calling attention to these items, but for my own part I cannot join in that view. If this Vote comes before us at all it is for our criticism. True, the amounts are not very large, but the persons to whom I have referred draw amongst them salaries to the amount of £1,500 a year, but I am convinced that even the ingenuity of the right hon. Gentleman will not enable him to say that £1,500 worth of duty is done by these officials. In the first place, there is the ranger himself, and I ask the right hon. Gentleman if it is not an invidious question who the ranger is? The country, I think, will be interested to know who fills these sinecure offices. The salary is small—£109 10s.—and if it is not a sinecure, then I think we must sympathise with the occupant of the office, for the emolument is dealt out with a not too liberal hand. Perhaps the ranger is a military officer receiving pay from Army funds. If so, I hope that pay is on a more liberal scale than the item in this Vote. But are there any duties attached to the receipt of this salary? I have never seen any “ranging” in Richmond Park. I have seen tall upstanding horses, mounted by tall men covered with long cloaks to the horses’ tails, but I have always thought these were members of the Surrey Mounted Police. It may be the ranger, deputy ranger, or under ranger, may have been among these horsemen. I notice that the superintendent under ranger, who I take to be the third officer in point of dignity, has much the higher salary. Is it the fact that he actually does all the “ranging” there is to be done? In fact, I shall be glad to have some information about these offices; and, as a protest against what I believe to be a waste of money upon sinecure appointments, I move the reduction of the Vote by £500.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum not exceeding £75,143, be granted for the said Service.” (Mr. Keay.)

*(6.47.) MR. PLUNKET: The ranger of Richmond Park exercises supervision over the park, and he has charge of the herd of deer there. The present holder of the office is His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, and there is no one from whom I have received more valuable advice and assistance in the management of the Royal Parks than His Royal Highness. The bailiff is a retired military officer, and he acts as bailiff of all the Royal Parks. As a matter of fact, he receives £100 a year for the many and really most valuable services he renders in addition to retired pay—£600.

MR. STOREY: Who is the assistant superintendent under ranger, who gets £90, and does all the work?

MR. PLUNKET: His name, I think, is Graham. With regard to the gardeners at Kew and their position, I can assure my hon. Friend—

Mr. Seymour Keay

It being ten minutes before Seven of the clock, the Chairman left the Chair to make his report to the House.

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next; Committee also report Progress; to sit again this day.

MR. STOREY: Is it intended to take Supply this evening?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes.

MR. STOREY: A large number of Members have left the House under the impression Supply would not be taken, seeing that it is not down on the Order Paper. It will be very inconvenient.

MR. RITCHIE: It is the intention to set down Supply for to-night.

MR. STOREY: I regret the Government should have formed that intention, because several of my hon. Friends desire to be heard on matters which they would bring forward, but they have left the House unaware that Supply was to be taken. However, it will be our duty to direct the attention of the House to other matters.

HARES BILL.

Lords Amendment to be considered forthwith.

DR. CLARK: May I ask what is this Amendment?

COLONEL DAWNAY (York, N.R., Thirsk): Merely a formal Amendment—the substitution of “Great Britain” for the “United Kingdom.”

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): Not quite a formal Amendment. I have been in consultation with an eminent Member of the other House, and it appeared that if the Amendment were not made there would be reason to fear that Ireland might suffer prejudice. The Amendment carries out the intention of the Bill.

Lords Amendment considered and agreed to.

EVENING SITTING.

SUPPLY—COMMITTEE.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. LENG rose to speak—

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members not being present,— House adjourned at five minutes after Nine o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Monday, 4th April, 1892.

SAT FIRST.

The Earl of Minto after the death of his father.

FIRES &c., ON PASSENGER SHIPS.

EARL DE LA WARR: My Lords, I wish to give notice that after the Recess I propose to call attention to the subject of fires on board passenger ships carrying inflammable substances, and to ask Her Majesty's Government whether any measures can be adopted, either through the Board of Trade, or otherwise, to afford greater security to life and property, especially with reference to transatlantic steamers.

PRIVATE BILLS—STANDING ORDER No. 133.

*THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): My Lords, I beg to move the Amendment to Standing Order 133 which stands in my name. Under the present Standing Orders Local Authorities, and Corporations, are absolutely precluded from working tramways constructed within their Municipal areas. The House of Commons have already passed such a Standing Order as I propose your Lordships should pass to-night; and the reason of it is simply this: that where Corporations are extending their tramways beyond the most populous parts of their boroughs, it is found that where they have already tramways existing in the boroughs worked by companies under lease from them they are at the mercy of those companies in respect of the extended tramways; the Tramway Companies practically being able to impose their own terms upon the Corporations. Your Lordships will see that there are in the Standing Order I propose ample provisions to prevent the Municipalities in ordinary cases from working tramways, and I think your Lordships will agree with me that that is quite outside the ordinary business of a Municipality. With these safeguards I ask your Lordships to pass the Standing Order of which I have given notice, and which has already passed the House of Commons.

Moved, That Standing Order No. 133 be amended as follows, namely:—

STANDING ORDER No. 133.

(No powers to be given to local authorities to run carriages and take tolls upon tramways.)

No powers shall be given to any municipal corporation, local board, improvement commissioners, or other local authority to place or run carriages upon any tramway, and to demand and take tolls and charges in respect of the use of such carriages.

Amendment moved,

“Provided that where any tramways have been constructed or acquired, or are authorised by the Bill to be constructed or acquired, by the local authority, the Committee on the Bill may, if they think fit, under the special circumstances of the case, insert a clause to following effect:—

If the local authority are unable to demise the tramways upon such terms as in the opinion of the Board of Trade will yield to the local authority an adequate rent therefor, the Board of Trade may grant a licence to the local authority to work such tramways, and the local authority may thereupon work the same, and may provide such plant, materials, and things as may be requisite or convenient therefor; and in such case all enactments relating to the working of the tramways and the taking of tolls and charges therefor shall extend and apply mutatis mutandis to and in relation to the local authority: Provided that if at any time during such working by the local authority any company make to the local authority a tender in writing to take a lease of and to work the tramways for such period (not being less than seven years, unless the local authority shall otherwise agree) at such rent and upon such terms and conditions as shall, in the opinion of the Board of Trade, be adequate and proper, and such company at the same time offer to purchase the horses, cars, engines, and fixed and movable plant of the local authority not included in such lease, at a price to be fixed, unless otherwise agreed on between such company and the local authority, by a competent valuer to be appointed by the Board of Trade; then upon payment of such price the local authority shall demise the tramways to such company at such rent and upon such terms and conditions, and the powers of the local authority to work the tramways shall cease and determine.—(The Earl of Morley.)

Motion agreed to.

Standing Order amended accordingly.

*THE EARL OF MORLEY: The second alteration I would ask your Lordships to make in the Standing Order is to enable Railway Companies, whose Bills are now passing, to adopt some one of the schedules of rates which have already been passed under Provisional Orders for neighbouring lines. This will enable them to obviate the necessity and expense of having separate Provisional Orders for each Bill. I believe that no injustice or injury can be done by this change; it will be a great convenience, and save a considerable amount of time and expense to the Railway Companies concerned. I beg leave to move the same.

Moved, "That it be an Instruction to Committees on Bills of the present Session for incorporating Railway Companies that they be at liberty, if they think fit, to omit the clause required by Standing Order 123A in any case where they shall be of opinion that rates and charges in respect of merchandise traffic can be conveniently and properly fixed by reference to any schedule already sanctioned by a Rates and Charges Order Confirmation Act."—(The Earl of Morley.)

Motion agreed to.

TECHNICAL AND INDUSTRIAL INSTITUTIONS BILL [H.L.] COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: My Lords, before the question is put that the House resolve itself into Committee, I wish to say that I am, of course, most anxious to meet the criticisms and suggestions of noble Lords opposite; but it seems to me to be a matter requiring some consideration, and would, I think, be much better dealt with before the Standing Committee; therefore, if it meets your approval I should ask your Lordships to let the Bill pass through this stage, and I will take care to put down Amendments to meet the views of my noble Friends before it comes on in the Standing Committee.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into Committee upon the said Bill.—(The Lord Macnaghten.)

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 2.

*LORD NORTON: My Lords, I understand from what has just fallen from the noble Lord introducing this Bill that he wishes all discussion, or Amendments, to be postponed till the comes before the Standing Committee. At the same time, by way of preparation to call the attention of the Standing Committee to this Bill, I beg to say a word about this second clause, which enumerates the kinds of schools to which the land is proposed to be sold or given, either by compulsion, or by agreement,—and in settlement without, apparently, the consent of the remaindermen. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Kimberley) pointed out that defects in the Bill, and I believe the noble Lord who introduces the Bill has promised to meet that objection in Committee; but I venture to ask generally, with reference to this Bill to deal differently with this class of schools from the law relating to the same way to ordinary elementary schools—why should not elementary schools be in the same category as the schools enumerated in the second clause, for which this Bill proposes to give such facilities for getting land? If there is anything in this Bill which is intended to give this class of polytechnic schools greater advantages than the School Sites Act gives to elementary schools, then I think elementary schools have a fair claim to those additional privileges themselves. Elementary Schools for the poor have the claim upon the public, and upon the consideration of this Government. If, therefore, this gives a preference to technical schools over elementary schools, I think that is wrong, and that the additional advantages should be given to the elementary schools above that which they have under the School Sites Act, 1849. If, on the other hand, there is nothing more proposed to be given for this class of schools than is now given to elementary schools, what is the use of this long Bill? A Bill of one clause would be sufficient to say that the provisions of the School Sites Act of 1849 should apply to this class of technical schools. There is no reason why the two should be different; on the contrary, I think nothing can be more mischievous than a number of Bills for the same provision for different kind of schools. I think the noble Lord who introduced this Bill stated in his introduction that he had in his mind one particular c-

The Earl of Morley

It seems to me that there is nothing more dangerous than making a general Bill to meet a particular case, which might have been met by a Private Bill. Merely to save the promoters the expense of a Private Bill a Bill is introduced with the possibility of extension and application generally to all schools of that kind throughout the Kingdom. I think that is a thing in itself extremely objectionable; therefore as it is proposed to postpone discussion, or Amendments to the Standing Committee, I give this notice, that I shall call the attention of the Standing Committee to the question which I have now raised relating to this second clause.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, I confess I think there is a good deal of principle involved in this Bill; but I think the more convenient stage to discuss it would be when it has passed through the Standing Committee and your Lordships see what changes have been made in its form. I entertain the strongest possible objection to any power for one man to give away what does not belong to him; and I think the proper course that ought to be pursued would be that if the tenant for life chooses to give away what is his, that is his own life estate, he should be permitted to do so provided it can be done without injury to the remainderman. If it was thought that there was some difficulty about it, I should think the difficulty might be met in cases where the Lands Clauses Act might be applied, where the tenant for life might waive any claim for his life interest, and then the remainderman, if he desired it, would have his interest valued and sold, and the entire fee-simple obtained for the property in question. But I confess I should look, and do look, with very great jealousy upon any system by which it was possible for one man to do what may be to the injury of another, and which he has by law and in justice no right to do. And I protest against the notion that my noble and learned Friend suggested about the impropriety of the Reverter Clause. I think it is a most proper clause, and for this reason: a man may be disposed to give land because he has an interest in a particular institution,—it may be charitable, or religious, or what not. If it is to be turned afterwards into something entirely different, not only are the terms of the gift abandoned, but, besides that, it may be turned into something which may be very injurious to the property; and it appears to me that the Reverter Clause was devised for the express object of preventing that perversion of what you have intended. I have only said this for the purpose of giving my noble and learned Friend notice that, although I said nothing upon the Second Reading, and although here I abstain from doing anything in the nature of attempting amendment, I shall wait to see how this Bill comes out of the Standing Committee, and I reserve to myself the right to form a judgment then whether it ought to pass into law or not.

LORD MACNAGHTEN: I am much obliged to my noble Friends for their warning, and I hope when the discussion comes on I shall be able to satisfy them that there is nothing either dangerous, or wrong in the Bill.

Bill reported without Amendments, and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

LABOURERS' (IRELAND) ALLOTMENTS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order of the Day for the Third Reading, read.

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN: My Lords, there is a slight verbal Amendment I shall ask your Lordships' permission to insert in this Bill. In order that there may be no misapprehension regarding the effect of the "acre" referred to in this Bill as the Statute acre I propose to insert the word "Statute" before "acre" at the end of the Bill. The only other remark I wish to make is with reference to some observations which were made by at least one noble Lord on the occasion of the Second Reading of this Bill, when some apprehension was expressed lest it might turn out to have an undesirable effect in the matter of increasing the evil already existing in many parts of Ireland as regards congested districts. I wish to remind the noble Lords that the principal Acts which govern this Act make ample provision against sub-letting, or conacre or any other process which would have the effect of defeating the object of the Bill in the matter of allotments and overcrowding. With these few remarks I beg to move that the Bill be now read a third time.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 3^a."
—(The Earl of Aberdeen.)

EARL FORTESCUE: My Lords, I see this Bill has come up from the other House of Parliament, and therefore I conclude it comes up with the sanction and approval of Her Majesty's Government. If I am not mistaken the Irish Boards of Guardians are to be the bodies to set this extension of the previous labourers' allotments legislation into action. The fact of the Bill coming up to us with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government is not with me quite conclusive as to its prudence in leaving too much to be dealt with at the discretion of the Irish Boards of Guardians. I remember a few years ago protesting earnestly against giving the Boards of Guardians (whose action I know something of, and have had personal experience of upon my property in Ireland) too much discretion and power in providing dwellings for the labourers. I predicted that there would be, in spite of the sanction which was required from the Castle at Dublin, instances of jobbery, of favouritism, and of spite. Well, my Lords, I am far from saying that all Irish Boards of Guardians are capable of such conduct as that; but some, certainly, have been; and the working of that Act in those respects has not been encouraging I think to the Legislature to place more in their hands than is absolutely necessary. In the case of a slight extension of the amount of land to be taken for allotments there will not be the same facilities for jobbery, or partiality, of which in the more serious undertaking of providing dwellings we have seen various instances. I do not want to oppose this measure, but I take this opportunity of recording my profound distrust of the fairness and honest dealing of certain members of the Boards of Guardians of Ireland.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 3^a accordingly, with Amendments; Bill passed, and returned to the Commons.

The Earl of Aberdeen

HARES BILL.

Returned from the Commons with the Amendment agreed to.

BILLS OF SALE BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, the Bill of which I have to move the Second Reading has but one object,—that is to ascertain more precisely what the law is upon the subject of those instruments which are known as bills of sale. It happens somewhat curiously that your Lordships' House has been judicially engaged the greater part of the day in determining that question; and the difficulty that has arisen, which is sought to be cured by this Bill, is to make the different definitions in the earlier Acts appropriate to the intended objects of those Acts. There have been three Acts of Parliament passed with totally different objects, in 1854, 1878 and 1882. The object of the first two Acts was to protect execution creditors against the fraud of their debtors, and, accordingly, the Legislature with great foresight provided that in order to protect the rights of such creditors the goods should pass out of the hands and out of the apparent possession of their debtors. That was a very wise and useful piece of legislation. In 1882 another Act was passed having a totally different object, which was to preserve impecunious and illiterate debtors from the machinations of the money-lenders. With that object the Legislature provided that any instrument which was given to secure a loan should be in a particular form, which was intended by the Legislature to be so clear that any person executing it would understand what it was and to what property it applied; and any instrument executed with that object in a different form was to be absolutely void. Your Lordships will see at once that those were totally different objects, but unfortunately the draftsman of that Act thought proper to apply the same provisions to the whole code of legislation, without having regard to the particular Acts of Parliament or to their different objects. The result has been an amount of liti-

tion and confusion which it is possible to exaggerate. The object of the Bill is not to alter the law but to make clear which set of provisions should apply to each particular class of instruments. The Bill is divided into two parts; the first part deals with bills of sale generally, while the second part relates only to bills of sale intended as security for money,—so as to ascertain and make more clear and under it possible for the Courts to come to something like a unanimous conclusion as to what is the meaning of the instrument and what its legal effect shall be, having reference to that which ought to be the key to all instruments, namely, the intention which the parties actually have when they execute such instrument. That is the main principle of the Bill, and I think your Lordships will consider that if it is properly arranged and defined in the Bill it will be a useful addition to present legislation.

LORD THRING: My Lords, I know nothing of this Bill; but I only want to dress myself to one particular expression the noble and learned Lord has used, namely, that it was the fault of the draftsman who put these Bills together that any confusion has arisen. I have not the slightest wish to defend the Bill; but, my Lords, I submit that under no circumstances is the blame to be thrown in this House upon the draftsman. The draftsman is not here to defend himself; he is instructed by the Minister; and I say deliberately that every word in a Bill which is brought in here, down to the dotting of the "i's" and the crossing of the "t's," is done upon the responsibility of the Minister and not of the draftsman who drew the Bill. The draftsman is the servant of the Minister, he receives his instructions from the Minister, no discretion is given him, he is not allowed to make any alteration except under the superintendence of the Minister, and I say that the Minister who brings in the Bill is responsible for the faults of the Bill. He may of course blame the draftsman if he does not follow his instructions, but the draftsman, I repeat, is not responsible to this House or to the other House in the slightest degree.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Perhaps your Lordships will allow me to say to my noble and learned Friend that he appears to have in his mind some particular draftsman who has been assailed by the words I used, and that that person occupies some kind of official position. The noble and learned Lord is entirely mistaken. When I spoke of the draftsman I did not mean the Government draftsman; as a matter of fact the Act that I have most reason to complain of was introduced by a private Member, and when I spoke of the draftsman I used a convenient phrase for the purpose of referring to the person under whose superintendence it was drafted and whose drafting was deficient. I have no doubt that the Government draftsmen are extremely useful; some of them have invented an ingenious system, to which I think my noble Friend at the head of the Government referred the other day when he said that it rendered legislation more expeditious,—I am not convinced that it is to the benefit of the Houses of Parliament that they should not always understand the legislation that they pass, although I admit that it facilitates legislation,—whether it improves it or not is another question. I only rose, however, to assure the noble Lord that I was not speaking of any particular draftsman,—the author of the Bill would be equally good for my purpose; and I assure the noble Lord that what I said had no personal application to any particular draftsman.

LORD THRING: My Lords, I did not for a moment imagine that the noble and learned Lord was attacking the noble Lord now addressing your Lordships; on the contrary, I have never experienced anything but the greatest courtesy from the noble and learned Lord. Far be it from me to think that he would condescend for a moment to attack me. But what I did say and what I again repeat is, that it has been the custom of late years to say that the draftsman has done so and so,—and whether you use the term "the draftsman" or "the author" of the Bill it is immaterial. If the noble and learned Lord means by the author of the Bill the Minister in charge of the Bill then it is right; but if he means by the author of the Bill the subordinate gentlemen, one of whom I was, who drew the Bill, I say it is wrong. I recollect some 25 years ago Sir Cornewall Lewis said in the House of Commons when the draftsman was attacked, what ought to be said on every occasion: "I do not know what you mean by the draftsman; he acts under my orders and I am responsible for every word he draws." But, my Lords, I had not the slightest idea that the noble Lord intended to attack me—such a thought never entered my mind.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

PUBLIC AUTHORITIES PROTECTION
BILL [H.L.]

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading, read.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, this is a Bill which practically is a Statute Law Revision Bill, although it cannot go to the Statute Law Revision Committee, with the purpose of which your Lordships are now familiar. It is a Bill to collect together in one Act, and where necessary to amend, a very large number of Statutes which at present exist for the protection of persons exercising powers under the law which may sometimes expose them to be the subjects of litigation afterwards. I need hardly say more in recommendation of the Bill than this, that the titles of the numerous Statutes upon the subject actually occupy more than eight folio pages, and that the effect of all that eight pages is comprehended in two sections of the Bill. That is a very desirable thing to do if it is properly done, and I hope at a later stage of the Bill to satisfy your Lordships that it is properly done. That is the sole technical operation of the Bill, and if it accomplishes the object with which it is designed your Lordships will probably think that that is a sufficient explanation of its provisions.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read 2^a."

—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

House adjourned at Five o'clock.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): Before the hon. Member proceeds with his protest, I beg to ask you, Sir, whether it is in order, seeing that it now appears for the first time in the Paper in the hon. Member's name it having stood before in the name of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. S. T. Evans)?

MR. SPEAKER: It would be hyper-criticism on my part if I were to take any objection, seeing that it is precisely the same Motion as on the previous occasion was deferred.

*(3.10.) MR. D. THOMAS: I rise, Sir, to move the Motion which stands in my name, and which, until a few moments ago, I had hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree to. It will be remembered that the Bill was referred to a Hybrid Committee at the instance of my hon. Friend the Member for Merionethshire (Mr. Ellis), and, so far as I understand it was the intention of the House in so referring it that on the Committee the interests of all the localities concerned should be represented. But, so far as Wales is concerned, that intention has not been carried out. The interests of Birmingham are well represented by an hon. Member whose name is on the back of the Bill (Mr. Powell Williams), and by the hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. P. Stanhope), whose constituents are more or less directly concerned, while there is on the Committee a representative of the interests of London. But there is not a single Member who can be regarded as in any way representing the interests of the Radnor district or of Wales. I know that the House is jealous of interference with the work of Committees upstairs, but I would point out that we raise no question up-the subject-matter of the Bill; the Motion has reference only to the constitution of the Committee, and, so far as I can gather, opposition to our Motion comes solely and entirely from those who are promoting the passage of the Bill. The Motion would, I believe, meet with general acceptance on both sides of the House but for the opposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain). Now from what I understand, the intention is in the appointment of these Committees that the Committee of Selection shall appoint Members who are beyond all question impartial, and that the other Members should be appointed by the House as representing the different interests and localities with which the Bill deals, men who are more or less specialists in regard to the particular Bill. By way of illustration, I may perhaps be allowed to mention that a short time ago a Hybrid Committee was appointed to consider the Belfast Corporation Bill, and upon that Committee opposing interests were amply represented in the persons of Mr. Sexton and Mr. Knox, Mr. T. W. Russell and Sir Edward Harland. Now, I do not know on what the right hon. Gentlemen the Member for West Birmingham bases his objection. Possibly he may say the Committee has been sitting for some days and has taken evidence. But that is not our fault. But for his objection the two Members would have been added long ago. A Hybrid Committee in its rules of procedure differs materially from an ordinary Select Committee to which Private Bills are submitted. On an ordinary Committee hon. Members have to be present from the outset and to sit the whole time, but in the case of a Committee such as this, Members come and go as they please. More than this, I may say the evidence given so far has been to show the need of Birmingham for a better water supply, with which point we do not wish to deal, while we do wish to have on the Committee some Member who knows something about this area of 70 square miles affected by the Bill, and the interests of the people within that area.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the number of Members on the Select Committee be increased from nine to eleven, and that Mr. Thomas Ellis and one Member to be nominated by the Committee of Selection be added to the Committee." — (Mr. D. Thomas.)

(3.15.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I think the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down does not understand my position in this matter. He seems to think I am opposed to the representation of Wales on the Committee; but I can assure him that is an entire mistake as I think I could show if I were to mention what has passed in private between myself and Welsh Members on this subject. But I do object very much to the Resolution, both the manner in which it is proposed, and the time at which it is moved. Will the House allow me to quote very briefly the facts of the case? This Bill is promoted by the Birmingham Corporation, and in an ordinary way would have been referred to the usual Select Committee. The Welsh Members desired a special Hybrid Committee, and the Corporation willingly consented to the demand. Accordingly, at the instigation of the Welsh Members, in order to satisfy the Welsh Members, a Hybrid Committee was appointed and constituted, according to the Resolution moved, of five Members nominated by the House, and four by the Committee of Selection. Now with the selection made of the Committee I, of course, have nothing to do, but as regards the nominations by the House, I say it was the business of the Welsh Members if they wanted the appointment of a particular Member, to make the representation usual in such cases to secure his nomination. If the hon. Member for Merionethshire (Mr. T. Ellis) had been nominated, though he may be regarded as a strong partisan, he having moved the rejection of the Bill, still I would not have thought it my duty to make the slightest objection, and, indeed, I should be glad if he attended the meetings of the Committee, that he might see how groundless are some of the points of opposition he took. But hon. Members did not take that course. Not only did they fix the number of the Committee by Resolution, but when the nominations were moved in the House they moved no Amendment—they made no objection to any of the names, or expressed any desire to substitute a name as we might have supposed they would have done if they had cared for the matter. This is an entire afterthought. I think the hon. Members are entirely out of court; the time for their action was when the Committee was being appointed, and is not now after the Committee has been appointed, has sat some days, and has taken evidence. Although I think that is really a sufficient ground for objection, and although I think this Motion now is extremely unusual, if not unprecedented, still if there is any strong feeling on the part of Welsh Members that they are not represented on the Committee as they desire to be, I make now the same offer in public I have already made in private, if they consider there should be an addition to the Committee, and if the Chairman of the Committee takes no exception—for really I think he is the person who ought to be consulted—if he makes no objection to the addition, I will not object provided I am allowed to nominate a Member to equalise the votes. That I think is perfectly fair. It is a monstrous proposition that Welsh Members should be allowed to pack this Committee by adding two gentlemen pledged and known beforehand to be hostile to the principle of the Bill. It is an extremely unfair and unreasonable proposition—

*MR. D. THOMAS: May I explain that we have no desire to pack the Committee? We propose that only one Member shall be nominated by us, and the other by the Committee of Selection.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: That is all very well, but what is the meaning of the second proposal of the hon. Gentleman?

*MR. D. THOMAS: The second Motion was put down to meet the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am very sorry there should be any misunderstanding as to my wishes, but the hon. Gentleman does not flatter me very much in supposing that I should accept these as impartial nominations. He gives me credit for little intelligence if he thinks I could accept such a proposition. But we have now only to discuss the question of the nomination of the hon. Member for Merionethshire, and a nomination by the Committee of Selection. That is a Motion for the appointment of a gentleman who undoubtedly is a partisan. I do not use the word in any invidious sense; he has pledged himself against the Bill. Then another gentleman is to be appointed by the Committee of Selection who is to be a thoroughly impartial person. Well, I say that is not a fair proposition. If hon. Gentleman desire to appoint a partisan then at least there should be another appointed from the other side. Welsh Members have really a small interest in the Bill, and I am sure their constituents will be very dissatisfied if the Bill is lost in consequence of the action of their Representatives. One other objection I have and that is on the point of time when this Motion is made. The hon. Member says the delay is due to me, but that is not so at all. It is due in the first place to Welsh Members not making up their minds until some time after the Committee had been appointed, until it had actually met and received evidence. The first proposition was not made until the Committee had held two meetings, and the proposition had to stand over because it was out of order, and as you, Sir, ruled, it was a question not as between Welsh Members and myself, but as between Welsh Members and the House. Three of the Corporation witnesses have been examined and under the circumstances I think it would be extremely inconvenient to have new Members now added to the Committee. At all events unless the Members for Wales are willing to accept the suggestion I have made with a view to balance and harmony in the composition of the Committee that I should be allowed to select another Member after their nomination, I shall certainly oppose this Motion.

*(3.24.) MR. OSBORNE MORGAN (Denbighshire, E.): The right hon. Gentleman says the interest of Welsh Members in the Bill is small, but I should have thought that if there was one part of the United Kingdom which ought to be represented on such a Committee it would be the locality from which the water is proposed to be taken. The right hon. Gentleman has raised two objections. First, he says this Motion comes too late, but surely there he is hypercritical. His objection is a merely technical one. Besides, the right hon. Gentleman says that it is a partisan who is now nominated, but that is an objection that may be urged against any appointment to a Hybrid Committee of this kind. Birmingham is represented on the Committee by two partisan Members.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : No ; the hon. Member for Wednesbury does not represent Birmingham.

*MR. OSBORNE MORGAN : Well, all that is asked is that the Member representing Birmingham (Mr. Powell Williams) should be balanced by a Member representing the district in Wales from which the water is proposed to be taken, the hon. Member for Merionethshire with another Member not necessarily a partisan. The hon. Member for Denbigh (Mr. Kenyon), whose name is mentioned in the second Motion, has no interest in the matter any more than I have. It seems to me the objection taken by the right hon. Gentleman is quite unworthy of him, and if he has any desire to cultivate the goodwill of Welshmen, in whom he has lately taken a special interest, he should be the last man to take objection to this nomination. If my hon. Friend goes to a Division I shall certainly support him.

*(3.25.) MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire) : I regret that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. J. Chamberlain) should have laid stress on the partisan argument. It is difficult not to feel that the right hon. Gentleman himself occupies a partisan position, and he has enormous power and advantage therein. The partisanship of the Welsh Members simply goes so far as the desire that the locality which is undoubtedly greatly affected by the Bill should have representation on the Committee, and that claim is, I think, founded on fairness and justice. The charge of packing the Committee does not apply to the present Motion ; it would be more reasonably applied to the right hon. Gentleman himself, who desires that the House should place in his hands the right to nominate a Member. If the expression can be applied at all fairly it applies to such a proposition as that. I can assure the House that we have no intention of packing the Committee, nor do we desire to introduce the Welsh question more than is necessary. We rest our case on the fact that a large district in the Principality is affected by the Bill, and that local interest should have direct representation on the Committee. The actual Member for the constituency in which the district is included is precluded from taking any active part in the proceedings because he is the son of a petitioner. The right hon. Gentleman says we should have made our proposal before the Committee met, and that we ought to have made our objection to the nominations by the Committee of Selection.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : No ; I said the proper course would have been to have made a representation in the usual way, and then the proper course would have been to have proposed an Amendment when the names were moved in the House.

*MR. STUART RENDEL : I do not know whether it would be in Order to refer to the course Welsh Members did take privately. In the sense indicated they did take steps they thought were right.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : There should have been a nomination in the House.

*MR. STUART RENDEL : It is for us now to consider how the Committee is constituted. That is the question raised by my hon. Friend's Motion. Birmingham is directly represented twice over. Wednesbury is interested in the Bill. That town comes within the scope and purpose of the Bill, and thus two Members directly represent the interest of the promoters of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman says he does not know what the opinion of the Chairman of the Committee is ; but I have authority for saying that his personal opinion—I do not say the opinion of the Committee, which has not been ascertained or expressed—has all along been that it would be much better if a Welsh Member or two were appointed, and the Committee would be strengthened in its inquiry thereby. I hope we may come to an agreement with the right hon. Gentleman. I did my utmost to discountenance the cry of Welsh water for Wales when started in opposition to the Bill, and I asserted that any attempt to create a prejudice in the Principality against the withdrawal of water from Wales to meet the necessities of large populations in England would not find support from responsible Representatives of Wales. We are not here in a partisan position, but if it should happen that so large and important a scheme should be sanctioned by a Committee, upon which no representation of the area concerned had a place, there would be an unfortunate disposition to cavil at the decision of the Committee, which it is most undesirable to create.

(3.34.) THE CHAIRMAN OF WAYS AND MEANS (Mr. COURTNEY, Cornwall, Bodmin): I confess I regretted to find that no Welsh Member was appointed to this Committee, but I agree with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham that hon. Members who desired that representation should have taken action when they saw the names upon the Paper, they should have proposed the substitution of a name for one of those agreed to. It is now proposed to add two more Members, but that, I think, is a most undesirable course to take. The more Members you add to a Committee the less responsibility there is on each individual Member. A Hybrid Committee has some advantages, but it has also this disadvantage—that there is not upon each Member that sense of responsibility in forming a judgment that there is on each Member of a Committee of four. I think it is extremely undesirable to add more Members and to alter the balance of the nominations by the Committee of Selection. But is it too late now to adopt the course which should have been taken in the first place? Is it possible to secure the services of the hon. Member for Merionethshire in substitution of some other Member? It has been said that the interest of the promoters is represented by two Members, the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Powell Williams) and the hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. P. Stanhope).

MR. D. THOMAS: That substitution has been refused.

Mr. Stuart Rendel

MR. COURTNEY: Well, it is not quite clear. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Wednesbury clings to the honour of appointment to the Committee. If he could be induced to retire then the difficulty would be at an end.

MR. P. STANHOPE (Wednesbury): I do not represent Birmingham. There are other interests than those of Birmingham it is desirable to have represented on the Committee. I am not aware that any argument has been brought forward why those other interests should not be represented. I feel bound to say, having regard to my colleagues on the Committee upstairs, that every possible interest of the Welsh people in the district affected by the scheme will be carefully considered and safeguarded by the existing Committee.

MR. COURTNEY: Well, then, I fear that my efforts at an arrangement will be unavailing. I do, however, strongly object to an addition to the number of Members on the Committee, and think there are serious reasons against it.

(3.38.) SIR H. HUSSEY VIVIAN (Swansea, District): I am surprised that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham should appear to think that Wales has a very small interest in this matter. I took occasion to address a few words to the House when this question was first considered, and I pointed out that this is a matter of vast importance to Wales, having in view the vast populations springing up who will look to the watershed of the Bristol Channel as their source of supply. I look forward with great dread to this abstraction of water from the watershed of the Bristol Channel. If the Birmingham Corporation wants another source of water supply, let them seek it where they will not infringe on the natural claims of another large population. I altogether take exception to the statement that Wales has a small interest in this matter. We have a very large and increasing interest in this water supply, and hereafter it will be of vast importance to our population. It cannot be denied that Wales has a right to representation on this Committee. I am sure the House desires to do justice in a matter of this kind and will not be bound by what I must say is a technical objection on the part of the Chairman of Ways and Means. It may not be, in the ordinary course of business, quite regular to make the addition to the Committee now, but I cannot doubt that the House will recognise the justice of the demand that Wales should have representation on the Committee. This is not what the right hon. Member for Birmingham calls it—a monstrous proposition—it is simply a claim founded on justice. Whether the proposition should have been made earlier or not is a purely technical point I will not discuss. If there has been some lapse, some fault committed, I do not think we should therefore do an injustice when there is means open to avoid it. When we are to have 70,000 acres of watershed taken from Wales, can it be said that Wales, is not interested in the matter? No; I am quite sure that cannot be said. The wants of Welsh populations must be safeguarded, and in the most earnest manner I ask the House to grant our request that a Welsh Member may be added to this Committee. I do not know that I should be saying too much if I characterised the suggestion of my right hon. Friend the Member for West Birmingham as a monstrous proposition that he should be allowed to nominate another Member of the Committee to balance the Member we desire the House to add. I do not know that in all my Parliamentary experience I ever heard an individual Member make such a claim, and I must protest against such an altogether new departure in our practice. This Hybrid Committee was resolved upon in order that all interests might be fairly represented. We have on the Committee a direct Representative of Birmingham, and another Member representing a constituency jointly interested with Birmingham in obtaining the water supply, and we have London represented. Why? Because London also sets up a claim to abstract water from Wales, a claim which I do most strongly protest against. Let them go where they will for their water supply, but not to the Bristol Channel watershed, which we want for our own population. We shall have in the future all we can do to meet the needs of the rapidly increasing population of Glamorganshire, and I say “Hands off the Bristol Channel watershed.” Indeed it will become a very serious matter. We may not live to meet the difficulty, but those who come after us will be astonished to think that we deliberately sacrificed the water supply we had at hand.

(3.45.) SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): I supported the Motion for a Hybrid Committee because I thought that every interest ought to be represented on that Committee; but this cannot be said to be done when a large interest in the Principality is not directly represented on the Committee. I think it is hardly fair for the right hon. Gentleman to object to the nomination of the hon. Member for Merionethshire because he is a partisan, seeing that the hon. Member's Motion had support from both sides of the House. I quite supposed that the hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. A. Morley) would have included the name of the hon. Member for Merionethshire or that of some other Welsh Member in the nominations for the Committee, and it was with considerable surprise I found the hon. Member's name was not included. I have received some seven or eight letters from the Principality commenting on the fact, and I thought it a little strange that the name of the hon. Member was not moved in the House. I hope the proposal to add two Members now will be accepted, and I do not think there ought to be great objection to that as a compromise. In the interest of a full inquiry I think there ought to be this representation on the Committee.

(3.47.) MR. A. J. WILLIAMS (Glamorgan, S.): I do hope the House will deal with this question in a spirit of fairness and common sense, uninfluenced by any technical objection. What does it matter that through some inadvertence Wales has not had a Representative appointed on this Hybrid Committee? Here we have a remedy at hand for this inadvertence. Two important admissions have been made which go to support the Motion. My hon. Friend (Mr. Stuart Rendel) has told us that the Chairman of the Committee has expressly stated that it is desirable that a Welsh Member should be upon this Committee; and I think it must be obvious, upon a question like this, affecting a large area and future water supply for Wales, that a Welshman should be there not as a partisan. I repudiate the idea that a Member who is appointed to a Committee goes to his duties as merely a servile partisan, and I am perfectly sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Merionethshire would render the greatest assistance to the inquiry as a local expert. We have had also the admission from the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Courtney) that he thinks it is desirable that Wales should have representation on the Committee; but he is trammelled by the technical objection that it is undesirable, after the Committee has been struck, that we should make additions to it. But I cannot see how the convenience of the Committee can be detrimentally affected. Even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has no valid objection outside his special pleading and technical ground. I hope the House will not for a moment entertain the idea that the right hon. Gentleman should nominate another Member. I appeal to the House to deal with this matter as a question of common sense and fairness, to disregard the special pleading of the right hon. Gentleman, and to rectify an error which at the outset was committed in the nominations.

(3.50.) Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I can appreciate the reasons which induce the desire to have Wales represented on the Committee, but I cannot understand why this proposal was not made earlier. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham has had no answer to that. Now, two propositions have been made to my hon. Friends, both fair ones; one that a Welsh Member should be substituted for a sitting Member, and the other that in addition to the hon. Member for Merionethshire, the Birmingham Corporation should have another nomination to preserve the balance. Now, although it has been said that my hon. Friend would not enter upon his duties on the Committee as a partisan, we are perfectly well aware, and I am not blaming him for taking the course he thought right, that my hon. Friend has expressed an opinion against the Bill in the strongest possible way, by moving the rejection of the Bill when it was before the House. In that sense, therefore, he must be considered a partisan, and it is only right that if he becomes a Member of the Committee another Member in the interest of the promoters should be added. Why the proper opportunity was not taken to add a Welsh Member to the Committee I do not understand, but I am bound to say the proposal being made now cuts at the whole system of appointment of Hybrid Committees, and I must vote against the Motion.

(3.53.) Mr. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): As I understand, the reason why hon. Members for Wales did not move the appointment in the first instance was because they were under the impression that the Committee of Selection would secure the representation of all interests, and so they did not occupy the time of the House with any Motion on the subject. It has been urged that if a partisan Member is added from the one side then a partisan should be added from the other side. But is it not the fact that there are at this moment two Birmingham partisans on the Committee? In the first place there is the hon. Member who represents South Birmingham (Mr. Powell Williams), whose name is on the back of the Bill. That he is a partisan must be admitted. Then there is my hon. Friend the Member for Wednesbury (Mr. P. Stanhope). My hon. Friend claims that he is not a partisan for Birmingham; but let me explain what is the position of Wednesbury in regard to this Bill. By this Bill Wednesbury will have an option to take or not to take from this water which is to be brought from Wales to Birmingham. Of course, any community would be in favour of getting such an option for nothing, and my hon. Friend's constituents will naturally expect my hon. Friend to vote in favour of this scheme. I confess I was surprised at the conclusion of the speech of the Chairman of Committees. It seemed to me he began by being strongly in favour of Welsh representation on the Committee, but he is going to vote against a Welsh Member being appointed because he says it is too late to make the addition.

MR. COURTNEY: That was not my substantial reason.

MR. LABOUCHERE: The right hon. Gentleman gave no substantial reason; that is what I complain of.

MR. COURTNEY: I objected to the addition of partisan Members in undue proportion.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then I hope the right hon. Gentleman will vote in favour of this proposition, for he will observe there are two partisan Members in the interest of the promoters of the Bill on the Committee. All that is demanded is that a Member representing Welsh interests shall be appointed—a gentleman competent to look after the interests of the people in the district from which the water is to be taken. After all, though my hon. Friend from his knowledge of the subject may have an advantage over other Members on the Committee, he will only have one vote, and there will be always two against him. I really think that in this matter we should not allow technicalities to hinder us from what seems to me an act of justice to this Welsh district.

(3.57) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): I think rather poor excuses have been offered for Welsh Members not making this Motion earlier. There was the opportunity when the Motion for nomination was before the House, and the substitution of one name for another could have been moved as an Amendment. The hon. Member for Wednesbury cannot be considered a partisan in favour of the Bill. The interests of Wednesbury are to a large extent distinct from and opposed to the interests of Birmingham; there is the interest of a large Water Company established. The partisanship unexpressed of the hon. Member for Wednesbury would not be a counterbalance to the hon. Member for Merionethshire, who throughout expressed his opposition to the Bill. It seems to me this proposal should have been made at the right time when the Committee was being formed. To make such an addition now will be to introduce a most undesirable innovation in connection with the formation of Hybrid Committees. Moreover, the Committee has been sitting three days, and most important evidence has been given on behalf of the Corporation. It would be scarcely fair that an avowed opponent of the Bill should have a voice in the decision, he not having heard the strongest evidence in support of the Bill. Two fair proposals have been made to Welsh Members; one fails through the unwillingness of the hon. Member for Wednesbury to withdraw from the Committee; but the other still remains open—the proposal that with the nomination of the hon. Member for Merionethshire my right hon. Friend should have a nomination on behalf of the Corporation. The hon. Member for Glamorganshire admitted frankly that if a Welsh Member were put on the Committee he should be what the hon. Member called “balanced” in some way. This question is being argued as if Wales had a predominant interest in this matter. On precisely the same grounds all the counties from which the water supply comes should also be represented on the Committee. The hon. Member for Wednesbury (Mr. P. Stanhope) has declared that ample provision was made when the Hybrid Committee was appointed. We thought that provision would satisfy everyone; it satisfied the hon. Member opposite so that he withdrew all opposition. That provision was that all interests—Welsh as well as every other—should be fully represented before the Committee, and it was thought at that time that the promoters had given every advantage to the opponents of the Bill. But after evidence has been taken for three or four days before the Committee this extraordinary proposal is made. Wales, instead of being a sufferer by the works contemplated in the Bill, will be the greatest possible gainer, and the Welsh people all round the neighbourhood know that. I hope the House will remember that there is the interest of half a million of people to be considered who are threatened, at no very distant future, with a water famine, to prevent which this Bill has been brought forward. Every possible concession has been made to the opponents of the Bill, Every concession which we thought would conciliate them, and now we have this innovation, unprecedented in relation to Parliamentary Committees.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I think it cannot be denied that this is an innovation, as my hon. Friend says. What are the facts? There is a conflict of advantage between Birmingham and Wales, or apparently so, and it is contended that Birmingham has one or two Members on the Committee who are likely to put the case as strongly as possible for Birmingham, and bring out all the facts in its favour. My hon. Friend below me asks that there should also be on the Committee one gentleman who will be so keenly interested that he will take special trouble to bring out the special facts advantageous to the district of Wales specially concerned. That seems a very reasonable suggestion, and one which the House might accept. I think there will be no objection to that, though some objection has been taken to naming a Member on the other side. I should be willing for any Member of the House—the right hon. Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain), or another—to nominate a Member whom they think would be a desirable Member of the Committee. If that would meet the objection that has been taken, and prevent the House further considering this matter, I may say, I think it would be satisfactory to the hon. Members concerned.

MR. STUART RENDEL (Montgomeryshire): I understand that the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. W. James) is willing to allow his name to be withdrawn from the Committee for the purpose of allowing that of the hon. Member for Merioneth (Mr. T. E. Ellis) to be added. I move that the hon. Member for Gateshead be discharged from the Committee, and that the hon. Member for Merioneth—

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member cannot move that now; he must give notice of the Motion.

MR. W. JAMES (Gateshead): I should be glad to be relieved from my duties on the Committee, as I have many other engagements; but I accepted nomination, as I understood that the Chairman desired that I should serve.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I should make no objection to that arrangement if it meets the approval of the House.

DR. CAMERON (Glasgow, College): The hon. Member for Gateshead was nominated by the Committee of Selection, and can only be displaced by the Committee of Selection. The principle which regulates the action of the Committee of Selection is that while the House puts on partisans, the Committee of Selection puts on impartial and judicial men. It would be utterly impossible for a compact of the House to bind the Committee of Selection. If anything of that kind is to be done it would be necessary that the nomination should be by the House direct, and the Committee of Selection should be relieved from the necessity of filling up the place vacated by the hon. Member for Gateshead.

*MR. D. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydvil): If I could have any guarantee that the Committee would nominate the hon. Member for Merioneth in the place of the hon. Member for Gateshead, I would have no objection to withdrawing my Motion; but as there is no such guarantee forthcoming I must press the Motion to a Division.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 120; Noes 150—(Div. List No. 65.)

*MR. D. THOMAS: I beg to give notice that I shall to-morrow move that the hon. Member for Gateshead be discharged from serving on the Committee, and that the hon. Member for South Glamorgan be nominated in his stead.

*MR. SPEAKER: I look with extreme jealousy on the House interfering with the Committee of Selection by discharging a Member who has been appointed by that Committee. That Committee is specially deputed by the House to make choice of Members to serve; but perhaps an amicable arrangement can be come to between the House and the Committee of Selection.

QUESTIONS.

THE WEARING OF EMBLEMS IN THE ARMY.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has yet satisfied himself of the existence of a custom in the Northumberland Fusiliers of parading on St. George's Day, in uniform wearing, by order of the Colonel, a red and a white rose in his buttonhole, and that Irish, Scotch, and Englishmen are obliged to comply with this order under penalty for disobedience; and whether he will either prohibit the wearing of all national and Party emblems, or allow members of all nationalities to wear their respective favours on national occasions, subject to a General Order to the contrary, and for special reasons, at the discretion of the Commanding Officer?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Lincoln): The red and white rose, which the hon. Member will see by the Army List, is one of the badges of the Northumberland Fusiliers, and I find it has been the custom since 1675 for the members of the regiment to wear them on St. George's Day. The custom has no political bearing, and the Commander-in-Chief sees no reason for giving the order indicated in the other part of the question.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: May I ask if the hon. Gentleman thinks the shamrock has any political bearing, and does he see any reason why Irishmen should not be allowed to wear it in the same manner as the regiment referred to?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I see no reason why permission is given by the Commanding Officer.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): Is the Commanding Officer or the Adjutant-General to wear the shamrock on St. Patrick's Day?

MR. E. STANHOPE: I do not know.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to give notice that on the Army Estimates I will call attention to this matter.

ACCESS TO STATE PAPERS.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Mr. Fitzpatrick, author of the recently published work, The Secret Service Fund under Pitt, had access to the State Papers in Dublin Castle; and whether there is any objection to allow Mr. Fitzpatrick to pursue his investigations, in order to give the history of the Secret Service Fund up to 1886?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): It is the case that the gentleman mentioned had access to certain State Papers under the Regulations of the State Paper Department, whereby historians are granted permission to refer to certain records with the permission of the Keeper of the State Papers. This permission is limited to records of the age of 50 years from the making thereof, and it would therefore not be possible to give the permission suggested in the second paragraph of the question.

MR. MAC NEILL: Are regulations given to the Castle officials for the preservation of State Papers?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): They are kept under the Records Act of 1877.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: If permission is limited to Papers 50 years old, how is it possible to get particulars of the administration of the Fund under the right hon. Member for Derby (Sir W. V. Harcourt)?

MR. MADDEN: I must ask the hon. Gentleman to postpone the question for 50 years.

TARGET FIRING AT SEA.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.) (for Mr. FLYNN, Cork, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War, in reference to the Military Lands Consolidation Bill, whether he is aware that the Cork Harbour Commissioners have made frequent complaints to the commanding officer of Cork district of the danger caused to navigation in and off Cork Harbour by the practice of target firing from Forts Camden and Carlisle; and is he aware that complaints of the danger incurred from this practice have frequently been made by yachtsmen and masters of vessels using Cork Harbour; and, if so, whether any special provisions will be introduced by the War Department in the Bill to prevent injury being done to the trade and other interests of Cork Harbour?

SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Section 15 of the Military Lands Consolidation Bill raises questions of great importance to fishermen, coasting traders, and others, and that their grievances are being investigated by the Committee recently appointed to report on target practice seawards; and whether he will, under the circumstances, postpone the appointment of the Select Committee until he receives the Report of the Target Practice Seawards Committee?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: In answer to the hon. Member opposite, I would say that is a subject which will be fully considered by the Committee on Target Practice Seawards, and I would rather express no opinion on the subject till that Committee reports. In answer to my hon. Friend behind me, I am not aware how soon it is probable that the Committee on Target Practice Seawards will be able to report; but I am quite willing to postpone the Military Lands Consolidation Bill for a reasonable time, so long as we do not run the risk of losing it for the Session, as it is desirable in the public interest that the law should be made clear. Section 15 makes no change in the existing law, and in no way prejudices the inquiry upon which he is engaged.

SIR E. BIRKBECK: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that under Clause 15 questions are raised affecting the coasting trade and fishing industry?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: That is one of the subjects referred to the Committee.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): Will the right hon. Gentleman say who compose the Committee, where it sits, and whether they will examine witnesses whom hon. Members of this House may think desirable?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The Committee was appointed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade, and I cannot at once give the names of all the Members. I imagine the places where they sit are suggested by the Committee themselves.

MAJOR BANES (West Ham, S. Major RASCH, Essex, S.E.): I ask the Secretary of State for whether he will give the Essex fishermen facilities for giving evidence to the Target Practice Seawards Committee, as their trade will be seriously affected by the proposed partial closing of the fishing grounds off Sheerness.

MR. E. STANHOPE: This is a matter for the Committee itself to decide; but I have no doubt the case of all fishermen said to be affected by acts of this description will be considered by them.

A MISSING POST PARCEL

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that a registered letter and a registered parcel, posted at Huddersfield, Torkard, Notts, in December last, addressed to Mdlle. De Saint Roche Vilaine, Morbihan, France, have gone astray; and whether there is any expectation of recovering them, and, if not, will the owner be compensated?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.): The case of the parcel is under investigation. The correspondent in the case makes no mention of a registered letter.

MR. J. H. PAYNE'S ESTATE, BALLINHASSIG, COUNTY CORK.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. FLYNN): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether attention has been called to the case of the tenants recently evicted from the estate of Mr. J. H. Payne, J.P., Ballinhassig, County Cork; and if so, what number of years' purchase of the valuation was sanctioned by the Land Purchase Commission; and whether many tenants have been evicted by the Land Purchase Commission since the purchase of the estate was sanctioned, and is he aware that the farm of the purchasing tenants was put up for sale in March, 1891, by the Land Purchase Commission, but that no one was found to purchase the tenant's interest?

Mr. Sexton

and, if so, what steps do the Purchase Commission intend to take?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Irish Land Commission report that they are not aware of any evictions on the estate of Mr. J. H. Payne; but the question probably refers to the case of a tenant-purchaser named Daniel Kelly. This tenant held under a judicial rent of £30. His purchase money was £500, or about 17 years' purchase of the judicial rent, and the annuity payable in respect thereof was £20—i.e., a reduction of 33 per cent. as compared with the judicial rent he had previously to pay. This holding was put up for sale by the Commissioners on the 4th March, 1891, the tenant purchaser being in default for two instalments. There being no bidding the sale was adjourned; but in the following July the holding was sold for an amount sufficient to pay the arrears and expenses and subject to the annuity, which has since been regularly paid.

STOPPED MONEY ORDERS.

MR. COX (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that several Post Office orders, amounting in all to £85, were issued in London in the year 1886 in favour of a Mr. W. J. Paine, on Auckland Post Office, New Zealand; that inquiry was made there by Mr. Alexander Cairns, to whom the orders were handed by the payee, to know if he would be safe in cashing same, and he was informed that they were "as safe as the Bank of England," but could not be cashed by him (the postmaster) before receipt of the advice note; and that in the meantime the funds deposited in the London Post Office were withdrawn by the depositor; whether he is aware that Mr. Cairns lost the money which he had advanced on the faith of the Post Office orders issued here; and whether it is the practice to refund to the depositor on application, and without production of the Post Office order issued, the money so deposited?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The case referred to in the question is well-known to the Post Office, a question on it having been answered by my predecessor in 1890. The facts are these: A young man had been sent abroad by his relations with £100 in £5 money orders, most of which, however, for reasons of their own, the relations took the precaution of stopping. On his arrival at Auckland the young man had information that all the orders but one were stopped and repaid to the remitter, and that he would receive remittances for subsistence. He went to Mr. Cairns's Hotel and lived luxuriously, giving 17 stopped money orders to Mr. Cairns, who does not seem to have been very careful in the matter, or he would have tested the validity of the orders before much harm was done. The official papers do not indicate that Mr. Cairns was told at Auckland the orders were "as safe as the Bank of England;" and, as a matter of fact, a money order is not a negotiable security, the remitters in all cases having legal power to control the funds until such time as the orders are paid. It is not known that Mr. Cairns cashed any of the orders, or whether he eventually recovered any advance he may have made, or the cost of the young man's maintenance. It is not customary to repay to a remitter without production of the orders, because such production is usually the best proof of the right to repayment. But in the case in point, the remitter was well-known at the Money Order Office to have deposited the funds, and the stopped money orders were not required in proof.

THE REGISTRATION OF CHIMNEY SWEEPERS.

SIR J. COLOMB (Tower Hamlets, Bow, &c.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any general record is kept at the Home Office of chimney sweepers in England who, by reason of employing "journeymen assistants or apprentices," are compelled to take out annual certificates under the provisions of 38 & 39 Vic., c. 70; if so, whether he can state the number of such certificated chimney sweepers, and what proportion that number bears to the total number of chimney sweepers in England who, by reason of not employing "journeymen assistants or apprentices," are not required to take out certificates; whether the police authorities have any statutory power to refuse to grant or renew certificates to applicants who have been convicted of burglary, robbery, or theft; and whether he is aware that the United Chimney Sweeps' Protection Association strongly complain that persons convicted of burglary, robbery, or theft are allowed to pursue the trade or business of chimney sweeper?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): No general record of chimney sweepers who have to take out annual certificates is kept at the Home Office. The registers of certificates are, by the 14th section of the Chimney Sweepers' Act of 1875, required to be kept by chief officers of police. The register for the Metropolitan Police district is kept by the Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police, and shows that 190 chimney sweepers hold certificates, and that they employ 239 journeymen. In London the number of unregistered chimney sweepers is stated to be 984. The Home Office has no information as to the number of registered or unregistered chimney sweepers outside the Metropolis. It does not appear that the Act of 1875 enables police authorities to refuse to grant or renew certificates to any chimney sweeper who applies in proper form, pays the statutory fee, and has not been disqualified by a conviction under the Acts of 1840 and 1864, which were passed for the protection of young persons employed by chimney sweepers rather than of householders by whom chimney sweepers are employed. The complaint referred to in the third paragraph of the question has not been communicated either to the Commissioner of Police or the Home Office.

CRIMINAL LAW AND PROCEDURE (IRELAND) ACT, 1887.

MR. MACARTNEY (Antrim, S.): I beg, Sir, to postpone my question.

MR. MAC NEILL: Why? [Cries of "Put the Question!"]

MR. MACARTNEY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the number of persons now in prison in Ireland for offences under "The Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887," and also the number of persons in Ireland who are at the present time wholly or partially boycotted?

MR. JACKSON: On the 1st inst. there were five persons in custody under the Criminal Law and Procedure (Ireland) Act, 1887. They were convicted of riot and unlawful assembly. There are no persons either wholly or partially boycotted in Ireland at the present time.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask, Sir, if the administration of the Act has been going on, if it has been left inoperative because it was proved to be useless for its main purpose — that of securing tenants for evicted farms?

MR. MADDEN: No, Sir.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): Will the right hon. Gentleman name any single struggle with reference to which prosecutions were instituted under this Act which are not at present going on just as before, or have not notoriously concluded as victories for the tenants?

MR. MADDEN: I cannot argue the matter by way of answers to questions across the floor of the House. But in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Belfast as to whether this represents the usefulness or the uselessness of this Bill, I say unhesitatingly that it represents its usefulness.

MR. MAC NEILL: I should like to ask, Sir, if these figures have been specially prepared with a view to the General Election?

[No answer was given.]

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION OFFICE.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that there are at present upwards of 50 temporary clerks in the Irish Land Commission Office without Civil Service certificates, contrary to the Order in Council; whether it is contemplated to create these uncertificated clerks permanent clerks without any examination; why are not vacancies in the office of the Irish Land Commission filled from the Lower Division of the Civil Service; and why are not these clerkships thrown open to public competition, according to the practice adopted in filling up vacancies in clerk-

Sir J. Colomb

ships in the High Court of Justice in Ireland?

MR. JACKSON: In addition to the permanent staff there are at present temporarily employed in the Land Commission one Second Division clerk, 19 registered copyists, and 25 temporary clerks; the latter were employed when the services of the other registered copyists were not available. It is not proposed to make any of the uncertificated temporary clerks referred to permanent officers. It is understood that the Treasury do not propose to recruit the clerical staff of the Irish Land Commission in future from the Second Division of the Civil Service. Section 45 of the Act of 1881, and Section 20 of the Act of 1885, which regulate appointments to the Land Commission, are still in force as regards appointments to the general permanent staff, and when clerks for temporary purposes are required applications will be made in the first instance to the Civil Service Commissioners for registered copyists.

THE CASE OF MR. CLEARY.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that Mr. Cleary, the official in the Post Office, Dublin, who committed suicide under distressing circumstances, has left a widow and nine children almost destitute; whether, after working for upwards of a year from twelve to fourteen hours a day, he made application to the Post Office authorities for payment for extra hours, which he estimated at a sum of £54, but that no money on account of this claim was paid to him; whether during his 20 years' service in the postal department there had been any record against him till after his application for payment for extra hours; whether Cleary, having worked for many years as sorter in the American mail train between Dublin and Queenstown, was offered an indoor post in the General Post Office at a salary of £50 per annum less than the salary of his original appointment, on the understanding that his acceptance of the post would tend to promotion, and that when vacancies arose in the positions of senior officers he was passed over, although recommended by the senior superintendent; and whether, having regard to these circumstances, he will make some allowance to Cleary's family for his work over hours?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Mr. Cleary has left a widow and nine children, but, as I am informed, not destitute. As I have already stated, to three of these children employment has been given in the Dublin Post Office, and they earn between them 37s. a week. The remaining children are too young to be employed. There is no record of Mr. Cleary having worked twelve or fourteen hours a day, and there was no necessity for him to do so; but consisting as his work largely did of outdoor inquiries, the number of hours he took to perform it was very much in his own hands. In connection with this kind of work it is not usual to pay for overtime; and when, six years ago, Mr. Cleary asked to be so paid, his request was not complied with. There was no record against Mr. Cleary until June last, when he was censured for a trifling offence. Mr. Cleary was for several years employed as a sorter in the Dublin and Queenstown Traveling Post Office. In this capacity he received, over and above his wages, a trip allowance of 7s. a trip. In November, 1884, he was promoted to be overseer, when, as he ceased to make trips, his trip allowance ceased. As sorter his wages were 46s. a week, and as overseer he received wages of 52s., rising to 62s. The acceptance of this promotion by Mr. Cleary was optional, and of course there was no understanding or promise that further promotion should follow. In August, 1891, however, Mr. Cleary was promoted to the class of Clerks, and his salary was raised from 62s. a week (£161) to £170, rising to £190 a year. He appears to have expected promotion to the still higher position of assistant superintendent, but for this he was not recommended. There is no ground for making any retrospective payment on account of his service.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to give notice, Mr. Speaker, that on a future occasion I shall call attention to this cruel case.

THE SASINE OFFICE IN EDINBURGH.

Mr. BUCHANAN (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he will cause arrangements to be made to obviate the delay that has been complained of in the registration of writs in the Sasine Office in Edinburgh at the Whit Sunday and Martinmas terms?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I have to inform the hon. Member that a proposal for obviating delay in the registration of writs at the money terms, by a temporary increase in the staff, is under consideration.

THE ROYAL IRISH ACADEMY.

Mr. W. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what portion of the Parliamentary grant of £2,000 per annum to the Royal Irish Academy is devoted to the department of physical science, and what portion to that of national archæology?

SIR H. MAXWELL (A Lord of the Treasury) (Wigton) (who replied) said: The Parliamentary grant to the Royal Irish Academy is now £1,600, and not £2,000. I am informed that the portion of the grant allotted to physical science does not exceed £100 a year. About £1,000 of the grant may be said to be devoted to purposes connected with archæology.

HOLYHEAD HARBOUR.

Mr. LEWIS (Anglesey): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether the Government have come to any decision as to the removal of the Platters Rocks, in Holyhead Harbour, as requested by a deputation which appeared before the President of the Board of Trade in August, 1888; and, if so, what their decision is?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): Some time ago I suggested a plan which I thought might improve the accommodation in this harbour for the smaller class of vessels at a comparatively small cost; but this did not meet with sufficient support to justify the Government in proceeding with it, and I can only say that no definite decision has been come to on the subject.

SUB-CONTRACTS ON GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON (Tower Hamlets, Poplar): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that the contractor for the new sorting office at Paddington has sub-let a portion of the brickwork pointing; whether this sub-contracting was done with the approval of the Board; and, if so, on what grounds; and whether the assent of the Board was asked previous or subsequent to the sub-contract being made?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The only portion of the work referred to by the hon. Member which has been sub-let is the pointing of the glazed brickwork. I approved of this on the ground that this is a special kind of work, requiring to be done by experts. The men were paid 10d. an hour, instead of the common rate of 9d. The contractor did not obtain my consent until he had entered into the sub-contract, as the amount of work was so trifling that he was under the impression that it was hardly worth a special reference. In this, no doubt, he was wrong, and I have called his attention to the matter; but I did not, on that account, think it necessary to withhold an assent which I would certainly have given had it been asked for beforehand.

THE POSTAL TELEGRAPH FACTORY.

Mr. SYDNEY BUXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain why it is that, while the arbitration agreement between masters and men of 19th November, 1891, fixed the working time for carpenters and joiners at 51½ hours per week for 36 summer weeks and 47 for 16 winter weeks, the men employed at the Postal Telegraph Factory are expected to work 54 hours per week; whether he is aware that these conditions, and the other conditions of employment, prevent those carpenters and joiners who are members of trade unions bound by the terms of the arbitrator's award from seeking work at the Telegraph Factory; whether any complaints have been made to him on the subject, and whether two joiners were recently discharged because they refused to break the recognised rules of the trade by working longer hours; whether he is aware that the Board of Works, in a letter dated 24th December, 1891, have adopted for the men employed by them the working hours laid down in Rule 1 of the arbitrator's award; and whether he can see his way to follow the example thus set by another Department?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hours of work at the Telegraph Factory are uniform for the tradesmen employed, and not varying according to those worked elsewhere by those of similar trades in different circumstances. I am not aware that carpenters belonging to unions have been thereby debarred from seeking work at the factory, and no complaints on the subject have been received. The men referred to are believed to have been two of three who were parted with on the completion of a piece of work connected with the extra pressure at Christmas. Their discharge was not connected with the question of shorter hours. Having regard to the privileges of a fortnight's leave on full pay, and of an extra day at Christmas, which the carpenters in the factory enjoy in common with the other people there, their pay amounts to more than they would receive under the union pay rules, while the employment is steady and continuous. I believe that the circumstances of employment by the Board of Works differ from those in the Post Office Factory.

CLERKS IN THE CENSUS OFFICE.

MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden) for EARL COMPTON (York, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he will explain why, although temporary clerks in the Census Office, appointed after open competition in February, 1891, were informed that they would be placed on the same footing as clerks of the second division as regards holidays and sick leave, towards the end of the year the Registrar General gave instructions that pay during sick leave should be discontinued; and whether he will direct that the original promise to the temporary clerks, which was adhered to for about eight months, shall be fulfilled?

SIR H. MAXWELL (who replied) said: In the printed conditions of the competition for temporary clerkships in the Census Office no mention was made of leave or sick leave; and the temporary Census clerks were not informed, either by the Registrar General or with his authority, that they would be placed on the same footing as second division clerks in the matter of holidays and sick leave.

MR. JOHN CAREY'S PENSION.

MR. HARRISON (Tipperary, Mid) I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether the full rate of pension has been withheld from Mr. John Carey on his resignation of his duties as postman in and about Templemore, County Tipperary, owing to ill-health; if so, will he be prepared, in view of Mr. Carey's 24 years of faithful service, to recommend that he should in future receive the full rate?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Counting from the date of his permanent appointment—namely, the 11th of July, 1868, John Carey had served only 23 complete years, and in respect to this period he was granted the full pension of 23-60ths of his wages. Prior to the 11th of July, 1868, Carey served for about 13 months in a temporary capacity; but this does not count for pension.

THE CONGESTED DISTRICTS BOARD.

MR. COLLERY (Sligo, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board have received a resolution passed at a public meeting held in Sligo, and also one by the Grand Jury of the county, recommending among other things the establishment of a fish-curing station at Malaghmore, where a breakwater erected by the late Lord Palmerston exists; if the Congested Districts Board Inspectors have visited any portion of the county of Sligo, which has a coast line of about 60 miles, most of which has been scheduled under the Act; if he is aware that most of the scheduled district contains a very poor population, who live mainly by fishing, and that no fishery pier of any kind exists along the coast; and if he will use his influence with the Board to put the Act in practical operation in the county of Sligo?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Congested Districts Board have received copies of the Resolutions referred to, and the recommendations made at the meeting mentioned shall be carefully considered by the Board. Local inquiries have been directed by the Board, who now await the necessary Reports.

MEDICAL OFFICERS OF THE VOLUNTEERS.

COLONEL EYRE (Lincolnshire, Gainsborough): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether it is his intention to give effect to the recommendation of the Volunteer Medical Organisation Committee, 6th November, 1888, in Section 42,

"That the Medical Officers of the Volunteer Force should be placed on precisely the same footing as other Officers of the Volunteers regarding the distribution of honours and awards?"

*MR. E. STANHOPE: If the Volunteers ever take part in active service in the field they will be entitled to the same honours as the Regular Forces; but otherwise the only rewards now open to them are in consideration of long and efficient service in command of a corps.

DELAY IN THE LAND COURTS.

MR. COLLERY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state why the case of James Perry, of Crieve, Barony of Cremorne, and County of Monaghan, whose originating notice was served March, 1887, to fix a fair rent, has not been disposed of; if he is aware that the case was listed for hearing January, 1891, when, after waiting four days, the tenant was told by the Court his case would be heard in a few days, which has been extended to the present time, and not yet disposed of; and if there is any redress for the delay, expense, and inconvenience he has been subject to?

Mr. Collery

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Land Commissioners report that the originating notice in the case mentioned was dismissed by the Sub-Commission on 7th May, 1889. The tenant served a notice for re-hearing, and the case was listed in January, 1891, but the Commissioners were unable to reach it. The Commissioners point out that the tenant could not have been informed by the Court to effect stated in the question, inasmuch as the sittings in Monaghan were arranged to continue for one week only. The case will be listed in due course for the first appeal sitting for the district; but no date has yet been fixed.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (County Wick): The tenants have great reason to complain of the manner in which land costs are increased by the way in which cases are put at the end and held over.

MR. MADDEN: We will do what we can to give facilities for the hearing of cases.

THE INNISMURREY ISLAND PIER.

MR. COLLERY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what progress has been made with the pier that has been in course of construction on Innismurrey Island, County Sligo, and how much money has been expended on it; if it is intended to build a corresponding pier on the mainland to enable these people to land their boats; whether he is aware that there is no place at present where they can land except the rugged coast?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: In connection with the relief of distress last year works were undertaken on Innismurrey Island for the making of a breakwater and clearing away boulders. The total expenditure there, including the making of some bridle roads, was £437. A further sum of £150 is being expended in completion of the clearing of boulders. The Government have funds available for the purpose of building a pier on the mainland.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN THE MOUNTMELICK UNION.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can state how many labourers' cottages have been erected, or are in course of erection, in the Mountmellick Union; how long is it since those now in course of erection were first applied for by the labourers and ratepayers; what has been the entire expense of the working of the Labourers' Acts in the Union since 1883, and how much has been paid in law costs and for fees to Clerks of Works; whether there are any actions pending against the Guardians in connection with the working of the Act; if so, by whom, and for what amounts?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Local Government Board state that they have received a Report from the Clerk of the Mountmellick Union, from which it appears that there are 24 cottages erected and ten in course of erection. (2.) It is over six years since the latter were first applied for by the labourers and ratepayers. (3.) The entire expenses of the working of the Labourers' Acts in the Union from 1883 to the present date is £5,162, of which £652 has been paid in law costs and £103 for fees to Clerks of Works. There are two actions pending against the Guardians in connection with the working of the Acts—namely. one by Clerk of Works for £416 18s. 9d. and the other by a contractor for £94 5s. There was also a decree given against the Guardians at the Quarter Sessions at Maryborough on Friday last for £8 and costs for damage to a young horse by a barbed wire fence inclosing one of the labourers' plots.

PAPERS IN THE CHIEF SECRETARY'S OFFICE.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there is a general Index of the Papers connected with the Chief Secretary's Office, by whom is it prepared and how checked, and what are the arrangements for transferring these papers from time to time to the custody of the Keeper of the Public Records in Ireland?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The papers in the Chief Secretary's Office are registered, and indexed from day to day by the Registry staff. They are subsequently removed from time to time to the Record Tower under the provisions of the Public Records (Ireland) Act, 1867. When the records are 50 years old they are transferred to the Public Record Office.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I do not quite understand what is the check that prevents these papers from being destroyed.

MR. MADDEN: They are registered in due course.

EFFECTIVE SHIPS OF THE ROYAL NAVY.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table a Return giving a list of Her Majesty's ships fit for active service at sea, showing the dates at which they were respectively ordered, reported ready for sea, and first commissioned, together with the dates at which they have been paid out of commission and re-commissioned, and the stations and services upon which they have been employed down to the present time; also a similar list of ships which have been ordered during the last 25 years, and subsequently either sold, or broken up, or otherwise removed from the category of ships fit for active service at sea?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Return asked for would involve in its preparation very great clerical labour and considerable expense, nor is it quite clear for what object the Return is wished for. The hon. Gentleman will, however, find in Appendix 9 of the current year's Estimates particulars relating to the cost of every ship in the Navy arranged under the year of completion, and a further table giving the estimated annual rate of depreciation of the different classes of ships, and the annual amount of expenditure required for replacement.

MR. PICTON: I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is aware that ordinary Members of Parliament find it quite impossible to trace the history of ships in the Navy; and whether he is aware of any method by which ordinary Members of Parliament can obtain the information they desire?

LORD G. HAMILTON: As I have stated, the Return for which the hon.

Member has inquired would involve considerable time, trouble, and expense; but if the hon. Gentleman will come to me after the questions are over I will give him every information I can, and do whatever I can to meet his views.

THE DEATH OF P. W. NALLY.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is optional with Prison Governors in Ireland to allow or disallow prisoners to give evidence before a Coroner as to the cause of death within the prison and the prison treatment of a fellow-prisoner; and whether there is any precedent for the action of the Governor of Mountjoy Prison in withholding from the Coroner the knowledge that five witnesses were willing to give material evidence as to the cause of the death of the late Mr. P. W. Nally?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The hon. Gentleman, in the second paragraph of his question, requires information as to the ordinary course in such cases. I have not yet been able to obtain the information necessary to enable me to answer that question, and I must ask him to postpone it.

THE CASE OF JAMES MURPHY.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether James Murphy, now in Mountjoy Convict Prison, who was sentenced to ten years' penal servitude at the Winter Assizes of 1883 (Carrick-on-Shannon), is now entitled, according to the ordinary practice, to be released?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The General Prisons Board report that the convict referred to is undergoing a sentence of ten years' penal servitude imposed in December, 1884. In addition to this time he is also liable to serve a further period of 668 days, representing the remainder of a former sentence of penal servitude. Even if he had earned full marks (which he has not done), he could not become eligible for release under the rules for more than 18 months from the present time.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask whether a certain time is not taken off every year for good conduct, and whether in that case this man ought not now to be liberated?

MR. MADDEN: I have no doubt the proper calculation was made by the prison authorities, and I gather from their Report that the time has not yet expired.

POSTAL SURVEYORS — PETITION TO THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether, following the precedent in the cases of ten principal cities and towns in England, he intends to constitute the Postmasters of Belfast, Cork, and Limerick surveyors of their respective districts; and whether he has received from the United Kingdom Postal Clerks' Association a petition for reform of certain terms and conditions of employment in the service, and whether an answer has been given?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: (1) There is no such intention as is stated in the question. I may notice that the arrangement referred to applies only to three cities in England and one in Scotland. (2) With regard to the second part of the hon. Member's question, no such petition has been received, but I recently received a request by a second class sorting clerk asking whether I would accept a petition signed by the executive of the so-called association, and I replied that—

"While ready to consider any petition that may be put forward by the sorting clerk in question, or by other Post Office servants in their official capacity and forwarded through their superior officers, I must decline to receive representations from an organised association not recognised by the Department."

THE CUSTODY OF CHILDREN.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that Mr. James Muir, Inspector of Poor, parish of Bothwell, who has in his charge two orphan girls, Rose and Mary Flannegan, now respectively 14 and twelve years of age, has removed the children from the Motherwell Workhouse, and refuses to inform their next-of-kin, namely, Mathew Flannegan, their uncle, and Elizabeth Flannegan, their grandmother, where the children are at present; and whether the uncle and grandmother, being desirous to bring up and educate the children, are entitled to have the custody of them?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have not yet received detailed information as to the facts of this case, but I am informed that it is now under consideration of a Court of Law, and I am, therefore, precluded from giving the hon. Member any opinion on the subject.

SUB-COMMISSIONS OF THE LAND COURTS IN COUNTY CORK.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when the last sitting of a Sub-Commission for the hearing of fair rent applications took place in the County Cork, and when there will be another sitting?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Land Commissioners report that Sub-Commissions were continually employed in the County Cork from December, 1887, to the 22nd August, 1891. During this period there have been at times as many as six Sub-Commissions working in that county at the same time, and at no time less than two. No date has been arranged for the next Sub-Commission sitting for County Cork.

THE RETIREMENT OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what are the limits, if any, to the operation of the rule whereby Irish Civil servants are compulsorily retired on attaining the age of 65; and what are the principles on which the Government has in some instances departed from the rule?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Bill referred to in the first paragraph of the question is, in its terms, unlimited as regards its operation. The Order in Council gives power to the Treasury, at the instance of a Department, to extend an officer's employment beyond 65 years on being satisfied that such officer's retirement at 65 would be detrimental to the interests of the public service, and in the few instances in which officers have had their employment extended in Ireland this has been done solely on that ground.

MR. MAC NEILL: Would not the retirement of Sir Thomas Brady be detrimental to Irish fishery interests, and have not two Civil servants, Dr. Moffatt, of Queen's College, Galway, and Dr. Byrne, Divisional Police Magistrate in Dublin, declined to retire under the rule?

MR. MADDEN: With respect to Police Magistrates I am not certain that the rule applies. At all events it does not rest with me. In the other case the question of the powers of the law has been raised, and a decision is pending.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): Does the law apply to the Education Department in Dublin?

MR. MADDEN: I believe it does.

THE ARMAGH DISTRICT ASYLUM ARCHITECT.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state the reasons for which Mr. John Boyd, C.E., who has been architect to the Armagh Lunatic Asylum for the past 24 years, has been recently suspended, and also the reasons for the appointment of Mr. Phillips, who is at present employed as architect to this Asylum?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: I am informed that the appointment of architect to the Board of Governors of the Armagh District Asylum is not a permanent one. Mr. Phillips was selected by recent resolution of the Board of Governors for the new works, and his appointment sanctioned by the Board of Control. The Inspectors have no means of ascertaining the motives which influenced the Governors either in appointing Mr. Phillips or passing over Mr. Boyd, who acted as their architect previously.

THE OLPHERT ESTATE, FALCARRAGH.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Conaghan, the bailiff on the Olphert estate, at Falcarragh, in order to induce the evicted tenants to accept the landlord's terms, has gone round the estate protected by Sergeant Kenny and two constables of the Royal Irish Constabulary, threatening that he would pull down the roofs and raze the buildings made by the tenants, and from which they had been evicted, to the ground, if the tenants did not attend and accede to the terms offered by Mr. Olphert; that on Wednesday, 23rd March, Conaghan, with the assistance and under the protection of the police pulled down the houses of five tenants; and that when a man named Thomas M'Geever claimed as his property a spade and ladder found in Philip M'Cafferty's house, Sergeant Kenny took these articles from M'Geever, and handed them to Conaghan, by whom they were broken; and whether the police are authorised, not only in protecting Conaghan in this destruction of the tenants' property, but likewise in assisting and co-operating with him?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Constabulary Authorities report that it is the case that the bailiff referred to is under police protection. The protection party state that they did not hear the bailiff use any threatening language as alleged. The police deny that they gave any assistance in unroofing or pulling down houses, nor did they take or hand over to the bailiff the articles alleged.

MR. MAC NEILL: Were they protecting the bailiff and his companions when they were looting houses and burning them?

MR. MADDEN: Certainly; I say they were protecting the bailiff.

THE GARTAN ELECTORAL DIVISION.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Congested Districts Board will consider the propriety of including the Gartan Electoral Division in the list of congested districts in County Donegal, and also of establishing a creamery in some central place in the congested districts of the Letterkenny and Stranorlar Unions?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Congested Districts Board have received an application to recommend that Gartan should be scheduled as a congested district, and they are engaged in making inquiries as regards this and many other electoral divisions. The suggestion that a creamery should be established at some central place in either the Letterkenny or Stranorlar Unions will be considered by the Board when they receive Reports of the inquiries that they have directed to be made with respect to the locality in question.

THE GIBRALTAR SANITARY COMMISSION.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to his statement as to the difficulty of securing influential ratepayers to serve on the Board of Sanitary Commission of Gibraltar, whether he will state what answers and reasons have been given by the gentlemen who have been asked and who have refused to serve on the Board under the Sanitary Order Amendment Order, 1891; and whether he will give the names of those who have been invited and have refused to serve?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. DE WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): I think the House will agree with me that it would not be desirable in a case like this to state the reasons which weighed with these various gentlemen, at all events until their consent has been obtained; but if the hon. Gentleman will be good enough to communicate with me I shall be happy to give him confidentially a statement of the reasons.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will state the names and occupations of the gentlemen who have been nominated by the Governor of Gibraltar as representatives of the ratepayers on the Sanitary Commission of the Colony?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The names of the gentlemen who have been nominated are Mr. Arthur Rugeroni and Mr. W. J. Sallust Smith, chosen from the list of Grand Jurors, Mr. Augustus Du Moulin from the list of Special Jurors, and Mr. Adolphe Van Andlau from the list of Common Jurors. Messrs. Rugeroni and Du Moulin have resigned their seats on the Board. Mr. Van Andlau is the accountant of the Anglo-Egyptian Bank. The Secretary of State does not know what are the occupations of the other gentlemen.

MR. SUMMERS: Are there two vacancies still unfilled?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Yes, they are; two gentlemen having resigned.

MR. CAUSTON: I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it is not a fact that the nominations made by the Governor of Gibraltar of representatives of the ratepayers on the Sanitary Commission of the colony have been most unsatisfactory to the whole population?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: No, Sir; I am not aware.

THE CASE OF JOHN SWEENEY, JUNIOR.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland, with regard to the case of John Sweeney, junior, Kilgarvan, County Kerry, who was arrested on the 13th February, 1891, charged with the murder of Denis Harrington (a game-keeper), Glengariffe, and who, having been 16 times remanded, was kept in custody for ten months, and ultimately released on his own recognisances, whether the Crown still retain a portion of his wearing apparel; whether he has applied to District Inspector Sullivan, Bantry, for the remaining portion of his clothes; and whether the Crown will restore him his property and compensate him for the injuries which he has sustained? The hon. Gentleman also asked what was the amount of the charge furnished to the Crown for the expenses of witnesses for the defence in the case of the Queen v. John Sweeney, junior, Kilgarvan, County Kerry, at the Cork Summer Assizes and Nenagh Winter Assizes last year, and what amount has been paid and when the balance will be discharged? The hon. Gentleman further asked whether in February, 1891, the police took possession of a gun and two dogs, the property of John Sweeney, senior, Kilgarvan; and, if so, by what right; whether they still retain possession of them, and, if so, whether he will direct their return?

MR. MADDEN: With the permission of the House, I shall now reply to the three questions of the hon. Member bearing on the same subject. The man mentioned was arrested on a charge of murder, was remanded twelve times, and was finally committed for trial at Cork Summer Assizes, 1891, where a true bill for murder was found against him by the Grand Jury. The man was subsequently released on bail at Cork Winter Assizes, 1891, to which the trial had been postponed, but at which it was not proceeded with. The amount claimed as witnesses' expenses for the defence was £14 16s. 3d.; the amount found on examination to be admissible was £2 18s. 6d., which has been paid. The articles of clothing, the gun and dogs, were detained by the police as evidence in the case. The question as to their disposal is now being submitted to me by the Constabulary authorities.

MR. SEXTON: What right have the Crown to keep the man's clothes which were so left?

MR. MADDEN: They have a perfect right to take anything that they think may lead to identification, and it was on that ground that they were taken.

MR. KILBRIDE: Will the right hon. Gentleman see that the man is compensated?

MR. MADDEN: Oh, no, Sir; that is a very different story.

THE ORDNANCE SURVEY OF SCARBOROUGH.

MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if the sheets containing the 25-inch Ordnance Survey of Scarborough are yet completed; and if not, if the work can be hastened in view of its urgency and importance to the municipal and sanitary authorities?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The sheets containing the Ordnance Survey of Scarborough on the 25-inch scale are not yet ready for publication, and I am unable to fix the precise date when they will be. But I am advised that in two months' time they will be sufficiently advanced to supply tracings if necessary. The publication of these sheets shall be hastened as much as possible.

MILITARY HEADQUARTERS, ENNISKILLEN.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if it has been determined to remove for the future the military headquarters from the borough of Enniskillen to Londonderry; and, if so, will he state on what grounds?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The headquarters of the regiment will be removed from Enniskillen to Londonderry when barrack accommodation is ready, as being a preferable station on military grounds. A detachment will remain at Enniskillen.

MR. JORDAN: I know very well that it is on military grounds, but that is a general term. I want to know on what grounds?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I can hardly be expected to give the hon. Member a full statement, but I will say that it is mainly because there is more suitable accommodation for barracks at Londonderry. A detachment will remain at Enniskillen.

MR. JORDAN: How can there be better accommodation when there are no barracks built. I will repeat this question another time.

MAIL SERVICE FROM DUBLIN TO WEXFORD.

MR. T. J. HEALY (Wexford, N.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that the mail train from Dublin to Wexford takes three hours and thirty-five minutes to perform a journey of 92 miles, and stops at 18 stations; if any other trunk line in the United Kingdom runs a mail train which stops, on an average, once in every five miles; if he is aware that numerous complaints have been made by the merchants and traders in the County Wexford as to the inadequacy of the present mail service; and if he is prepared to take any steps to improve it?

Mr. Chaplin

*SIR J. FERGUSON: The ment as regards the running of the mail train from Dublin to Wexford is correct. This is the less important of the two mail trains. There is one trunk line upon which the mail stops once in every five miles. Numerous representations have been made respecting the slowness of the Wexford service, and the Department has materially improved it by adopting special arrangements for sorting the railway and employing additional force. Indeed, everything possible has been done to meet the complaint made short of quickening the run of the train, and it is regretted that the additional outlay required for that purpose is far beyond what the circumstances would warrant.

MR. T. J. HEALY. Will the hon. Gentleman say whether he will advise that any grant should be made, and, if so, to what amount?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: I am sorry to say there is at present a loss on the service, and it is impossible that anything can be done to accelerate the time.

NAVAL OFFICERS AND CHILDREN AT CHRIST'S HOSPITAL.

COMMANDER BETHELL (York Holderness): I beg to ask the Member for Exeter, as a Charity Commissioner, whether the Commissioners have yet come to any decision as to the claims of Naval Officers to have the customs continued by which a certain number of the children of Naval Officers were admitted to the foundation of Christ's Hospital by special provision?

SIR S. NORTHCOTE (Exeter): The financial condition of Christ's Hospital during the present period of depression is not such as to admit of the position of any charges not authorised by the scheme lately approved by His Majesty. When that period shall have expired the Commissioners will be ready to take the matter into their able consideration.

LORD CLANRICARDE AND HIS TENANTS.

MR. CONDON (Tipperary, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Lord Clanricarde at the beginning of last month seized a quantity of turf which belonged to another person who owed no rent to Lord Clanricarde on the holding of a tenant named Michael Gorman at Derryrulier, County Galway, without any order of a Court, but under a distress warrant issued by Lord Clanricarde's agent for rent due by Gorman; whether members of the Royal Irish Constabulary were employed to watch the turf for 14 days between the dates of seizure and sale; and whether, considering the danger to the public peace and the waste of property involved, he will refuse to have the police employed under such circumstances in future?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: I have nothing to say with respect to the action of Lord Clanricarde or his agent. I believe the police were not so employed.

MR. CONDON: What were the police doing there?

MR. MADDEN: They were engaged in their ordinary duties.

SEIZURE OF A GUN BY THE IRISH POLICE.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will give instructions to have Mr. Martin Egan, P.L.G., of Duniry, County Galway, paid the value of his gun, which was seized by the police in consequence of his licence having been revoked by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, or will he allow Mr. Egan to sell it to a holder of a licence?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: When the owner referred to surrendered his gun on 25th April, 1888, he asked to be allowed to sell it. This the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary at once assented to, on the condition that it should be sold to a duly licensed person. This permission still holds good.

LOSS OF LIFE BY FIRES.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND (Middlesex, Uxbridge): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, having regard to the loss of life by fire recently at Battersea, Fulham, Long Acre, and Westminster, he will consider the expediency of making it compulsory upon owners and proprietors of all business premises where employés sleep to provide adequate means of escape in case of fire; and whether, in view of the fact that there are simple and effective fire escapes, such as one Department of the Government have already adopted, and that "The Factory and Workshops Act, 1891," contains a clause for such provision where 40 persons are employed, he will take steps to extend this protection to cases where there are a lesser number of families and guests?

MR. MATTHEWS: So far as the question of my hon. Friend refers to factories, I can only say that I have no information which leads me to think that the novel and special provisions against fire contained in the Factory and Workshops Act of last Session require amendment, or that the limit of numbers which was adopted by Parliament is not sufficiently low. I should not be prepared to introduce legislation making it compulsory on the owners of all business premises where employés sleep or upon the owners of private houses where persons sleep to provide, in case of fire, means of escape determined by Statute.

THE IRISH CATTLE TRADE.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether he is aware that heavy loss is being inflicted upon farmers, cattle dealers, and Shipping Companies connected with Belfast and the County Antrim by the mode in which the provisions of the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Acts are being applied in certain ports of Scotland; whether, in reply to the following question from Belfast—

"Can cattle from this county (which is free from disease), accompanied by declaration and certificate, and landed from the steamer, at the Port of Ayr, into railway waggons, without trespassing on the shire or burgh of Ayr, and railed through to Fife, be admitted?"

the clerk to the Local Authority of Fife wired in reply, on Wednesday last, "No, cannot be admitted"; whether all the other ports used in the cattle trade from Belfast to Scotland are, like Ayr, closed against that trade at present, so that Irish cattle are shut out of Scotland because the Scotch ports are situate in infected areas; and what measures will be adopted in regard to a state of things injurious not only to the farmers of Antrim, who have a large surplus stock, with a scarcity of feeding, but also to the dealers, the Shipping Companies, and the farmers in Scotland?

MR. CHAPLIN: I am aware that loss—and I am afraid very serious loss—must have been inflicted on the various interests referred to in the first paragraph of the question, and I greatly regret it; but such loss is inseparable, I fear, from the measures which have been necessary to check the spread of foot-and-mouth disease. In reply to the third paragraph of the question, no port of either England or Scotland is closed against the Irish trade, but no animals of any description are allowed to leave one of the ports—namely, Glasgow—at present, because that city has recently been a dangerous centre of the disease, and I am advised that it would not at present be safe to open it; on the other hand, Irish cattle can be landed at Greenock, and passed through Glasgow without being untrucked to any other part of Scotland that is willing to receive them. I have no knowledge of the correspondence referred to in the second paragraph of the question; and if Irish cattle are not admitted into Fife it is not due to any regulations at the port, but to orders passed by the Local Authority, forbidding the entry of animals into their district for their own protection. It would be manifestly impossible for me to interfere with the discretion of Local Authorities in that respect, when, by doing so, I might be the means of introducing disease into their district. I am perfectly alive, however, to the immense importance of the Irish cattle trade; and I hope, if there should be no further outbreaks, the difficulties under which it is conducted at present will most of them disappear.

Mr. Sexton

H.M.S. "AURORA."

MR. TATTON EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the account in the Times of 1st April with reference to the breakdown of H.M.S. Aurora, is correct; if it is correct, who were the designers and makers of the engines; whether the makers of the engines made any remonstrance to the advisers of the Admiralty, calling attention to the evident weakness of the piston rods to transmit the power; why were the piston rods renewed, and were they increased in sectional strength; and is there any clause in the contract with the makers of the engines making them responsible for any faults in the design of the engines, or are they relieved from any such liability?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The report in question is not correct. The facts are as follows:—During a recent full-power trial of the engines, certain defects were revealed which have necessitated an inquiry by the Dockyard officers. The Aurora has therefore been ordered home to Devonport, and will be replaced by the sister ship Narcissus. The size of the piston rods fitted in the engines of the Aurora was that proposed by the makers of the machinery, Messrs. Thomson of Clyde Bank, and was of a section equal to those fitted to engines of the same power which have been placed in four other vessels of the class. A piston rod was renewed in one out of the six cylinders in the Aurora to suit the new piston fitted at the Dockyard. The size was then increased one-sixteenth of an inch, but not on account of a supposed lack of strength in the original design. By a clause in the contract, the makers of the machinery were responsible for its efficiency for a period of twelve months from the date the ship was first commissioned.

LEADING LIGHTS TO HARBOURS IN ORKNEY AND SHETLAND.

MR. LYELL (Orkney and Shetland): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate what arrangements the Government have made for erecting in the course of the year leading lights to harbours in Orkney and Shetland, and particularly at the entrances to Kirkwall Harbour, Scalloway, Vaila Sound, and Balta Sound?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have to inform the hon. Member that the Board of Trade have given their sanction to a light being placed on Helliar Holm at the entrance to Kirkwall Harbour. The question of erecting the other lights referred to is now under the consideration of the Government, and it is hoped, if the necessary funds are voted by Parliament, to proceed so far as may be possible with the construction of the lights on the coasts of Orkney and Shetland on the lines recommended by the Commissioners.

THE DEATH-RATE IN GIBRALTAR.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will inform the House what was the death-rate in the civil and military populations of Gibraltar during the years 1890 and 1891?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Secretary of State has called for the information desired, and it will be communicated to the hon. Member as soon as it has been obtained. The death-rate for 1890 among the military population (including officers, men, women, and children) was 6·30 per 1,000. The particulars for 1891 have not yet been received.

COMMISSIONER JOHNSTON AND THE SLAVE TRADE.

MR. A. E. PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether any Despatches have been received from Commissioner Johnston detailing his operations against the Slave Trade on Lake Nyassa both at Makanjilas and M'Ponda's Towns?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): No Despatches of the character referred to by the hon. Member have been received from Mr. Johnston. There is, however, reason to believe that two at least of his Despatches have miscarried, and not reached this country. Yesterday, however, a telegram was received at the Foreign Office from Consul-General Johnston, dated Zomba, 8th March, to the following effect:—stating that he had just received further news from Mr. King at Fort Johnston (opposite M'Ponda's). His reason for attacking Zarafi was that the latter had recommenced slave raids against the people on the River Shiré, with the assistance of a large caravan of slaves from Kilwa on the East coast. One Zanzibari is reported killed and some of the Indian troops; Mr. King and six men were wounded. Commander Kean, of Her Majesty's gunboat Herald, had gone to take command at Fort Johnston, and reported on the 3rd March that all was well there, and that M'Ponda was thoroughly loyal. His orders were to remain only on the defensive. It appears that on Zarafi's side 32 men were killed, including seven or eight of the Kilwa traders, his brother Khamisi and his Swahili councillor Barghash. In spite of the fact that our men were repulsed, no attempt had been made by Zarafi to follow up his advantage, and he had retired to the hills. There was no trouble in the district anywhere, but at the south-eastern end of Lake Nyassa. Everywhere else there was peace, and trade was increasing.

THE EAST AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

MR. A. E. PEASE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs what is the number of Her Majesty's ships employed in the Slave Trade suppression service on the East Coast of Africa?

LORD G. HAMILTON: All of Her Majesty's ships on the East Coast of Africa are in possession of warrants, and have full authority to act in the suppression of the Slave Trade. In the neighbourhood of Zanzibar and Pemba there are three third-class cruisers; on the rivers Zambesi and Shiré, two steamers; at Aden and the neighbourhood, one third-class cruiser; and in the Persian Gulf, one third-class cruiser. I may, however, observe that these vessels have other duties to perform besides the suppression of the Slave Trade.

FRENCH AND SCOTCH STEAM TRAWLERS.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many

French and Scotch steam trawlers are now off the coasts of Galway and Mayo?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Inspectors of Irish Fisheries have not particulars at present available to answer this question, but are making inquiries. Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member would be good enough to defer it for a week.

COLONEL NOLAN: I will repeat the question on Thursday.

PORTAL VETERINARY INSPECTORS IN IRELAND.

MR. MAGUIRE (Donegal, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, having regard to the responsible and important duties discharged by the Portal Veterinary Inspectors in Ireland, he is prepared to recommend the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury to grant such a suitable superannuation allowance to these officers as is customary in other branches of the Civil Service?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The Portal Veterinary Inspectors accepted their appointments with the full knowledge that they were not entitled to either pension or gratuity on ceasing to hold office; and it is not proposed to alter the conditions of their employment.

THE KENMARE FISHERY DISTRICT.

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a man named Griffin was fined at the Petty Sessions Court in Sneem early in March for removing gravel from the River Onreagh at Inchmaleega, in the Kenmare fishery district, a place from which the public have had the right for the past 50 years of removing gravel; and whether he can state on what grounds Griffin was fined?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: I am informed that the man named was fined at the Petty Sessions on the prosecution of the Conservators of the Kenmare fishery district for having removed gravel from the spawning beds of salmon. People are only prevented from removing gravel from these rivers during the close season for salmon.

Colonel Nolan

LOCAL TAXATION.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in order that the House may be informed of the whole amount of taxation, local as well as Imperial, borne by the country, and of the distribution of the burden between real and personal property, he will arrange that a general statement on local taxation and debt, and on the increase and decrease of rateable values, shall be made this year in connection with the Budget; and, if not, whether, on some other occasion, a Ministerial Statement will be made on the growth of local expenditure and indebtedness, so as to afford the House a suitable opportunity of considering the subject?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have consulted my right hon. Friends most directly concerned on the subject of this question, with every desire to meet the wishes of my hon. Friend if it should be found practicable. But I understand that the great complexity of local expenditure, the very large number (28,000) of the Local Authorities from which accounts have to be obtained, and the length of time necessarily involved in auditing these accounts, make it impossible to present to the House the expenditure of Local Authorities for the year preceding the Budget Statement.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the second part of my question—whether the Government will give the House an opportunity on some other occasion of considering this subject?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I understand it has been the practice in previous years to make some such statement as this upon the Second Reading of the Local Funds Bill; but that practice has been discontinued, and I am not aware that it met with any great favour in any part of the House.

MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is the intention of the Woods and Forests Office to reduce the royalties on gold and silver in Ireland to 1 per cent., as they have done in the case of the Welsh gold mines; what was the reputed value of the gold obtained by the peasants and landowners in the County of Wicklow about the year 1796, immediately preceding the Government taking possession of the mines; what was the value of the gold obtained by the Government after the mines were taken possession of and worked by the Crown; what was the amount of money expended by the Government in erecting barracks for the soldiers and for officers' quarters and works, which were burnt down by the residents and rebuilt, and then again burned down as a protest against the action of the Crown; and has any attempt been made from that time to this to open up these mines by the Crown or any other persons; have any leases been granted in Ireland to work for gold and silver (these metals being the property of the State), with an absence of conditions to work; and, if so, in how many cases and on what terms; and, if so, what area of land is owned by such lessees; does he intend to insert any provisions in the Bill which he has before the House for the management and regulation of the Woods and Forests Office which will deal with the administration of the possible gold fields of Ireland; and how many leases are now in existence for working gold and silver in Ireland, and what area of land do such leases embrace, and how many men are employed in the undertaking?

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member almost asks for an historical treatise to be given across the floor of the House. The arrangement for the reduction of gold-mining royalties to 1-100th only applies at present to the Morgan Mine. Where similar conditions are present, similar treatment will be given to mines in any part of the United Kingdom, but the case of each mine must be considered separately. As regards the historical questions in paragraphs 2, 3, and 4, the hon. Member will find information with regard to the Wicklow Goldfield on p. 211 of the third Report of the Mining Royalties Commission, but I do not know that it would be possible now to give some of the particulars for which he asks. The answer to the fifth and sixth paragraphs of his question is in the negative. In answer to the last paragraph, three leases are now in existence for working gold and silver in Ireland, embracing an area of 5,535 acres. So far as is known, no men are at present employed in working for gold and silver in this area.

MR. KIMBER (Wandsworth): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the reduction of royalties promised by the Government from 1-30th to 1-100th in respect to the Morgan Gold Mine will apply retrospectively, so as to allow what has already been paid or charged in excess of one per cent. against any future royalties?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The reduction of royalties in respect to the Morgan Gold Mine will not apply retrospectively. I have stated that it was granted to secure a modus vivendi, and to avoid the alleged necessity for the dismissal of labourers, and not because the sliding scale previously offered was inequitable. I therefore see no reason why it should apply to the past. The company have themselves to blame if they did not accept a reduced scale of royalties earlier.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether it is within his knowledge that large quantities of auriferous and argentiferous ores from foreign countries are treated in Swansea and other places; whether the Crown can claim any royalty upon the production of gold and silver from such ores; and whether he will consider the advisability of allowing the productions of mines within the United Kingdom free competition with foreign productions?

*MR. GOSCHEN: The official Returns do not distinguish the imports of auriferous and argentiferous ores, but I believe that some gold and silver is extracted from foreign ores at Swansea and other places. The Crown is not the owner of this gold and silver, and, therefore, can claim no royalty upon it. I understand that by the last paragraph of his question the hon. Member expresses a desire for the abolition of royalties. I would remind him that the whole subject is at present under consideration by a Royal Commission.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman if he can state what the difference is between the royalties in Wales and the royalties in Ireland?

*MR. GOSCHEN: There is no difference between the royalties in Wales and the royalties in Ireland.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Might I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Government recognise the fact that the imposition of revenue upon mineral products in this country handicaps the producer?

*MR. GOSCHEN: I think that is an argumentative question which must be left to the consideration of the Royal Commission.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the royalty is five per cent. in Ireland and one per cent. in Wales?

*MR. GOSCHEN: Considering that no ore is being extracted from minerals in Ireland I fail to see how that would be possible.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Neither is there likely to be as long as the present exactions in the form of royalties continue.

THE CASE OF JAMES HANDLEY.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, in considering the case of James Handley, aged about 15, now under sentence of death for murder at Wicklow, will take into account the precedents for commutation, on the ground of youth, afforded by the reprieves of Constance Kent many years ago, and of George Davies, aged 16, reprieved in April 1890?

MR. MADDEN (who replied) said: The case referred to is under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant. His Excellency will have regard to all the circumstances of the case before coming to a decision.

METROPOLITAN POLICE COURTS.

MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will inform the House what he proposes to do with reference to the suggestion that certain Police Courts in the Metropolis should be re-arranged, with a view to the establishment of a Police Court in St. Pancras?

MR. MATTHEWS: It is my intention to refer to a Departmental Committee the question of the proper number and limits of the Police Court Districts of the Metropolis. It must not, however, be understood that this committee will be appointed necessarily with a view to the establishment of a Police Court in the St. Pancras area, where the Police Court business is not exceptionally heavy.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL FINANCE.

MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Treasury have recently refused to sanction a loan by the London County Council to the Holborn Board of Guardians, for a period of 30 years, repayable on the annuity system, and have stated that, unless the system of repayment by equal annual instalments of principal be adopted, the period of the loan must be reduced to 25 years; what other cases there have been in the last six years in which the Treasury have refused to sanction a loan by the Metropolitan Board of Works, or by the County Council, to a Board of Guardians, for buildings, or the acquisition of freehold sites, repayable in 30 years on the annuity system; whether it is the case that, during the three years of office of the late London County Council, 22 such loans were sanctioned by the Treasury for sums amounting in all to £201,200; and what is the reason for which the Treasury have made a new departure in the present instance, in connection with loans to Boards of Guardians?

MR. GOSCHEN: The facts stated in the first paragraph of the question are correct. It is the case that a certain number of loans to Boards of Guardians on the annuity system for 30 years were sanctioned by the Treasury during the terms of office of the late London County Council; and I am not aware that any such loans were refused. The action of the County Council, in endeavouring to adopt generally the annuity system, called the attention of the Treasury to the matter; and, upon careful consideration of the two systems, the Treasury came to the conclusion that, under similar conditions, repayment by annuity should extend over a shorter period of years than repayment by instalment, inasmuch as the annuity system throws a heavier burden on posterity, and, until the whole loan is repaid, affords no relief to future ratepayers concurrently with the imposition of the fresh burden which they will undoubtedly have to bear. The new departure to which the hon Member alludes was made in accordance with this conclusion.

INSPECTOR BLACK, OF BIRMINGHAM.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will by courtesy state, has Mr. Black, late Inspector of Police in Birmingham, had a writ issued against any newspaper for the publication of alleged defamatory statements concerning him?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by Mr. Black's solicitors that they are in communication with the proprietors of the newspaper with respect to the libellous statement made against their client; and that unless by to-morrow their client receives the satisfaction which he is claiming, a writ will be issued by them on his behalf for libel.

THE GRESHAM UNIVERSITY.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is in a position to announce the names of the Royal Commissioners to whom the question of a teaching University for London (the Gresham University) will be referred?

SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is able to state the terms of the Reference to a Royal Commission on the question of University education in London, and the names of the Commissioners?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope to be able to give a complete list of the names of the Royal Commissioners on next Thursday, and I shall then give the terms of the Reference in the same statement.

THE EASTER HOLIDAYS.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire) (for Mr. J. E. ELLIS, Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he can state when it is proposed the House should adjourn for, and re-assemble after, Easter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can give no explicit or satisfactory assurances on the question of the Easter Recess as to when, and for how long, the House will adjourn at Easter. The House will remember that last year they separated, I think, on the Thursday before Good Friday, and met again for the transaction of important business on the Thursday of Easter week, thus having only a week's holiday. I hope we shall not be so much restricted this year; but that, of course, must partly depend upon the course of business between now and then.

THE QUESTION OF DISSOLUTION.

MR. PICTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to the precedents cited in May's Parliamentary Practice, page 678 (edition 1883), according to which it has been usual, in anticipation of a Dissolution, to take only part of the Estimates, leaving the remainder to be voted by the new Parliament; and whether, in view of these precedents, the Government will refrain from asking for more than half the amount of the Civil Service Estimates?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The practice to which the hon. Gentleman refers hardly appears, so far as I understand, to support the suggestion conveyed in the question. Several illustrations are mentioned by Sir Erskine May of special circumstances under which Votes on Account had been taken, and in four of these the Votes preceded the Dissolution, and in none of them would the facts afford a precedent appropriate to the present condition of affairs.

MR. PICTON: I should like to ask if the right hon. Gentleman does not remember that in three of the cases the Dissolution occurred after the date at which the House is now sitting, and only half the Votes were taken before the Dissolution?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Yes; but in 1841, 1857, and 1859 the Government had been defeated upon a Vote of Want of Confidence before the Vote on Account was taken. But the hon. Member will have observed that that has not yet occurred.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

*(5.25.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: On Saturday last a Special Report of the Select Committee on the Hours of Railway Servants, together with the evidence, was circulated to hon. Members, from which they will have seen that the Committee have reported that a certain railway servant, John Hood, was dismissed by the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence which he gave before the Committee last year, and for which he was subsequently called to account and censured by some of the Directors and by the Manager of the Company. As Chairman of the Committee, I wish to give notice that it is my intention to call the attention of the House to that Report as a question of Privilege. Since that Report was presented the Committee have had before them two other cases in which it is alleged that certain railway servants belonging to the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants have been dismissed from their offices in that Society, or otherwise injured, on account of the evidence given before the Committee. The Committee are now examining these cases, and will, I hope, shortly decide whether or not they shall make a Special Report upon them. Therefore, I do not now name a day upon which I shall call attention to this first Special Report, because I think it would be for the convenience of the House and fairer to all parties that the whole subject should be considered together; but I hope there will be no unnecessary delay in the matter.

*(5.26.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the Special Report already presented is not in itself an absolutely completed document dealing with the whole of the evidence relating to certain specific cases; and whether he is not aware that a Report of this kind upon which a Motion of Breach of Privilege may be based, might, if indefinitely postponed, prejudice, if it did not oust, that Report from its position in the ordinary proceedings with regard to Privilege; and whether it is usual that a Report of a Committee such as this, which is admittedly complete and final in its character, should be indefinitely postponed on the chance of other questions which have been brought before the Committee being similarly reported on at a later stage of the Session? I would ask the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, to re-consider his decision; and whether, in re-considering his decision, he will not name the earliest possible day for dealing with the Report in accordance with the usual course in cases of Privilege?

*(5.27.) SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I apprehend, Sir—but of course it is not a matter on which I can give an opinion—that no delay in dealing with the subject could oust it from its position as a question of Privilege; and that whatever time the House may decide to deal with it, it will still retain its position as a question of Privilege. On the other question of the hon. Member I will say this: The Special Report already presented deals with all the cases of alleged intimidation that have been brought forward by one side. The Committee are now engaged in considering and taking evidence upon other cases of the same kind which have been brought forward by the other side; and, as Chairman of the Committee, I think that both these cases should be considered together, instead of the House being asked to entertain the question of Privilege on two different occasions.

(5.28.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I have been very much surprised to hear the right hon. Gentleman talk of "sides" in this matter. It does not seem to me to be a question of "sides" at all. As I understand a breach of the Privileges of this House is supposed, or alleged, to have been committed by certain persons; and I see no reason why that matter should not be considered at once by the House without entering upon a question of recrimination between sides in the matter. It seems to me we ought as far as possible to avoid the consideration of what the right hon. Gentleman has called "sides" on this question, and deal with it impartially as a matter relating to the privileges of this House. I do not know what your view of the matter is, Sir; but I have always understood that it is a fundamental Rule of this House that questions of Privilege should always be brought forward at the earliest possible moment, and for reasons that are perfectly obvious. I confess I see no reason why this case should be made an exception to that Rule, and more particularly on the grounds suggested by the right hon. Gentleman.

(5.29.) MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee): I should like to ask you, Sir, as a point of order, is it not a Rule of this House that no reference should be made here to proceedings before Committees upstairs until the Committee have reported to the House? The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned a fact known to him and to the Committee, but not known to the House, as to certain proceedings now taking place.

*(5.30.) MR. SPEAKER: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that the Committee have reported upon a case which they think touched upon Privilege, and that they are now discussing another case, which might also be one of Privilege, and that it might be for the convenience of the House to discuss them together. I know nothing of the special case before the Committee; but as to the question of Privilege there must, of course, be no undue delay in the discussion of such a question. The Privilege, however, will, of course, adhere to the question when it comes before this House.

(5.30.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I do not know whether I need put what I have to say in the form of a question, or that I need enter into the matters upon which the questions of Privilege arose. There is, however, a remarkable distinction between them, and that is, that one of them was brought forward and reported upon to the House before the other was actually started. I do not know whether that bears upon the question under discussion; but, considering the length of time which it took the Committee to deal with the first question of privilege, I think it is extremely probable that several days, and possibly two or three weeks, will intervene, and that Easter will arrive before this second question, which was started after the other question, can be reported upon and dealt with by the Committee.

MR. MORTON (Peterborough): May I ask you, Sir, whether it would be in order for any Member of this House to bring a question of breach of privilege before the House?

MR. SPEAKER: Any Member can bring such a question before the House, but it would be for the House to decide whether it should be dealt with.

*MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): In regard to the reply which the right hon. Gentleman gave to the questions put to him, I would submit that the proper person to act in these matters would be the Chairman of the Committee; and I still hope that he may re-consider his decision; but in consequence of his reply I shall have to consider with some reluctance whether I shall not put down a Motion that this Report be taken into consideration on Thursday [Several hon. MEMBERS: No; to-morrow] — well, then, to-morrow, unless the right hon. Gentleman is prepared to make a similar Motion himself, in which case I would of course most gladly give way to him. There seems to be no justification whatever for postponing the consideration of these questions of privilege, with which the House is in a position to deal without delay.

*MR. MORTON: Mr. Speaker, I quite agree with you; and supposing that the Chairman of the Committee should neglect what you seem to consider to be his duty in this matter, I will bring the question forward myself, that is, of course, if the hon. Member for Northampton does not do so to-morrow.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): As one of the Members of the Committee I join with the hon. Gentleman in the expression of the hope that the Chairman of the Committee will move in the matter without delay. We have already presented a Special Report, which suggests that a breach of Privilege has been committed, and consequently I consider the time is now ripe for dealing with it. I would also venture respectfully to suggest that the Chairman of the Committee would be the best person to deal with it.

MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he has taken into consideration the fact that, in addition to the cases he mentioned, another case was brought before the attention of the Committee which cannot possibly be inquired into until after Easter. There seems to be quite a vista of these cases coming before us.

MR. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I should like to ask why, as in the case of the forged letters to the Times, the question of privilege should not have been brought forward to be dealt with as soon as possible after the offence had been committed?

MR. SPEAKER: There is no sort of parallel between the cases.

MOTIONS.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (MORNING SITTINGS).

(5.42.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.) rose to move—

"That so much of the Order of the 3rd of March as prescribes that Financial Business and proceedings on the Introduction of Bills shall be the principal business at Morning Sittings be rescinded."

I think that the House will agree that, with the Bill of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture (Mr. Chaplin) on the Paper, it would be useful to make some progress with it in Committee before we enter into the consideration of any other business. I therefore hope that the House will unanimously grant the Government the very small privilege for which they now ask. I ought to advert to the circumstances that when I first gave notice that I would bring forward a Resolution of this kind I had hopes myself, and I had led others to hope, that the first business we should take this evening was the Committee stage of the Small Holdings Bill; but, as the House knows, the Debate on the Equivalent Grant for Scotland on Thursday last took more time than was anticipated, and I was very anxious to meet the wishes of gentlemen from Scotland, who, I am sure, did not wish to delay business by prolonging the Debate. I thought it was the general wish of the House that we should dispose of the Second Reading stage of that Bill before we proceeded with any other business. I am quite conscious of the fact that some small inconvenience may and must result to hon. Gentlemen who take a keen interest in the Small Holdings Bill, and who wish to proceed with it without delay; but they will see that in this case the Government have not the control of the time of the House. Those who are most anxious with regard to the Small Holdings Bill will agree as to the undesirability of leaving the Second Reading of the Equivalent Grant for Scotland Bill in suspension until after Easter. I hope this arrangement will assist the House in dealing with the business which is before it.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That so much of the Order of the 3rd of March as prescribes that Financial Business and proceedings on the Introduction of Bills shall be the principal business at Morning Sittings be rescinded."—(Mr. A. J. Balfour.)

*MR. MORTON: I entirely object to this Resolution. We understood when we gave up the Morning Sittings to the Government that the time should be used for purposes of Supply. I have no objection to parts of the days being taken for Supply, but if they are to be used for other purposes I shall oppose it. It is "the same old dodge" as has been played on other occasions. Supply is to be put off until the end of July—supposing the Government are then in office—and then it will be rushed through in the middle of the night. I want to see Supply taken as early as possible in the Session, and regularly, so that it may be properly dealt with. We have had the Ordnance Vote before us on one or two occasions, and, so far as I can see, the right hon. Gentleman does not care to have that matter properly discussed. I dare say there are some people who wish to hush up the Enfield scandal, or what may be more properly called the Enfield and Birmingham scandal altogether.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): Is the hon. Member in Order now in discussing the Ordnance Vote?

Mr. Radcliffe Cooke

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member's argument is to the effect that Supply should not be postponed.

*MR. MORTON: That is entirely what I intended to show, Mr. Speaker. I will not detain the House now by further reference to the Enfield and Birmingham scandal. I will only say that unless the Government give way on the question of compulsion, the Small Holdings Bill will be a farce, and that I shall oppose this Resolution.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I presume that if the Resolution is agreed to, the Small Holdings Bill will be the only one that will be taken on Tuesday and Friday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will certainly not take any controversial Bill.

MR. D. THOMAS: Would the right hon. Gentleman regard the Clergy Discipline Bill as of a controversial nature?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: We shall not take that Bill.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I hope that the Irish Education Bill will not be sprung upon us.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will not be sprung upon the House; I mean that I will give full notice of when it will be brought before the House. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland is not here now, and I do not wish to say anything more with regard to it in his absence.

MR. SEXTON: We should certainly object to its being taken at a Morning Sitting.

MR. WALLACE (Edinburgh, E.): I would like to ask whether the Scotch Private Bill would be considered controversial?

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

EDUCATION AND LOCAL TAXATION RELIEF (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. .)

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [31st March], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

(5.50.) MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars, &c.): I consider that the answers given by the Lord Advocate and the Solicitor General the other night in regard to the objections raised to this Bill were altogether meagre and inadequate. Therefore, I trust that they will this evening be properly dealt with. The only justification which the Government could put forward as sufficient for their own proposals was, that if the Scottish people had had a full opportunity to consider the measure and had made up their minds on the subject, this Bill represented their mature opinion. But Scotland has had no opportunity of considering it nor of coming to a final conclusion. It has been stated in this Debate that there had been a demand from Scotland for this money, and the Lord Advocate said he had weighed carefully the reasons placed before him by the Public Bodies in reference to the allocation of the money; but these statements come too late. There was no demand whatever from Scotland for any assistance to the local revenues from the Imperial Treasury. Not a suggestion has been made of this kind from Scotland, and these reasons which the Lord Advocate speaks of having carefully weighed were put forward by different bodies who already knew that they were to share in the money, and their only object was to obtain as large a share as possible. Of course, when £265,000 has to be given away claimants are numerous, and therefore Parochial Boards, Town Councils and County Councils, University reformers, and Secondary Education advocates have all put forward their demands, and I have observed that no inconsiderable part of the money asked for by the advocates of increased secondary education will be required for a pension scheme which has been proposed. The Solicitor General also told us that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had received many deputations asking for this money, but here again these deputations were never heard of until it was decided to assist local objects from the Imperial Treasury. It is a repetition of the case of three years ago when the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposed to set aside a large sum from the Treasury for turnpike roads. Not a word had come from Scotland asking for this money until the proposal was made. Not even by those who would have benefited had any demand been made upon the Treasury for such assistance. Further than this, so far as I can judge of the feeling of the only public meeting held in Glasgow, the public there do not want the money applied as it is proposed to do in the Bill. At this meeting they considered the first demand on the money should be to free from fees the remaining schools in Scotland in which fees are still collected, and that a further sum should be used to supply school books to certain pupils under certain circumstances, and that the balance should be handed to the Councils with, in effect, a free hand as to dealing with it. The scheme has been attacked from this side of the House on many different grounds, and no adequate defence has been made to these attacks, nor has there even been any reasonable explanations given. An absolutely strong case has been made out that it is inequitable to relieve local rates, which are largely landlords' liabilities, from Imperial taxation, which is to some extent collected by duties on food and other articles chiefly used by the working classes; property being, therefore, under these circumstances, to be relieved at the expense of the poorer classes. Another omission has been the absence of any scheme dealing with secondary education. There are something like £200,000 per annum available in Scotland at the present time for this purpose, and we were clearly entitled to a complete statement respecting this amount, the particulars of which could not be so well collected by any private person as they could by the Government. We are told that the £60,000 to be given under this Bill for secondary education will be distributed by the Scottish Education Department according to a plan which will be laid on the Table of this House. But when will such plans come up for consideration? After 12 o'clock at night in a tired House when every Member is anxious to get away. There never has been an adequate discussion of any question of this kind which came up so late. The only satisfactory statement made was that a portion of the money will be applied to evening continuation schools. Even the friends of this measure have criticised it adversely. The hon. Member for South Lanark (Mr. Hozier) has said that the Councils and other Bodies who are to receive the money approve of the scheme, but what could you expect from them but approval? Is there the smallest likelihood that those to whom the money was to be paid would object to taking it? The hon. Member for Partick (Mr. Parker Smith) says that the allocation is one which he would not have made if he had had the disposing of the funds. This is a finance Bill and is far more the work of the Chancellor of the Exchequer than of the Lord Advocate, but not one word of defence or explanation has been offered by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in reply to the objections that have been made to it. From what he has said on previous occasions we however gather that he believes in the principle that local improvements should not be altogether met by local assessments but should be assisted from the Imperial revenue. This principle is bad and would be repudiated by most financiers. Why should a person be taxed on food in London to assist the carrying out of a public improvement in Glasgow, or the other way about? Why should money raised by Imperial taxation in Scotland be applied to local works in London? The principle is a wrong one and all local wants and local improvements should be met entirely from local sources. I would also draw attention to the gross unfairness of the way in which the money is to be divided. The counties will get very nearly half of the whole amount, although the burghs represent about £12,250,000 out of the £15,500,000 which is the rateable value of Scotland. If the money was divided as it ought to be, the burghs should receive three-quarters of the whole amount instead of only half, and the counties should receive a fourth instead of the half. There is no doubt that the scheme is inadequate and that the rates are unfairly divided between the burghs and the counties. Another objection to this Bill is that it makes the settlement of the money permanent and disables the House from hereafter altering the destination of the money without the consent of the House of Lords. Municipal and County Councils should have free hand in disposing and applying the money. I think the first charge on the sum should have been the freeing of those Board Schools in which fees are still collected. Altogether the Bill is unsatisfactory and I shall vote against the Second Reading; but if any hon. Member will propose a Resolution to the effect that for this year the money should be voted in the Civil Service Estimate, in order that further time may be given to the consideration of the question, I shall support the amendment.

6.5.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): Sir, everyone must feel that the Government will have very great difficulty in passing this Bill through Committee in its present shape. The objections of the Scotch Members are not whimsical or factious, but spring from a real knowledge of Scotch needs, and the very great interest they feel in the matter. I venture to think I see the root of this difficulty and how it can be met. There are many Members who support it, but who have not put it in definite shape. In the first place, some Members wish to have a great scheme of secondary education for Scotland. Other Members want to spend this money in the relief of rates. Most of the Members, perhaps all the Members, who want a great scheme of secondary education will vote against the Bill, and the Members who, like myself, think that the money is due to the ratepayers will for the most part vote for it; and with earnest representations to the Government that they should give careful consideration to what has passed in the Debate, and that they should so alter the Bill as eventually to secure its being accepted with something like unanimity by the Scotch Members. I want to defend my position against those who sit behind and around me and say that this money is due to the localities in the same proportion as they pay the rates. Have hon. Gentlemen considered, Sir, that the Scotch ratepayer in his character of taxpayer contributes his share of the two millions of Probate Duty which goes to pay English ratepayers rates? Therefore, unless he gets his share of the Probate Duty as a ratepayer he will first pay the Englishmen's rate and then his own, so that there will be a distinctly and undeniably differential tax upon the Scotch ratepayer. My hon. Friend the Member for South Aberdeen said the demands for relief of rates come from England and not from Scotland. I do not see anything in that argument, because, wherever the demands come from, the money which goes to satisfy those demands comes just as much from Scotland as from England. And when my hon. Friend in a beautiful figure said that the tempter held out gold, it is his own gold, gold which he himself contributed, and of which he ought to have the benefit. I have done with the controversial part of my speech. There is only one fair and just way of dealing with this money, and that is to give the whole of it to the people in the various localities to do with it exactly what they wish, and it is because this Bill establishes that in principle more than the proposals put forward on this side, and especially that this Bill can be easily altered to carry that out in practice, that I shall vote for the Second Reading; but I earnestly hope that after the Debate the Government will see their way to alter it. Now, Sir, it is proposed to give some £60,000 for the purpose of secondary education. That is either too much or it is too little. It is too much for those localities which do not wish to spend any of this money on secondary education. It is most unjust to cut out a lump sum of £60,000 for secondary education, and to cut out a lump sum of £30,000 for the Universities out of the money which a community like Glasgow themselves thought should be altogether given in relief of rates. And here, Sir, I wish to put in a protest most distinctly against what I regard is the most demoralising and the most unstatesmanlike proceeding of allotting a certain fixed sum of money to a locality and saying to that locality it must spend that money on one special purpose or not at all. That leads to bad administration, and it leads to extravagance. But, Sir, I say that this money is far too little from the point of view of those who want to have a system of secondary education established which will be worthy of Scotland. I have gone into this question very carefully and although I will not go into details now, I should like to ask the House to take the case of Aberdeenshire which has been so well represented in this Debate. Under this Bill Aberdeenshire will get £3,300 for secondary education. What is that for a community of 300,000 persons and something like 90 School Boards. My right hon. Friend opposite me the Member for Berwickshire, informs me that in the county which he represents the endowments for secondary education do not amount to £100, and what a farce it is to offer Berwickshire £700 or £800 a year to set up a system of secondary education. The thing is in fact a mere sop; it is not a scheme. I have no doubt the original intention of the Government was to give the whole of the money to the rates; then they thought, and I do not blame them, they would be paying due respect to the general wishes of the Scotch Members in giving something to secondary education. I think, Sir, the sum is insufficient, but I protest against giving it to communities for secondary education when they do not desire it for that purpose at all. What should be done is to let Aberdeenshire have its £17,000 or £18,000 to spend either on secondary education or anything else that Aberdeenshire likes; to let Berwickshire have its £3,000 to spend on secondary education or anything that Berwickshire like. Now, Sir, I earnestly urge the Government to consider whether they would not be actually saving time if they brought in such a Bill for Scotland as was passed for Wales in the course of two or three Sittings. In the Welsh Act the County Council is authoritative, it gets all of the money, it appoints the Education Committee, and nobody is taxed for secondary education unless with the authority of the County Council. Counties can join in bringing forward a scheme, and the endowments of the county instead of being dealt with by a body of gentlemen at a distance are dealt with by the locality itself and afterwards submitted to the Charity Commissioners. Now, Sir, look at the advantages of that scheme; firstly, it is left to the County Council to say whether they will spend this money: secondly, let the House consider the advantage that arises in the matter of endowments. Nothing works worse than the turning over of whole endowments in Scotland to secondary education, because these schemes are made in Scotland by a body of gentlemen living outside the localities concerned. When the schemes are presented to Parliament, the objections to them are noted down by gentlemen who probably were never within a hundred miles of the place to which they refer. Now, Sir, if the House passed a Bill like the Welsh Bill, the locality itself would deal with these endowments, and any scheme that they might propose would have attached to it all the weight and authority of local public opinion. This would be very valuable in Glasgow and Edinburgh, which do not want to spend this money on secondary education. In Glasgow they have enormous endowments already. Glasgow and Edinburgh would be very glad to have this power, naturally they each like to be mistress in their own household, and they ought to be so. They ought to be able to spend their money on exactly what they know to be in harmony with local wants. That being so, the Government should meet, what I do believe, after having carefully listened to the Debate, to be the wish of the Scotch Members, by putting, at least, £60,000 and the £30,000 from the Universities into Sub-section 5, and then enlarging the two last objects to which the money might be applied from merely local rates to secondary education, and to every object to which this windfall, as some hon. Members have been pleased to describe it, can be applied. Now, Sir, several hon. Members, and notably the Member for North Aberdeen suggested several of these purposes, among them parks, halls, art galleries, and public libraries, wash-houses, and so on. Now, Glasgow does all this already, and when you apply the money in relief of public rates you do apply it to these purposes. Besides, there are the public baths and wash-houses, which are greatly appreciated and much used: most admirable establishments for laundry purposes, where, at a charge of 2d. per day a poor woman can wash her linen in a laundry that, with all the requisites and accessories, would, if belonging to a country house, would cost some £200 or £300 to provide. The gas and water are in the hands of the community, whilst the poorest of the poor have the immense advantage of having the passages leading to their homes lighted with gas free, and can get an abundance of excellent water in public places. You may call this socialism. If socialism means working for the good of society I do not object to the name. You may call it communism. If communism means spending money for the common welfare, then it is a most desirable thing. Glasgow and the other great cities in Scotland, by using so well the money they have already got, have shown the House that they will use well any money they will get under this Bill, and if you want to secure that that money is well spent you can only do it by accepting the great principle of letting people settle for themselves what their local wants are, and giving them absolute command over their own resources.

Mr. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): I have not heard anyone in this Debate attempt to answer the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen, who showed to demonstration that indirect taxation comes very largely from the pockets of the poor, while taxation is paid by the rich. By this Bill the Government propose to take money obtained by the taxation of the poor and spend it in benefitting the rich. Now, Sir, no one Member of the House has attempted to answer, as I said, the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for North Aberdeen, and I think on the whole it was wise, because the speech of the hon. Member was unanswerable. The Solicitor General for Scotland did attempt to deal with it in one small way. It was said by the hon. Member for North Aberdeen that a number of small rate-payers would under the Government scheme only get something like a few pence—something under 1s., and the Solicitor General said he objected to treat the question of the relief of rates in that way, protesting that you cannot measure benefits of that kind by pounds, shillings and pence. But, Sir, whatever benefit a man may receive in the remission of rates, surely he is entitled to measure it as a matter of pounds, shillings, and pence, and in no other way. Hon. Members opposite who spoke in favour of the Bill, say they believe the Bill to be a popular one, and if we are to judge by the circulars received from the Local Boards and Local Authorities, it seems to be very popular indeed. But, I am sure, Parochial Boards do not represent my own constituency in this matter. It is only natural that Parochial Boards should like to spend money which they do not raise by taxation; but look at the extravagance which is sure to occur if we introduce this principle of giving Public Bodies money to spend which they do not raise by taxation. Unless there is a check there is sure to be extravagance and waste. Hon. Members opposite have expressed their gratification that they are on the popular side in this matter. The Member for South Lanarkshire and the Member for the Stewartry perfectly enjoyed the prospect of at last having got hold of a popular question; but, Sir, I am not by any means sure that their view is the popular view. It may be popular with those who do not understand that they are taxed on their whiskey, and their tobacco, and their tea, to get back these few pence on their local rates. I should like the hon. Gentleman the Member for South Lanarkshire, when explaining this Bill to his constituents, to make a quotation from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture last year on the taxation of land. Here is what the Minister of Agriculture said—

“The occupier pays a certain sum for the use of the land, and in that sum are included the rates as well as the taxes. If the rates are high he gets less rent, and if they are low he gets more rent, and I maintain it would not be difficult to show that ultimately the whole of the rates fall on the landowner and on nobody else.”

Sir, in view of that quotation it is established that the Conservative Leaders admit that the relief of rates benefits nobody at all except the landlords. But, Sir, the Minister of Agriculture went on to say—

“I maintain if there is any question of altering the taxation of land, we claim with full justice, and can produce arguments making good our claim, that we are entitled to a decrease rather than an increase of the taxation on land."

Sir, that speech was made last year, and the Government are now trying indirectly to reduce the taxation on land. If money raised by taxation is given to the relief of the rates, indirectly the taxes upon land are reduced. I have no desire to speak for anybody except my own constituents, but I should say that if there is any one thing on which the great majority of Scotchmen are united it is this—that the taxation of land ought to be made heavier than it is at present. That is the view taken by a very large section of the Scotch public, if not by a very great majority; and yet the Government by this Bill are indirectly relieving the burdens on land and taking taxes off the land. The Solicitor General twitted us the other night with not trusting the Local Bodies in which we professed to believe. But, Sir, everybody on this side has said the money should be given to the Local Bodies, to the Town Councils, and to the County Council to be dealt with according to their discretion, and it is the Government and not those sitting on this side of the House who are either afraid or unwilling to trust the Local Bodies. Now, various uses have been suggested for this money that is dedicated to the relief of rates. There are, for example, free libraries, parks, recreation grounds, where they are required, and in my own constituency I would suggest another object—namely, the establishment of free hospitals for accidents, a most deserving public object to which the public might most justly contribute. Most of all I would have liked to have seen some portion of this money devoted to starting a scheme of national pensions. We are nearly all opposed to this Bill for paying over the money towards the relief of local rates, and I do wish the Government would even now accept our proposals, and would give this money to the Town Councils, and to the County Councils to be dealt with by them according to their discretion.

*MR. C. S. PARKER (Perth): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, at the beginning of his speech, complained that no answer had been made to the speech of the hon. Member for North Aberdeen. I confess, for my part, I have regretted that through this Debate there has never been present the one person from whom that answer should have come—namely, the Chancellor of the Exchequer. This Bill raises two questions on Second Reading, one a question of finance and the other a question of education. I think it very important that the House should understand others, if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not here to say it for him, what is the plain and unmistakable financial policy of this Bill. I take that it rests upon this assumption, that the Imperial taxation of this country is, upon the whole, fairly distributed between the rich and the poor. If it is not so fairly distributed, certainly the fault lies as much upon this side of the House as upon that, because every year we have revised the taxation of the country, and always, in my recollection, in favour of the poor. But with that you have to combine the fact that local taxation falls exclusively upon land and houses, and that on the other hand the benefits of it do not accrue exclusively to the owners of land and houses, but to a certain extent to the general population. The policy of this Bill is to divide the money coming from taxes supposed to be fairly divided between the rich and the poor, and to apply that money to the relief of the poor, so that the part of the community which pay nothing or next to nothing in rates shall as taxpayers contribute for the purposes from which they benefit. And when we remember that in England, Wales, and Ireland, most of the money from the taxation to which Scotland contributes has been already so applied, it is tolerably obvious why the same principle should be applied on a similar principle under this Bill. Scotland must have its share; the only question is in what form will Scotland take its share. Three years ago the position was nearly the same. Scotland was then asked to receive her share of the grant in aid of local taxation, but the feeling throughout Scotland was not unanimous in favour of free education, and it was agreed that the money, instead of being applied for relief of the exclusively, should be applied for free education. If that was a right thing to do three years ago, may it not be a right thing now to meet the general wish of the people of Scotland by granting aid to higher education? Now I wish to add my appeal to the Government that they would consider in Committee on this Bill the giving of liberty to Local Bodies to apply this money at their own discretion. My right hon. Friend the Member for the Stirling Burghs intimated that if the Government saw their way to meet us on this point it might in some degree mitigate the objections to the Bill. And, in reply, the Solicitor General for Scotland I understood to say, without absolutely committing the Government—

“The Government were very anxious to meet the wishes of Public Bodies, and, therefore, they would gladly consider any proposition which reached them from those Public Bodies for allowing a certain measure of elasticity in dealing with the money which was to be applied to the reduction of the rates.”

Secondary education, as defined in this Bill, might be another object besides technical education, and it might be a subject for consideration in Committee whether we should not include still further objects. Perhaps I might be allowed to say a few words on the subject of secondary education. For my part I congratulate the Government and Scotland generally on the fact that this Bill is at least one step in advance. It is true that the money under the Bill is quite inadequate for a general scheme of technical education; and it is left rather vaguely to an executive department to manage. But the Bill marks a step of progress which is of special interest to me, because I happen to be a Member of a Committee charged by the Government with an inquiry into secondary education. We had an opportunity two or three years ago of hearing exactly what was wanted by those most interested. We took a great deal of evidence, and ventured to make certain recommendations, and of these perhaps the boldest was that there should be Government grants for secondary education. In this Bill it is distinctly laid down that there should be Government grants for secondary education.

Also the one definite proposal in the Bill with reference to the expenditure of these grants is connected with another recommendation of the Committee—namely, that there should be Government examination of these secondary schools, and leaving certificates to certify the progress of these schools.

MR. ESSLEMONT (Aberdeen, E.): Would the hon. Member allow me to point out that leaving certificates are limited to a very few schools.

*MR. C. S. PARKER: The question of extending leaving certificates to other schools is of course a definite question which I should be very glad to consider. The mode in which the Government propose to apply this new grant of £60,000 is very simple, it is by capitation grant to all schools which are willing so to make their arrangements that the average fee shall not exceed three pounds per head. But the Government evidently propose to retain, to a great extent, the fees at present payable, and which may be considered market prices as between the parents and the schools. And that leads to a difficulty more felt in this House than by those practically engaged in education, the difficulty referred to by the right hon. Member for the Stirling Burghs as to providing some free places. In the first place, I should like to know from the Government whether I am right in supposing that the free places they propose are such free places as were recommended by the Committee—namely, open to children educated in the ordinary schools, and who should be chosen according to their deserts. If that be so, I think it removes many objections that might arise if it were supposed that free places were to be given on the ground of poverty by Parochial Boards. The Lord Advocate mentioned the precedent of such schools as Eton and Winchester, where poor boys sit side by side with others who are paying full market price. But we need not look to England for precedents. Scotland has boys sitting side by side some of whom pay fees and others of whom do not. In old times it was the common practice for those who could afford it to pay fees, while others might attend school without paying fees at all.

And such is the practice in Edinburgh in the Merchant Company's schools and Fettes College, and in almost every large town in Scotland at the present time. I would appeal to hon. Members not to be dominated by an unpractical sentiment that it is against democratic equality that some children should be paying more and some less in the same school. If all the fees are high, the poor will be shut out; if all the fees are low, the funds of the school will be mischievously curtailed. I must express my satisfaction that secondary education is not to be recognised in secondary schools only, but also in rural schools throughout the country. But I see the Government do not propose to introduce it in every parish, and that they calculate on only 5,000 children in country schools. Nor have they said anything of secondary education in evening schools. In one thing it seems to me the Bill is most deficient—namely, organisation. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton suggests how that might be met. But I am afraid his suggestion is not at the present time practical. He proposes that the whole money should be simply placed at the disposal of the County Councils and Parochial Boards, and that simultaneously there should be a Bill for Scotland on the lines of the Welsh Intermediate Education Bill. But what works the Act in Wales is the large Imperial subsidy, whereas in Scotland we should be dependent for funds on Local Bodies each in their own district. However, it might at least be an open question in Committee in what proportions the total sum is to go amongst these Bodies, and, further, the Bill might give County Councils and Parochial Boards a wide discretion, and especially powers to apply the money to technical and secondary education.

*(7.47.) MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): The speech of the hon. Member who has just sat down, and the operation of microscopic balancing which he has been performing, somewhat resembles that experiment of which you, Sir, were a witness on Saturday morning with regard to the metric standard. No doubt the operation was exceedingly interesting; but the uninitiated mind of the ordinary Member will be totally unable to discover exactly what the hon. Member wants to be at, or which side he intends to support.

MR. C. S. PARKER: I am in favour of the Bill.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: I am exceedingly glad to hear it, but I am not sure that any of my hon. Friends who sit around me would have arrived at that conclusion from the speech of the hon. Member. There has been considerable variance of opinion with regard to the attitude to be assumed as to this Bill. It has been said that Glasgow took a different view of this Bill to that taken by most of the Liberal Scotch Members of the House. We have recently had three speeches from Members for Glasgow, and I think a short examination of those speeches will show that the Government have little indeed to rely upon if they think they will get support in Committee from those hon. Members for Glasgow. There was the speech of the hon. Member for Blackfriars (Mr. Provand), who has not had his financial orthodoxy clouded by the savoury smell of the flesh pots of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He has told us he would vote against the Bill, both on account of its principle and on account of its details. Then we had the hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron), who stated that he objected entirely to the principle of the Bill—that it was not a question of a principle being violated, but a question of how certain money was to be distributed. I think that was a very unfortunate position to take up, because I always understood the Second Reading of a Bill was the occasion on which you should take up the question of principle, and that, therefore, my hon. Friend would have been amply justified in voting against the Second Reading of the Bill.

DR. CAMERON: The right hon. Gentleman is misrepresenting me. I said this was a question of taxation and not merely a question of distribution.

*MR. MARJORIBANKS: This Bill never would have appeared before this House if it had not been that a principle was violated, and the whole Bill hangs upon the violation of that principle. Then the hon. Member for the College Division stated that he took exception to our criticism of the details of the Bill, because he said other Members talked a great deal about further aid to education in Scotland, but they in Glasgow did not want such aid because they had £800,000 of capital value of endowments in Glasgow. That, no doubt, is a very good argument so far as he is concerned; but I did not hear him follow that up by saying on the part of Glasgow that they repudiated their share of the £60,000. That would have been a very practical suggestion. But I should like to recall to the hon. Gentleman's mind the fact that in the year 1882, on the Educational Endowments Bill, he was one of a small majority of Members at whose instigation that Bill was considerably restricted, and who were the means of preventing the endowments attaching to certain districts in Scotland being made useful for Scotland generally; he took a parochial view of those endowments instead of a national view, and instead of doing something to make the endowments for education in Scotland available for the people of Scotland generally he did the reverse. I would call attention to a single Amendment in Clause 7 which was made, and which limited the scope of the section. The words were "to provide for higher education in Scotland," but the word "Scotland" was omitted, and the words "those localities to which the endowments separately belong" were inserted instead. Therefore, the scope of the Bill was much limited. But the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton took up a position diametrically opposed to that of the hon. Member for the College Division, because, while condemning all the details of the Bill, he was absolutely the first Member who has spoken during these Debates who ventured to defend the relief of the ratepayer at the expense of the general taxpayer. He looked upon the ratepayer and the taxpayer as the same person, and said, "You are only taking gold out of the pocket of the taxpayer in order to give it to the ratepayer, therefore that is perfectly fair and honest." But that is exactly what we say is not a fair proceeding, and we find fault with this Bill on account of it. We say you have no right to go to the taxpayer, who pays a certain proportion, and hand it over to a totally different body—namely, the ratepayers, from whom the money is levied in different proportions for different purposes. It is perfectly well known that to relieve the ratepayer must, to a large extent, relieve the landlord. Therefore, by a contribution from the general taxation of the country by this proposal—you are going to a large extent to relieve one particular class instead of the whole general body. For my own part, I have no hesitation in opposing this Bill, both on the ground of principle and on the ground of detail. The principle, I maintain, is a bad principle, and is bound to produce evil results. No Scotch Member, I am sure, can remember so much lobbying, log-rolling, and interviewing as there has been with regard to this particular Bill. We have been assailed by Parochial Boards, by School Boards, Town Councils, and County Councils; the Lobbies have been full of such deputations. Hon. Members opposite argue that that shows these various bodies are very much in favour of the Bill. I take leave to object to that idea altogether. As a matter of fact, there is only one matter that these various bodies are generally agreed upon, and that is, that the matter should be dealt with immediately, and that it should be made permanent. They naturally want to make sure of their money in a definite proportion from year to year. Then, with regard to other matters, so far from being united in one view, they are of many minds. School Boards, Parochial Boards, Town Councils, and County Councils have each wanted the money for their own purposes; it has been a general game of grab between these various bodies as to who should get the most money. I object to the Bill both on account of what is in it and on account of what is left out of it. This Bill actually confirms and stereotypes the existing state of things. Scotland, like England, ought to get ten shillings per head for her scholars, whether she gains or loses by such an arrangement, and not have her grant fixed by the number of attendances by school children. Then there is the sum given for education of £60,000. That has been gone into at great length, but I think everyone agrees that that sum is much too small. There is the sum of £30,000 for the Universities—again a proper disposal of money, but not a proper disposal of this money, because we maintain that the Universities of Scotland are a national institution, and that it is from national funds these Universities ought to be supported. With regard to the £50,000 for Parochial Boards, we object to that sum, because we say Parochial Boards are not elected bodies, or are only so in a very small proportion, and that they are not bodies to whom the distribution of public money should be given. With regard to the £100,000 to Town and County Councils, we say it should not be confined to the relief of rates, but that Town and County Councils should have a free hand given them in the matter. I wish to point out that after all this gift of £100,000 to the Town and County Councils will not relieve the rates at all, but will only be the cause of greater expenditure. I pointed out on the First Reading how very small was the relief which would go to the individual ratepayer, and I was somewhat taken to task by some Edinburgh friends on the Corporation. They said they did not intend to apply the money to the relief of the rates, but to effect further improvements. That is not relieving the rates; it is putting money in the hands of various bodies to be used, doubtless, for proper purposes, but that will not relieve the rates. The general defence of the Bill by hon. Members on both sides does not rest on the merits; on the contrary, hon. Members have been most frank in saying that they dislike the Bill in most, if not all, of its details. The hon. Member for the Partick Division (Mr. J. P. Smith) made an excellent speech against the Bill, as did also my hon. Friend the Member for Peebles and Selkirk (Mr. Thorburn), who said if he had the distribution of the money he would treat it in quite a different fashion. But they all defended the Bill on the ground that it was the best that could be done, and that it was in the nature of a compromise. It seems to me that to defend a Government Bill on the ground that it is a compromise is no great compliment to the Government that brings in the Bill. It is quite true that a compromise cannot be altogether perfect, but I maintain that this compromise is neither totus teres nor rotundus—it has neither perfection, smoothness, nor rotundity about it. If my right hon. Friend opposite really looks upon this as a compromise, I would suggest that he should be prepared to come to something like a compromise with us in regard to some of the details. If he will agree to some such compromise as I shall propose, he will find the passage of this measure much simplified and very much eased. There are, I think, three salient points to which exception has been most generally taken—first, the smallness of the sum for secondary education; next, the giving of public money to Parochial Boards; and, thirdly, the want of a free hand in dealing with the money that falls to them by the Town and County Councils. My suggestion to the right hon. Gentleman is that he should take the £50,000 which goes to Parochial Boards, and add that to the sum for secondary education, bringing the sum for that purpose up to £110,000; and that then—of course, I am not now going into the details of how the money is to be expended; that will require further consideration—he should add to the clause giving the money to Town and County Councils a rider which would leave those bodies free to deal with the money in such manner as they think fit. Or, if that were considered to give too much power to those bodies, it might be arranged that they should frame schemes for the use of the money, and that these schemes should be approved by the Secretary for Scotland. I make these proposals in all good faith, and I assure the right hon. Gentleman that giving his assent to them would greatly facilitate the passage of the measure.

Mr. C. S. Parker

(7.8.) MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): The Bill deals with an annual payment to Scotland of £265,000, representing a capital sum of between seven and eight millions, and it also deals with the important question of secondary education. A great controversy has arisen as to whether these questions should be dealt with by Bill or Resolution of the House of Commons. The argument in favour of proceeding by Bill is that the Local Authorities would have a feeling of permanency in regard to the grant made in the Bill. This £265,000 is paid out of the Imperial taxation, but hon. Gentlemen on the other side have spoken as if it were a windfall to be disposed of as the Scotch Members desire. The money must be raised annually by taxation, and the universal practice of Parliament has been, when grants are made out of money raised by taxation, that the grants should be placed on the Estimates, and a Vote taken annually on the purpose to which the money is applied. That was the course pursued with respect to the Road, Police, and Lunacy Grants for years, and no one doubted the permanency of the grants if the money were really required. If, therefore, there is any feeling of insecurity among the parties interested, it is because they fear being able to convince Parliament of the necessity of voting the money from year to year. By proceeding by Bill you stereotype the grant, as was the case with the Lunacy and Police Grants, which were made permanent and stereotyped in the Local Government (Scotland) Act. In the Estimates the sum voted was proportioned to the expenditure, but since the amount has been fixed it has become utterly inadequate, and, as the Lord Advocate has admitted, £25,000 less than it would have been if it had remained in the Estimates. It is a principle that the House of Commons alone should have the power of determining from year to year how the money raised by taxation shall be applied, and the intention of the Government by this Bill is to deprive the House of Commons of its undoubted right to criticise the expenditure of the money, and to give the House of Lords a joint interest—a veto as it were—in the allocation of this money by the House of Commons. I object to that principle. The Government also brought in the House of Lords in the allocation of the Probate Duty in the Local Government Bill, and the Government argue that they are doing the same now as they did then; that is to say, that they are following their own policy. Curiously enough, the Chancellor of the Exchequer has been the first to introduce a Separatist policy with regard to finance. His policy has been to divide the Imperial accounts into accounts for England, Scotland, and Ireland in the proportion of 80 per cent. to England, 11 per cent. to Scotland, and 9 per cent. to Ireland. This money having been ear-marked for Scotland, the question is how is it to be applied? It is a hard thing to say that the Conservative Party, which has only 12 out of 72 Scotch Members, should claim the right to legislate and permanently allocate by Bill this £265,000 of Scotch money. The Government are a complete minority in Scotland on this matter. There are, it is true, 15 Liberal Unionist Representatives for Scotland; but, whatever their individual views, the question of the allocation of this money was certainly not one on which they are called on to differ from the Liberal Party. We shall find that the Government will carry the Bill, a purely Scotch matter, against the wish of the Scotch Representatives. I decline to support legislation which in any way controls the absolute right of the House of Commons to dispose of money raised by Imperial taxation. Another objection I have to the Bill is that it introduces the principle of grants in aid of local rates; but I shall only refer to that to say that Glasgow has just promoted a Bill to alter the incidence of taxation by placing part of an improvement rate on the owner, while this Bill proposes to relieve property at the expense of the people. The grants lead to extravagant expenditure, as the Local Authorities use them for purposes for which they would not care to assess the community. It has been pointed out that the Bill takes the money from the poorer classes and relieves the wealthier classes. The Solicitor General for Scotland (Mr. A. G. Murray) said that as the money came from the Probate Duty it did not come from the poorer classes. It does not matter what particular part of the Imperial taxation you apply to the relief of local rates—the result is the same. If the money voted to the relief of rates were retained there would be a surplus of £7,000,000 or £8,000,000 a year in the National Exchequer, and the probable result would be that we should get a large reduction of taxation. The £265,000 a year is not, properly speaking, an Equivalent Grant for Scotland, but a grant from the Imperial Exchequer for the purposes of education; the object, therefore, of the Bill ought to be to encourage education. These grants have hitherto been capitation grants, and, as England gets 10s. per child in average attendance, Scotland is entitled to exactly the same treatment. The absurdity of the Government proposal is that in calculating the grant they did not take into account the school attendance at all, but they make the payment depend upon the amount paid to England, whether the attendance in Scotland is increased or not, and Ireland, which has more children to educate, gets only 9 per cent. as against Scotland's 11 per cent. Therefore Ireland, which is the poorest country and requires most help, gets the least help. The pecuniary result, so far as Scotland is concerned, will be the same whether we have 10s. per child or the Government proposal; but Scotland is entitled to be paid on results, and the greater the number of children the greater should be the grant, and the smaller the number of children the smaller the grant. There is also an unnecessary complication in the Bill, that which provides that any increment above the £265,000 is to go to the Local Authorities. I wonder the Government did not see the absurdity of introducing this complication, because the Parochial Board has to make up any deficiency in the school funds, so that if the sum be greater than £265,000 there will be just that amount less for the Parochial Board to assess. In consequence of the separation of Scotland from the rest of the United Kingdom the Government have been forced to adopt a certain forward policy in England. In consequence of the claim of Scotland for free education England claimed it and the Government were forced to provide it. There are important principles in this Bill, which, if given effect to in Scotland, will be claimed by England. The first is that the Government ought to subsidise secondary education, and the next is that you introduce the principle of popular representation in all schools which get the benefit of the Imperial grant. This proposal was strongly resisted in the English Bill, but if it be adopted now it will be impossible to resist its application to England. The question of secondary education can be better dealt with in Committee than now, but most of the speakers from Scotland, including the Lord Advocate, seem to have proceeded on the erroneous view, that education in Scotland is merely elementary and as if secondary education were and ought to be something distinct from it. I would point out that the parochial schools prior to 1872 were schools which had secondary education as their object and aim, and they were the feeders of the Universities of Scotland. When the Education (Scotland) Act of 1872 was passing through this House and the House of Lords hon. Members were very jealous for this secondary education, and in that Act the word "elementary" does not occur; but there is a special clause to the effect that the standard of education in Scotland shall not be lowered. It is admitted on all sides that secondary education has been on the decline in Scotland. What are the causes of it? The cause is not the growth of elementary education. The Scotch Education Department, instead of carrying out the law, and giving the larger grants to encourage secondary education, give larger grants to elementary subjects and in that way make it to the interest of the teacher to abandon secondary education and devote his attention to elementary subjects, from which more money could be derived. In that way the action of the Department, which was a violation of the Act of Parliament, caused this falling-off of secondary education. There is also another reason. The policy of the Department has been to drive private enterprise almost out of the field. In Glasgow, in a radius of four miles, there is a population of 800,000, and yet there are only 800 children whose fees are paid by their parents. If you take away the secondary department from the ordinary public school in Scotland, the effect will be that you will lower the tone of the public school and the prestige of the teacher.

(7.31.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I do not know whether the Lord Advocate intends to say anything in the course of this Debate, but I think we have a right to know why we are not having a real and proper equivalent. We were told last year when a large sum was voted for England that an equivalent should be given to Scotland. This is not an equivalent, for we lose by it to the extent of £5,000, and Ireland loses to the extent of between £50,000 and £60,000 a year. Why should we not get 10s. a head on the average attendance in the same way that it is paid in England? I object to the Bill on two grounds—first, because I do not believe that the eleven per cent. Estimate of the Chancellor of the Exchequer is accurate. I will believe it when I see it in Committee; but when I find that for three Sessions running we have been promised a Committee and have not got it, I know that the Government do not want a Committee, and they do not want their facts examined. I say also that the Scotch Members do not accept this proposal as fair and accurate. We object that the less progressive country should determine the equivalent for the more progressive country. Scotland is passing on more quickly than England to the time when all the children who ought to be at school shall be at school, and we ask why should you tie the more progressive country to the more backward one? We want to know why we should be robbed of our £5,000, and why we should have our education retarded by the slower growth of England? We also want to know why you have adopted this system of valuation, and in that connection I will point out that in the northern counties of Scotland, where there are large districts of land which is not of much value, this will press very hardly, and they will not get a fair equivalent. For instance, if Caithness received this grant according to population instead of according to valuation, it would receive nearly 50 per cent. more. I must also make a protest with respect to this grant of £30,000 to the Universities. Three years ago the Chancellor of the Exchequer brought in a Bill by which for a sum of £42,000 yearly we were to give a full quittance for the maintenance of the Scotch Universities and you will find in the Vote this year this sum is put down as a full acknowledgement of the duty of the United Kingdom to Scotland for the maintenance of the Universities. I voted against that, and I shall vote against this, because there is a principle involved. When Scotland entered into the Union there were three or four special institutions which we wished to be preserved, and amongst them was the Universities. When the Scotch Members came here first they had only one vote more than the County of Cornwall, and they made a treaty on behalf of these special institutions. The Lord Advocate the other day declared that to maintain these Universities meant their extension. That may be a clever quibble but it is not a fair argument. You undertook to maintain them and now you say it is a bad principle. But we shall not accept the proposal, and circumstances will soon compel the Chancellor of the Exchequer to take that insult off our Estimates and to bear honourably and fairly the burden taken over at the Union. If you were giving up education in England something might be said in favour of the argument of getting rid of Scotch obligations, but you have been endowing Universities all over the country. (Cries of "Divide.") Some of my Liberal Unionist Friends are calling for a Division, but I would remind them that this a matter of great importance, and if they wish to preserve the Union they should take special care that the obligations which were entered into at the time of the Union are faithfully observed. We hold that the maintenance of the Scotch Universities is a burden which you took over with poor unfortunate Scotland and you must carry it out, and I consider that the attempt of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to get rid of it was mean and contemptible and dishonourable. With reference to the other provisions I object to them all. I object to the scheme of secondary education because it leaves out technical and scientific education, and it refuses to give a single penny to continuation or night schools. This money will go to the middle-class schools. The hon. Member for the College Division (Dr. Cameron) spoke of a way in which this Bill will affect Glasgow, and said that this money which he is most anxious to get will mean 2s. 6d. to every ratepayer in Glasgow. What are the real facts? The valuation of Glasgow is £5,405,000, and Glasgow's share of this money will be £14,203. That will be something like 1d. upon the valuation, but in Glasgow 76,435 of the ratepayers pay only one-tenth of the rates. That is because ratepayers below £10 only pay half-rates, and these people I have mentioned will receive only an average of 4½d. with a maximum of 8d. and a minimum of 3d. But those people who pay the rates will receive an average of 4s. 6d. which will begin at 1s. and go up to several pounds. To the landlords it will be a great boon, but to the working men who returned my hon. Friend it will not mean more than 4½d. I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) is coming round on this matter, but I may say that in the county districts the proposal will not work at all. The people will be able to apply the money to the relief of taxes alone, and they wish to construct piers and harbours but cannot get the money. I do not wish to prevent the House going to a Division now, but we shall break down the conspiracy of silence when we get into Committee. The Front Bench now declines to say a word, but when we get the Bill into Committee we shall insist on full information being given.

BILL—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

*MR. COBB (Warwick, S.E., Rugby), in rising to move—

Dr. Clark

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert clauses in the Bill creating Parish Councils by popular election for the purposes of the Bill, and confer upon such Councils initiatory powers of acquiring, selling, letting, and managing land for small agricultural holdings."

said: I have purposely limited the issue in the Instruction I propose, so as to make it a very narrow one. I do not go into the question of compulsory purchase or of leasing, or other controversial points. I will deal with the simple question, Is it desirable to create popularly elected Parish Councils with initiatory powers of acquiring, selling and letting land for small holdings? It is obvious that the success of any measure depending on the power of the Local Authorities to do with small holdings, allotments, or any kindred subject must largely depend on the authority which has to carry out the powers given by the Act of Parliament. The question is, which is the best authority? There arises, too, another important question, whether that authority should have control over a large area or over a small one? In answer to these questions we have some experience to guide us. We have the experience of the working of the Allotments Act, for, after all, the subject of allotments, so far as the area concerned, is similar in principle to the supply of small holdings. In the electoral campaign of 1885 the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Birmingham said in one of his speeches that whether it was five acres or ten acres, or 20 acres, or even more, it was only a question of degree: the principle was precisely the same. In fact there is no magic in acreage, and I think everyone will agree with me in this—that if the Local Authorities are fit to be trusted to take the initiative in regard to the supply of allotments, it is equally to be trusted in taking the initiative with reference to the supply of small holdings. As the hon. Member knows perfectly well, in the Allotments Act of 1887—and I am speaking now of absolutely rural and agricultural districts, with which I am far more familiar than with towns where there are County Councils—the authority is the Board of Sanitary Authority, or what is generally known as the Board

Guardians. I do not wish to raise tonight, in moving this Instruction, the question as to whether the Allotments Act has been a success, or whether it has been a failure—I have my own opinion as to that, and I have expressed it more than once in this House—but there is one thing that will be generally admitted, and that is, that the authority under the Allotments Act is not a satisfactory authority. I might quote the best opinion we have in this House upon that point, that is the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board. I remember that on the Second Reading of the Allotments Act Amendment Act in 1890 he distinctly said that the Board of Guardians had been proved not to be a satisfactory authority for administering the Act; and indeed the whole reason why the Amendment Act was brought in was because it had been proved over and over again throughout the country that the Guardians had not done their duty in the administration of that Act. When the Allotments Act of 1887 was in Committee we, who are sitting on these Benches, repeatedly pointed out that the Boards of Guardians would be an inefficient authority, and why? We urged—and I think it has been proved since to be true—that Guardians coming from different parishes which are not near each other must be ignorant as to the interests of the parishes except of that from which they are sent. It is impossible for Guardians under such circumstances to be competent to administer the Allotments Act. It is essential in all matters affecting localities that those who have to administer any Act should have local knowledge; and my own experience has proved that there is no matter which requires more accurate and more special knowledge than that of supplying land for allotments and small holdings. The land is naturally of more interest to the people living in the villages than any other subject. The whole lives of the labourers have been identified with it and spent upon it, and they have for years and years been longing that the day will at last come when they will themselves benefit from the land which they have cultivated with their own hands, by either renting it or owning some of it themselves. Now how is this to be done? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian, in the speech which he made in December, 1889, in Manchester, used these words in answer to the question as to how you are to enable labourers to get land either for allotments or small holdings:—

“You must go to the doors of the men who are immediately concerned. You must get from them, and from their immediate neighbours, the fullest advantage of local knowledge.”

I quite agree with that, and I say you will not get that knowledge from Boards of Guardians. It is not too much to say, without questioning the usefulness or non-usefulness of the Allotments Act, that it has proved that Boards of Guardians have not sufficient knowledge to enable them to carry out that Act of Parliament. In 1890 the hon. Member for Hornsey said, from the opposite Benches, whilst discussing the Amendment Bill which was brought in by the President of the Local Government Board:—

“There is no disputing the failure of the Act of 1887. . . . The causes of failure are the large area of the authority and the remoteness of the meeting place.”

I entirely agree with that. It must be evident that the class which is really interested in getting allotments is not represented on such Boards. How much stronger then must be the objections to the larger area of the County Council? The President of the Local Government Board quite recognised that when introducing the Allotments Bill in 1887. The right hon. Gentleman said in the course of his speech:—

“We think that the area of the county is too large.”

The hon. Member for Bordesley, in the numerous Bills he has brought in—and we thank him for the trouble and attention he has given to this question in past years, when it was not so popular as it now is—adopted not the larger authority of the county, but the authority of the Boards of Guardians, and where there might be District Councils he adopted that authority. Now, the District Councils would have the same area as Boards of Guardians, which has been proved under the Allotments Act to be too large an area. Therefore, we must have some smaller authority for the purpose of administering the Acts, and it is clear that Parish Councils ought to be established. They could not be established in every parish, I admit. In one parish in my own constituency there is only one ratepayer and only five inhabitants, which consist of that ratepayer and his wife and children. It would be ridiculous to have a Parish Council in that parish. The question which will have to be decided one day, when a Bill has been brought in by a responsible Government for establishing Parish Councils, is, what shall be the minimum population which shall elect Parish Councils? Take the limit of 200 for the purpose of argument, although some think 300 would be better, and some would go higher than that. The hon. Member for Stamford (Mr. Cust), in an able speech which he made on the Second Reading of the Allotments Bill, compared the populations of parishes, and showed how difficult it would be to establish Parish Councils; but if you take the populations of other elective areas, the variations will be found to be quite as striking. Let me deal first with the populations in the Parliamentary areas for which there are only single Members. Cardiff has a population of 132,000, and there are many constituencies with populations over 100,000; but then there is Durham with only 15,200, Kilkenny with 13,300, and many others with populations under 20,000. The variations are, however, even more striking when we deal with the populations of Unions—that is, the areas presided over by Boards of Guardians under the Allotments Act. In the Union of West Derby the population is 444,000, whilst in Sedbergh it is only 4,000. Still more striking, as it affects this Bill, is the variation in the County Council areas. For instance, in Rutland the population is only 20,600, and in the Soke of Peterborough it is 36,200; whereas the population of the West Riding is 1,307,500, and that of Lancashire 1,768,200, and yet each of these elect a separate County Council. Therefore, taking the minimum as low as 200 for the Parish Council, there is no greater variation between the populations of parishes than of the counties which now elect

County Councils. In regard to this matter the hon. Member for Hornsey, in his speech in 1890, said—

“The cry about the difficulty of small parishes is a mere bugbear.”

I will now deal with another objection which has been taken, as to the financial radius. It is quite clear that the Parish Councils in small villages would not be competent to deal with complicated financial arrangements, although I think the day will arrive when they will be just as competent as County Councils. It has not, however, been proposed, so far as I know, that they should do more than take the initiative in supplying allotments; the rating, borrowing, and financing should be done by the County Councils. The First Lord of the Treasury has said that it was not right that one authority should take the initiative in the supply of land, and that another authority should be called upon to finance it. These are his own words—

“If the rating area is large you can hardly give the power of administration to a small area.”

But I ask, why not? What is there that is unfair in giving the initiative for taking the land to the smaller authority, such as the parish, and rating the area of the larger authority, if ultimately any deficiency is allocated and charged upon the rate of the smaller area? At the present time, as the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture will acknowledge, the County Council borrows on the County Rate under the Public Health Act for purposes the expense of which are ultimately borne by the parish; and under the Allotment Act the County Council or the Sanitary Authority can borrow on the Parish Rate. Now, why should not the parish initiate the taking of land, and the County Council finance it, and either borrow on the County Rate and allocate to the Parish Rate, or borrow direct upon the Parish Rate? This is a very complicated question of rating, and I will not go further into it until we get into Committee on the Bill. I have endeavoured to meet the two main objections to the establishment of Parish Councils—namely, the question of the variation of the population, and also the diffilties with regard to finance. I should w like to ask why are the Tory arty so afraid of Parish Councils? hy does the Prime Minister out of his way to insult the labourers England by assuming that when they e asking for Parish Councils they are ly asking for them as a means of creation? He has said, in his sneer- g way, that he would recommend at, instead of their having Parish ouncils, they should have parish cir- ses. I think that is not worthy of so eat a statesman. Even the Chan- llor of the Exchequer sneers at Parish ouncils. He seems to forget that in 1871, when he was supposed to be a liberal, and when he made a great eech in this House, he stated over d over again that the parish was the oper unit for Local Government. he Bill he then introduced sought to ovide the machinery for the election Parochial Boards, which were exactly e same as Parish Councils. Again, ile standing for Edinburgh in 1885, der the wing of the right hon. Gentle- an the Member for Midlothian, he mphasised what he had said in 1871, d made it a great deal stronger. ow, however, that he is in the place ere he ought always to have sat, ly the last time he spoke of Parish ouncils, at Cambridge in October, he id—

think he will find, when the time es, that the rural population e not so easily beguiled as he nks. Then, too, the hon. Member r Stamford, in the speech to which I ve already alluded, said that if there re Parish Councils there would be excess of local knowledge, which ould stir up jealousy and parochial ad, and produce Communism in the lages of England. The Tory Mem- rs of agricultural constituencies bout denouncing Parish Councils, d say that they are only held out to e people as a sort of bait in order to ch their vote, but this has only pped to prove that their real objec- n to our Irish policy is not to me Rule in Ireland, but to Home le in the English villages. They not like the idea of giving up the rule of the landlords and squ and clergy; and, therefore, in t Bill they would wisely, from t point of view, make the Cou Council the necessary authority. great objection which has been ur to Boards of Guardians is that t have no proper knowledge of, and sufficient sympathy with, the pec for whom they would administer Act, but that objection would ap even more to County Councils. I s published in the papers the other a list of chairmen of the Cou Councils. It showed pretty clea what class they were. In 21 ca they were Peers, in ten Baronets, most of the others were landowne Well, that does not open up a v pleasant prospect for the labourer obtaining small holdings. I beli that whenever the Bill comes to administered the labourers find that the County Coun are worse than the Board of Gu dians for the purpose in questi Why cannot a Conservative (vernment learn by experience? W will not they allow us to and help them to make this real and complete measure? Par Councils are as certain to come as of the reforms of the future. W then, make two bites of the cher Better swallow the whole thing at o and establish the Parish Councils n for the purposes of this Bill. It v be sooner over, and in the end th will be less sacrifice of principle. Noth would give more satisfaction th the establishment of Parish Coun There is no subject which in the l few years has advanced more stead in public opinion than that of Par Councils. They have the support do not say for this purpose—but t are supported for general purposes all those sitting on this side of House, including the Dissenti Liberals. They have the support o great many Gentlemen sitting on other side of the House. I think was in the discussion upon the All ments Act that the Member for Sou East Essex said—

"Parish Councils are the ultimate solu of the allotment question."

I have no doubt that is so, and t Parish Councils are the ultim holdings question. The Member for Berwick for Newcastle, and by a gentleman who knows more about the matter than anyone in the House. Sir Charles Hall at Halifax, who has been successful in acquiring small allotments or small holdings, it was essential to give to Parish Councils the Member for Berwick confirmed the views of the Government, as part of the Labour Party and a revised programme, a very popular Local Government village in the country. On the subject of the President of the Board of Agriculture, some time ago, I moved a resolution, which was carried by a small majority. It may be the result of the question being asked rapidly than any other in the Government Instruction; but in any way to do so, the Government are about the issue, Parish Councils shall be asked for the purpose in the villages; the management of all their affairs, for their own benefit of the land which they, have rendered useful

(Mr. Bridge, Wisbech): In the Instruction, I am in favour of a representative of an agricultural body. I am perfectly satisfied that there is no other interest among the rural population than small holdings, and the Government. In Norfolk the area of the County Council is too large, and it is for these County Councils the duties arising from the provision of the benefit of those to advantage. It is essential that the land to be taken for this purpose should be suitable; should be in a proper situation, and that the tenants who are to occupy it should be worthy men. I am perfectly certain that if this Act is administered through a central authority at a distance the work will not be as well done as it would be done by Parish Councils working on the spot and knowing the peculiarities of the locality. The large landowners and large farmers who are numerously represented on the County Councils are strongly opposed to this proposal; and if the administration of this Act is given to them they will certainly not do their best to give effect to its spirit. Whilst I am of opinion that the administration of this measure should in the first instance be with the Parish Councils, I am perfectly well aware it is necessary that there should be a right of appeal to the County Council. There is under the Allotment Act an appeal to the Local Government Board, and in the same way a right of appeal should be given from the Parish Council to the County Council. Sir, the whole tendency of Local Government at the present day is towards decentralisation; and what harm can there be in taking away from the County Councils those duties which obviously they cannot properly perform and giving them to local representative bodies? The hon. Gentleman the Member for the Strand Division, in his speech upon the Second Reading of the Bill, said we on this side were disappointed because the credit of initiating the measure could not be claimed by us. For my part, I cordially congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture in going so far as to propose to institute small holdings, and I hope his effort will be successful. Speaking on behalf of a constituency that has as good if not better land than any other in England, I hold that there is a fair field for small holdings, and I feel that they will be taken up with avidity and worked with advantage to the country at large. I beg to second the Instruction.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert clauses in the Bill creating Parish Councils by popular election for the purposes of the Bill, and conferring upon such Councils initiatory powers of acquiring, selling, letting, and managing land for small agricultural holdings."—(Mr. Cobb.)

(9.16.) MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): The hon. Gentleman, in moving his Instruction, concluded his speech with a peroration intended for consumption outside. He tried to make this House believe that the question involved in this Instruction is whether the House generally agrees with the principle of Parish Councils or not.

MR. COBB: I said for the purposes of this Bill.

MR. LLEWELLYN: If the hon. Member imagines for a moment that it is possible in this Bill to introduce the question of Parish Councils, he is imagining what is an absolute impossibility. We are not called upon to speak on that point now; but I know of many parishes where Councils could be formed to do good work—I mean in parishes of sufficient size. I have tried to get some indication of what size the parishes should be capable of electing Councils. There is work that, in my opinion, could well be left to these Councils. I should like, for example, to see the care of the outdoor poor given to the parish. But the practical point I wish now to discuss is the financial part of this scheme, and I would ask if there is anybody who imagines that the Public Works Loan Commissioners or any other body would lend money to small parishes on such slender security as they could give? The Parish Council would meet in the schoolroom; it would be attended by 20 or 30 labourers; clerks would have to be appointed, a paid treasurer, an overseer, and assistant overseers.

MR. COBB: I said distinctly that I proposed that all financial matters connected with the scheme should be dealt with exclusively by the County Councils.

MR. LLEWELLYN: I dare say the hon. Member did. We have many of us devoted our lives to this question, and it is absurd for other hon. Members to come here to talk in an amateurish way, and to retail second-hand what they are told by other people. I had the honour of a seat on the Committee which inquired into this matter, and my opinion is that unless the Treasury advances the money straight away there is no other body possible than the County Council. They must, of course, go to those on the spot for information. Under the Allotments Act, the Rural Sanitary Authority does not move one finger without consulting the parish, because the parish has to pay. I agree with the hon. Member that in purchasing the land for small holdings you must be dependent upon the parish for information. But the Bill will be inoperative if you leave it with the parish to carry out financial arrangements. They would not have the credit to carry it out. Our object is to make this Bill a practical measure, and to pass it in such a form that those whose duty it will be to carry it out will be able to do so successfully.

MR. LEON (Bucks, N.): As a new Member of the House, I ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes whilst I make a few observations upon a matter which is of great importance to a rural constituency. I am not going to follow the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in his remarks as to the question of finance, for I distinctly understood the hon. Member below me (Mr. Cobb) to say that the County Council would have the control of the finance, and that the Parish Councils would merely have the duty of obtaining land for the rural labourers and others requiring it. It is, Sir, because I represent a constituency which is peculiarly interested in this very important question that I desire to say a few words. Parish Councils should be elected not only for the purposes under discussion to-night, but for many other purposes, and more especially to take up this Land Question for the benefit of those who desire land. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that the object of the Instruction moved by the hon. Member for Rugby is to show that the unit of local government shall be the Parish, and not the County Council, and it is because I strongly favour this view that I support the Instruction. A Parish Council would know the requirements of the parish better than the County Council, such as whether the application for small holdings was bona fide; whether to meet the demand by purchase or by hiring; where land was most suitable, having regard to the landlord's preferences and the tenant's or buyer's requirements; the nature and value of the land and its recent cultivation, and it could more easily, more satisfactorily, and more equitably estimate the outgoing tenant's compensation. It would also know how much land each applicant could properly cultivate, and would be in a position to know whether the land, after it had been acquired, was being economically and successfully managed. It would, besides, be better able to prevent, owing to its local knowledge, the foisting of any poor, exhausted land upon the parish by impecunious landlords at a price beyond its market value; it would always be available on the spot to hear disputes and applications, and to determine the many points that will necessarily arise as to the management of the land. The applicants or holders of the land would have no hesitation in approaching their representatives forming the Parish Councils and telling them any of their grievances. These are the chief reasons why I support the Instruction of my hon. Friend. Now, Sir, I believe everybody in this House is in favour of passing this Bill into law, in order that the people may more easily obtain land. But, as a business assembly, let us, in the name of common sense, see that, in passing legislation, we are, at the same time, erecting machinery that is suitable for the purpose we have in view. I maintain that the machinery introduced by the present measure is not the best machinery for the purpose. And why? Because County Councils, as at present elected and chosen, would be overloaded with the work which really ought not to be put upon them. Their areas, as my hon. Friend below me says, would be too large, and it would not be possible for them to do the work. I will read to the House what the Spalding Commissioners said on this Small Holdings Bill on Friday week last. The Commissioners said—

"They have decided to petition the Board of Agriculture and ask that the authority to enforce the Small Holdings Bill should be the Sanitary Authority in urban districts instead of the County Council, and the Board consider they would be better able to deal with the requirements of the town than the County Council would be."

Mr. Leon

I quite agree with that. It shows, at any rate, that there is a decided opinion against the County Council being the body to administer this Act. In fact, speaking for the constituency which I have the honour to represent, I may say that they would be one and all—at any rate those who think the same as hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House—be very much in favour of having Parish Councils as the unit. Why should this House waste its time in passing a Bill into law which would be of no more use after it had been passed into law than the present Allotments Acts? And I maintain that these Acts are practically, to all intents and purposes, useless. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings) laughs. But that is no argument at all. Anybody can laugh, but that does not produce any effect upon individuals who are very much interested in this question. I have had some experience as a member of the County Council in Buckinghamshire as to the utility of the present Allotments Act, and the Chairman of the County Council on 11th February said—

"The difficulty of carrying out the Act of Parliament became more apparent the more they tried to act upon it."

Well, what is the use of wasting the time of the House passing a Bill which will have no more effect than that? Does the Government mean business or does it not? If it does mean business, at any rate let it try to meet the requirements of the people by giving those people who are going to benefit by the Act of Parliament power to put the Act of Parliament into force themselves, and not give to an almost foreign element like the County Council in some rural district, as regards the minor requirements of the villages, the ultimate putting of this Act into force. That is the first practical step, and because I desire good results from our labours I heartily support this Instruction.

*(9.35.) MR. GRAY (Essex, Maldon): One remark of the hon. Member who has just sat down I quite agree with—namely, that the House should treat this question with common sense. But it appears to me, if we are to act in accordance with common sense, we must try not to put the cart before the horse, but the horse before the cart. If we, in a Bill of this sort, go into such a difficult and intricate question as the appointment of Parish Councils, it will be a case of putting the cart before the horse. I appeal to my hon. Friend who has just sat down, and who values common sense so highly, to consider whether this is a question in which we should undertake to set up so far-reaching an authority as a Parish or District Council? The hon. Member told us the opinion of the County Council of Buckinghamshire. I remember a few weeks ago our Radical friends were trumpeting about the country the great victories they said they had gained at the County Council elections. Now we are told that these County Councils, which are formed so much of members of the Radical Party, are not to be entrusted with a matter of this sort, because they know nothing as to what should or should not take place in connection with country life and so on. But, surely, if the County Councils contain such a large number of thorough-going common-sense Radicals, hon. Members opposite might put more trust in these bodies than they seem inclined to give them this evening. I do not know whether the hon. Member who moved this Instruction has paid much attention to the provisions of the Bill, for it seems to me that there are great safeguards in this Bill for the interests of the rural population, or the labourers as they are called in the Bill, being properly attended to. In the first place, the County Council is popularly elected. No one can dispute that. I see from the Bill one or more persons can approach the County Council on the subject of small holdings. Do not you think that wise? If one or two of my neighbours can go to the County Council and request them to make a thorough inquiry as to whether or not there is a demand for action, I fail entirely to see that there is any just cause of complaint as to the machinery which is set up in this Bill. I would ask the hon. Member for Warwickshire how many people he would have approach the County Council on a matter of this sort?

Mr. COBB: I want the County Council to do something when they are approached.

*MR. GRAY: First of all I am dealing with the merits or demerits of the County Council, and I wish to say a word as to how the County Council can be approached. I would ask the hon. Member for Warwickshire whether he will find any fault with this part of the Bill which enables one or two men in any village to approach the County Council on the subject? Is that progressive or is it not? One villager or one labourer, however humble their positions, can approach the County Council on the subject. What fault have hon. Members opposite to find with that so far? I ask them again, is it not in accordance with common sense? And is there any reason to suppose that the County Council, having been approached by one or two labourers in this way, would hesitate for one moment to try and get all the local information they could get from the village or district whence those one or two persons came? I am not sure whether it would not be a fair amendment to bring before the House when we get into Committee that the County Council might have power, as to the Committee which is talked about in this Bill, to inquire whether or not that Committee must be entirely confined to members of the County Council. I am rather afraid, as the Bill now stands, the Committee which is talked about in this section must be confined to members of the County Council. But, whichever way that may be, it seems to me if any hon. Member, when we get into Committee, likes to move as an Amendment that this Committee, which is to be set up in certain circumstances should consist of one or more persons outside the body of the County Council, that, at any rate, would be a fair point of debate. But whether the County Council should do that or not, everyone knows that they could and would claim the advice of practical people living in the localities from which the demands came. Considering the formation of the County Council, considering that one or two persons from the village can go to the County Council and make a claim, considering that they can then set up a Committee to inquire into the demand, and considering that the County Council would naturally, before they said "Yes" or "No," get all the evidence they possibly could from practical men and labourers in the district where the demand came from, is there any real and substantial grievance in the proposals of the Bill? I rather think that the real purpose of the Instruction is to enable the hon. Member who moved it and his friends to go down to their constituents and say—"We proposed you should have such and such powers, but, of course, the Conservative Party would not listen to it."

(9.44.) MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): The hon. Member who has just sat down appears to think that there has been a want of common sense and common honesty in making the proposal now before the House, and he says the object of it is to enable the hon. Member who moved the Instruction and his friends to go to their constituents and say, "See what we offered you and what the Conservatives opposed." I should not call that straightforward conduct—it is such conduct as I have never practised, and the imputation of which I should resent either as regards myself or the hon. Member who moved the Instruction or his friends. I think the House is indebted to the hon. Member, and I will say why. I can understand why Members of the Conservative Party should sneer at the action taken by Members on this side of the House upon this question, for they do not want it to be mooted. But our contention is that the only thoroughly sound and permanently satisfactory method of dealing with this question of allotments is the completion of our system of local government by the constitution of minor and subordinate areas within which such a measure could be brought into operation. Whose fault is it that we have not got those areas? The Government brought in a measure of Local Government in 1888, and carried it by the help of this side of the House, and they would not have carried it by the help of that side of the House alone. Does any Member venture to dispute it?

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, I do, distinctly.

MR. STANSFELD: Very well, I will take the word of own words on that occasion. Whatever doubts there may have been in his mind at first, he had seen reason to abandon them and to admit, as the Leader of his Party admitted, that he had received assistance from this side of the House in carrying that measure, and that he was indebted to us for our assistance.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir, I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but there is a vast difference between that statement and the statement he first made. I acknowledged thankfully then, as I do now, the assistance which the Government got from right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite in carrying that Bill; but I never said, and was very far from saying, that we could not have carried it without their assistance.

MR. STANSFELD: I never accused the right hon. Gentleman of saying anything of the kind. I expressed my own opinion in that respect, and I did not presume to quote the opinion of the right hon. Gentleman. But I say, speaking my own opinion now, as I am entitled to do, that on those benches opposite there was very considerable opposition to the Bill; and the right hon. Gentleman admitted, as he says he did—and I do not mean to impute more—that he was indebted to us for our assistance in passing that measure. But as soon as he had passed the County Councils portion of the Bill, he dropped the rest, including District Councils, and all reference whatever to Parish Councils, or Parish Vestries, or any parish organisation. We appealed to him at the time to persevere and to have a little more patience and a little trust, saying, "We have supported you so far, and we will support you to the end;" but the right hon. Gentleman refused to do so. I am not blaming him for that, for these are questions of tactics, methods, and possibilities of time, and I have never doubted that he would have been glad to accept our offers of further assistance if he could have done so. As a matter of fact, however, he did not avail himself of them; and the Leader of the House at that time assured us that in the next Session, if possible, the subject should be taken up; but from 1888 whatsoever has been made by the Government to complete the scheme of Local Government. I say that, under these circumstances, the hon. Member for the Rugby Division was perfectly justified, and more than justified, in bringing forward this question; and it is not fair to say, and there is no ground for saying, to him that this is a clumsy and awkward way of dealing with the subject by introducing the creation of popular Councils into an Allotments Bill, because he has been forced to the adoption of that method by the fact that the Government have not redeemed their promises, and have not created a Local Government hierarchy which would have been sufficient, in his view, for the purpose. Mr. Speaker, permit me, in order that there may be no mistake so far as I can prevent it, to state what are our views, and I believe I can interpret them with fair accuracy, upon this subject generally. We hold that the County Council is the wrong authority for administering a Small Holdings Act, and I therefore cannot agree with hon. Gentlemen opposite that the County Council is the right authority, if you can have a choice of authorities in this matter. I am a member of a County Council. My County Council in Sussex is a thoroughly business Council, and I have a high respect for it; for we do not waste our time in speeches, but devote it to the transaction of business. I believe that Council would itself feel that it was not the fittest body for the administration of such an Act as this. The distance of the place of meeting from the outlying parishes of the county is a very serious fact, and want of local knowledge is another. It is perfectly true you may get that knowledge by deputy, but that is not the best way of getting knowledge, or of applying it. Is it not evident that the best way of dealing with the subject is to begin with the small area, and constitute an authority for the small area if you can, so that you may have the initiative based on local knowledge of the wants of the people, the character of applicants for small holdings, and the nature of the soil and its adaptability to the wants of the people who wish to occupy it, and the price which ought to be paid for it? Such a body should take the initiative, and leave the higher authority of the district, or the County Council, to judge of the financial proceedings. An hon. Gentleman sitting opposite to me said that the parish would have no credit; but I cannot admit that proposition, because a parish has credit and does raise loans.

MR. LLEWELLYN: I was speaking of poor parishes.

*MR. STANSFELD: In that I should entirely agree. We all agree that the smaller parishes should be amalgamated, and I have always said that some of these parishes would be too small for representative bodies, and I should prefer open Vestries, with power of appointing committees if the work would be better done by committees than by the Vestries themselves. I say, therefore, that you should take the Parish Council as the unit of local authority, and give it the initiative in dealing with this subject of allotments. It is stated that it must be financed by the County Council, but the County Council would hesitate to finance it if it had got no credit. Has that never occurred to the hon. Gentleman opposite? I do not believe that it would be felt to be the duty of County Councils to finance small and poor parishes which have no credit. Well, suppose you begin with the parish, largely interpreted as I have endeavoured to interpret it, there are certain things which must be borne in mind. There must be, first of all, an appeal for those who want allotments when the Parish Authorities refuse to obtain them; and there must also be an appeal for the landowner or farmer to some superior County Authority against the Parochial Authority. If the Parish Council from personal or Party motives should make victims of the landowners or the farmers, and take land from them when land could be taken elsewhere with greater fairness which was as fit for the purpose, I should say that would be an ill deed on the part of the Parochial Council, against which there ought to be an appeal to some superior County Body. All I maintain is that the principle should be accepted that the small area is a fit area for the administration of the Act, and, therefore, I hold that my hon. Friend has done good service in bringing this question before the House. The true remedy, in my opinion, and in our opinion on this side of the House, is the completion of the system of Local Government. As soon as you have a hierarchy including the parish, the district, and the County Council, you will have no difficulty whatever in taking the initiative steps, and you will have no difficulty in securing an appeal from the Parish Council, it may be, to the next grade, or straight to the County Council. At any rate, you will have the whole arrangement devised, constructed, and existing under which you may proceed with the greatest facility. We have been told it is impossible and absurd to attempt to set up Parish Councils in this Bill. I do not say it is easy; but again, I ask, whose fault is that? As I said before, it is not the fault of my hon. Friend, who makes the best of circumstances, and proposes to devise Parish Councils for this purpose. I do not believe you will say that it would be impossible to do so, and I do not think it would be very difficult to do so. It only requires patience to discuss clauses to carry it out, and that patience would not be wanting on this side. I think it is a fair proposal which might well be considered by the Government. I hope I have succeeded in showing that we have had a ground for the course which has been taken, and that the best possible method would be the perfection of that system of Local Government towards which we have been looking vainly for so long, and that, if practicable, it would be well worth while, even at this moment, to attempt an instalment of that future perfection by the construction of Parish Councils, which should have the administration of these allotments.

*(10.2.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford) : I rise, Sir, for the purpose of pouring oil on the troubled waters, and I am bound to say that the right hon. Gentleman displayed somewhat unnecessary heat with regard to the hon. Member for Essex (Mr. Gray), who said nothing to deserve the attack made upon him. The right hon. Gentleman complained altogether of the authority which is proposed for the purpose of carrying out this Bill. He says that an authority presiding as it does over so large an area is quite unfit for the purposes and duties with which it is to be entrusted. That, of course, Sir, is an opinion which the right hon. Gentleman is perfectly entitled to hold; we are also entitled to ours; and having given some thought to the subject, we have arrived at the definite conclusion that, under present circumstances, the County Council is the proper authority. But the right hon. Gentleman was not satisfied with that; he proceeded to attack my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie), because these authorities were not already in existence; and "whose fault was that?" said the right hon. Gentleman, shaking his finger at my right hon. Friend. My recollection is that the Local Government Bill which my right hon. Friend introduced made ample provision for the creation of Local Authorities other than County Councils; and if the right hon. Gentleman will carry his recollection back to the torrent of eloquence on every conceivable subject from hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on that side during that Session, I do not think he will find much difficulty in discovering the reasons which compelled my right hon. Friend, towards the close of the Session, greatly to his regret and to the annoyance of the Government to which he belonged, to drop these clauses for the purpose of carrying his Bill. I think the right hon. Gentleman is treading on somewhat dangerous ground when he asks whose fault it is that these authorities are not in existence already; for, unless my memory greatly deceives me, the Government of which the right hon. Gentleman was a most distinguished Member year after year, and three years in succession, announced its intention, in the Gracious Speech from the Throne, to introduce and carry measures for this purpose, and I am unable to recollect that it ever took a single step to give effect to that promise. Now, Sir, I pass from the right hon. Gentleman—I hope I have said nothing unfair in reply to his observations—to the subject more immediately before the House.

MR. STANSFELD: Nothing unfair at all. But if I may be allowed to correct the right hon. Gentleman, the only part I had in the matter was the passing of the first of an intended series of measures—a Rating Bill. I had no chance of doing anything more.

*MR. CHAPLIN: The right hon. Gentleman was a Member of the Government which at that time made the promises and failed to carry them out.

MR. STANSFELD: No; I was not a Member of that Government at all.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Then I apologise to the right hon. Gentleman; I thought he was a distinguished Member of every Liberal Government since I have been a Member of this House. I think it is unnecessary to point out to the House that it did not even need the speech of the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion to show quite clearly to the House what its effect must necessarily be. It deals with a question which I acknowledge is extremely important, but a question which is entirely separated from the measure immediately before the House. What the hon. Gentleman proposes and asks the House to embark upon at this moment is another and a most important step, a further and large development of local self-government. That is a question on which everybody knows the views of the present Administration, because my right hon. Friend at the Local Government Board has on one occasion—and, I think, on more than one occasion—in this House announced the intention of the Government, on a proper and fitting occasion, when opportunity arises, to deal not only with the question of District Councils, but the question also of parochial reform. But I think it must be evident that the Government, whether it be Liberal or Tory, must decide, and they alone, what is to be the order of their business, and which kind of business is to take precedence over the other. As regards the Instruction of the hon. Member, I am bound to say it is not a question which ought to be tacked on as a kind of offshoot to another proposal entirely different from it, such as that which I have had the honour to introduce to the House, and which would, in my judgment, if we accepted the Motion, be entirely swamped by it before the end of the Session. I am not going to make any reflections on the hon. Gentleman or his intentions, but it must at least be evident to the House that he knows perfectly well that the subject with which he asks us to deal and to tack on to this measure is one of enormous dimensions. We have absolute proof of his views before us at this moment, because he has himself introduced a Bill on the subject. I have looked at this Bill, and I see that the acquisition and sale of land in small portions is dealt with; but the hon. Gentleman found it so large and intricate a subject that he has been obliged to devote 41 or 42 clauses to the consideration of the subject. The Bill which I have introduced to the House for the provision of small holdings is, comparatively speaking, the most modest measure in the world; it contains only 18 clauses altogether. Then the hon. Member, by way of lending most able assistance in the matter which I have so much at heart, comes forward with his proposal which involves the addition to my Bill of a measure containing no less than 40 clauses. The hon. Member has not had a very long experience of this House, but he has been a Member long enough to know that the way to get a Bill passed through the House is not to encumber it with an enormous addition of that nature. As to what may be the hon. Gentleman's views with regard to the Small Holdings Bill I offer no opinion; but it is a measure which I am sincerely desirous and anxious to pass into law, and on that ground alone I am afraid I must oppose the proposal of the hon. Member. As to the merits of the question of Parish Councils being more appropriate for dealing with such a measure, it is not necessary now to enter, but my hon. Friend behind me spoke of some difficulties connected with finance. The hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr. Cobb) proposes, so far as I understand, that the County Council should finance the Councils and raise money on the county or parish rate just as they please. How much are they to raise? Does he agree with the limit of one penny which is proposed in the Bill, or is he prepared to go a good deal further? I think the ratepayers of Warwickshire will probably be glad to know something more of the hon. Member's opinion on this point. Of course, the hon. Gentleman is perfectly well aware that a penny difference. I complain of the way in which the right hon. Gentleman has misrepresented—if I may say so—the whole meaning of the Instruction of the hon. Member for Warwickshire (Mr and be merely transplanted in our old age to London; our whole lives may have been spent in observation of agricultural questions, but if we are not large landowners, with large rent rolls, we are told that we know nothing about the wants of the agricultural labourers and agricultural questions. The Government scoffed at our warning when we told them that the machinery of the Allotments Act was useless, and they have had to change it. We warn them now that though the County Councils are a better machinery than the Boards of Guardians, yet that they must somehow or other get into touch with the parish, and if you do not accept our warning you will assuredly have to come to Parliament (if you are still on those Benches) for power to alter your authority. If you have all the knowledge you have no excuse. You know what the people want. You were told that at the Ely and Shrewsbury conferences. You had it dinned into your ears over and over again that the people want Parish Councils.

MR. CHAPLIN: No, no!

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I will undertake to find in the newspapers the records of half-a-dozen agricultural labourers, who got up and said boldly, undeterred by the Peers and landowners, they wished for Parish Councils.

MR. CHAPLIN: What about the other side?

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I do not know about the other side. I am speaking of the utterances of the few genuine agricultural labourers whom you imported into your conferences. We have told you frequently that we will never be satisfied until there is an initiative in a popularly elected Parish Council, and if you choose to leave with us the task of crowning the edifice, which you are so worthily beginning, it will be to our Party advantage, and to your Party loss. No one has ever suggested that Parish Councils should have the power of borrowing public money on their own initiative. It is only suggested that they should have the power to lay before the County Council their requirements, and the Council, if they approve, and after full examination, should borrow the money, and that, I think, is perfectly safe and reasonable. But we are continually told that we have got Parish Councils; that there are the Vestries who will be able to approach the County Council on the matter. Approach; yes, you can call spirits from the vasty deep, but will they come? You must remember that the County Councils are told by your Bill to decide in the first instance whether the Act is to be put in force at all in their county or whether it is not; and if a County Council decides that it will have none of your Act, what then becomes of the approach of the parish, with whom we wish the initiative to lie? What guarantee have we that the County Councils will not take this course? I think from what we already see the inference is that some of them will. I do not agree that this Instruction of my hon. Friend raises the whole question of Parish Councils. We shall raise it before long, but we do not raise it to-night. We are most certainly going to raise the whole question in the near future, but all we ask you to do to-day is to take Clause 16 of your own Bill as your model, and give us some authority other than the County Council which should make use of the knowledge, and give utterance to local aspirations and local needs of the poor labourers for whom you say your Bill is intended.

(10.25.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordesley): The question we have to consider is what will be the best for the rural population in carrying out this Bill. Then we have to consider whether the proposition of the hon. Member for Rugby can be carried out with safety to the passing of this Bill, and whether if carried it will be good or bad for the rural population whom this Bill proposes to benefit. The right hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld) spoke very warmly about the completion of county government, but he knows the time that that subject will take, and I wish to know whether he would postpone this Small Holding legislation till this great scheme is completed? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Stansfeld) made one statement which made me think he had not studied the Bill. He stated that a County Council would charge a parish for the sums spent in the parish and debit it to a small area.

The Bill expressly says that the cost shall fall on the entire community, and if hon. Members wish this Instruction for Parish Councils to be carried out and with it the financial liability, they will strike a great blow at the poorer districts. I was agreeably surprised to find that Her Majesty's Government has been so liberal. They are more liberal than Members on this side of the House; they are not creating a sort of Newcastle programme, but a practical measure. I think a feature of this Bill, which calls for special commendation, is that which uses the credit of the whole county for the benefit of the poor districts. If they relied on their own credit they could not get the money, and I would ask the hon. Member for Rugby how he could expect to borrow money if he said he was only liable for the deficiency. I am astonished at the crude proposals of the hon. Member for Rugby, and it seems to me that the 9th clause provides, at all events, something of what he wants. I think, first of all, it is impossible if we do carry this Bill through that such great proposals can be embodied by means of a few clauses in a Bill dealing with an altogether different question; when we know by this Debate, and by the Debate of last year, what a complicated difficult question it is. And then, forsooth, we are to take that difficult question and graft it by means of a few clauses on a Small Holdings Bill. Therefore, the hon. Member for Rugby said, "Let us but consider what the issue is." According to his mind it is for or against Parish Councils. But let us also see what the issue is. The issue is a Small Holdings Bill or no Small Holdings Bill; the issue is whether we shall take this Small Holdings Bill with the only authority available at the present moment, or whether we shall seek to introduce clauses which cannot possibly be carried; and so by a side-wind to kill the Bill. And I venture to say with all respect—I say it with great respect, because I am anxious in the interests of the labourers to get this Bill—and I say, what the hon. Member for Rugby will not deny, that if this Instruction is forced on the Government, I challenge any Member on this side to deny that the Bill will have to be dropped for this Session at least. Even if it were to be carried, I suppose a Boundary Commission would have to be set to work to re-arrange the parishes, and the County Councils would take at least a couple of years before that could be done. Altogether it is a separate, a distinct, and a great question, this county government; but a question altogether separate and apart from the question we are considering. I have always been for Parish Councils for certain things which I know perfectly well they can do; but there are certain things which I know it is impossible for them to do. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax will admit that Parish Councils are not good for sanitary matters; the area is not large enough. I have studied closely Communal Parochial Councils as we may call them, and the result of their sanitary arrangements has been such that it can only be paraphrased as the nastiest business that you can find in all Christendom. Only last year I was in Switzerland where I saw two parishes in one of the Communes at law. One of them positively stopped up the whole of the outlet of the drainage of the neighbouring parish; and there was no possible exit for it until the question between the two parishes was settled. I am aware that there are a number of things which could be appropriately managed by Parish Councils, but sanitary matters are not of the number. If you wanted a warning you might take the School Boards. If you want to find defective schools, where the Board of Management have only one idea, that of keeping down the rates, and where they care nothing for education, go into the School Boards of small parishes, and you will find there that it is an area too small for the management of that particular business. As sanitation, so education, and I venture to say if there is one question more than another that is not for the benefit of the number to be benefited, that is not suitable for the small area of parishes, it is the question of small holdings. Allotments are different things altogether, because you only want a few acres of land for allotments. Here you want large areas to cut up into farms up to 50 acres in extent, and therefore it is in a very different category. I am very anxious for the sake of the labourers that we should not create this difficulty in the way of the carrying out of this Bill. Take the size of the parishes; take the hon. Member's own county of Warwick. There is one Union, and I notice that of 22 parishes 13 of them are under 500 inhabitants, nine under 300, and five under 100, and some of them as low as 58 persons. Well, the rateable value in some of these parishes is under £500, whereas the rateable value of the whole Union is above £100,000, and I want to use the credit of the wealthier area for the benefit of the smaller areas. If you take Wilts, for instance, you will find in one Union, where there are 30 parishes, 18 are under 500 population, 14 are under 300 population, and four under 100 population. And so, if you go through all the agricultural counties, you will find the same result. Now, I do not anticipate that there is a difficulty in grouping parishes, but if you group them sufficiently you come into District Councils, and there is no difference between the Government and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax. What he has alluded to is the avowed object of the Government, which I hope, in the interest of county government, will be carried out; but if we have to wait for this plain and simple Small Holdings Bill till we see that carried out, why we shall have indefinitely to postpone the realisation for a Small Holdings Bill at all. I am anxious to get a Small Holdings Bill, and I will tell my hon. Friend why: Because if we do not get it now, I am not sure when we are going to get it. I am pretty certain we shall get reform in county government complete in itself, some time, but I am not sure when we shall get a Small Holdings Bill. There is no doubt this Small Holdings Bill will disappear if this is fastened on to it; and all the country will see how impossible it would be to carry through a great Bill if something foreign to it is to be fastened on to it. Therefore, I am anxious this Session to see passed this Small Holdings Bill. After waiting so many years for this legislation, now that we have got it at our doors I am afraid hon. Members are so fond of it that they are going to smother it in their embraces. I am aware that the wish, for Local Government, District Coun-oils, and parochial reform, which is in the immediate programme of the Government, could have been realised last year or the year before; but that has not been done, and it is evident, if we listen to right hon. Gentlemen and hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House who are in such a hurry for a Dissolution, we shall not be able to get it this year. But the Members of the Government have already announced their intention, and it has not been carried out. With regard to the previous Government, for three several years the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Halifax, the House will remember, had a Bill down for the reform of county government; and he was unable to find time to do anything with it. The present Government, at any rate, has done the big frame work—the top and most important part of it—that is a very good beginning; call it foundation if you like. But it seems to me that it is the very biggest measure of administrative reform that we have seen in this generation. I was surprised to hear the hon. Member for Rugby, and I think my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Winterbotham), and one or two other speakers, criticise these County Councils, and say they were not going to do anything—that they were not going to adopt this, that, and the other. What has become of your popular representation, your household franchise, and vote by ballot? The complaint really is that the people do not return the men that hon. Members would like. In the interest of the labouring population, and for the sake of getting this Bill, and being anxious not to see it defeated by a side wind, while being quite in favour of Parish Councils for doing the work for which Parish Councils are fitted, I shall vote against this Resolution.

*(10.43.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): Some of us are equally anxious, with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down, that this Bill should be made into the best possible Bill for the rural population; and when the hon. Member asks the question what good the introduction of parishes into this Bill could do, I have no hesitation in answering him that, in my opinion, the introduction of parishes in some form or other would be the best thing that could be done for the labouring poor in the rural districts. We believe that the parishes would know a larger amount about the needs of the population, about the character of the applicants, and about the lands that they would be placed upon, than any body sitting at a distance such as the County Councils. We do not propose by this Instruction to force on the right hon. Gentleman who has charge of the Bill, the re-organisation of the whole structure of parish government. But we do ask him to have some power given to the parishes in the initiation of the working of this Act; and my hon. Friend who has moved this Instruction has specially put in the word "initiatory," in order that it may indicate that it has been our wish that the parish should perform nothing more than an initiatory act in introducing benefits which this Bill was intended to confer on the labouring population of the rural districts. The hon. Member has also referred to this Motion as one intended to postpone or retard the passage of the Bill. It seems to me to be better sometimes to postpone or retard the passage of a Bill than to pass a Bill that will not work when it is passed. The House may recollect that in the case of the Allotments Bill the same kind of language was used in the same quarter. Then the question was: an Allotments Bill or no Allotments Bill? We got the Allotments Act, and what was the result of it? The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had to bring in another Act to try and make the first Act work. We do not want the Small Holdings Act to be in the same position. We want to have it put in the best possible form at the earliest stage, in order that we may be in a better position to bring home to the rural population the benefits contemplated in the Bill. In this Bill the House has an important extension of the Allotments Act. The best portion of the Bill is that which creates the holdings from one to ten acres. What I am most anxious about is that this Bill should be made as effective as possible in the interests of the rural population, and to accomplish this the body to be charged with the carrying out of the Bill should be in sympathy with the rural population. The Rural Sanitary Authorities have shown their unwillingness to carry out the Allotments Act. It is for this reason that we desire to bring the parishes into the working of the measure, and it would become more acceptable and useful if the right hon. Gentleman would consent to the present Instruction. It is, I believe, the only way in which the Bill can be made workable.

Question put.

(10.57.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey), in rising to move—

"That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have powers to insert Clauses in the Bill providing that, on the petition of an Urban Sanitary Authority, or of the Vestry of a rural parish, or of Vestries of two or more rural parishes jointly, to the Council of a County within which the district of an Urban Sanitary Authority, or such rural parish or parishes, is or are situate, the County Council may make an order empowering such Urban Sanitary Authority, Vestry, or Vestries, to exercise powers of acquiring, selling, letting, and managing land for Small Agricultural Holdings by voluntary arrangement with the owners thereof, subject to approval by the County Council."

I said: My Motion is a very different one to that which has just been decided, and it is of a much more modest character. For some time past there has been on the Paper a new clause which set forth fully and precisely the machinery by which I propose to carry out my Instruction. The object I have in view does not go beyond the scope of the Bill, and the machinery to carry it out does not displace any portion of the arrangements of the Bill as it now stand. My suggestion, if adopted, would merely provide additional resources to those existing in the Bill; the machinery to give effect to it would be wholly at the discretion of the County Councils to adopt, reject, or ignore as they think best. It seems to me that the machinery of the Bill is placed at the top, whereas, in my opinion, it should be incorporated and developed more symmetrically throughout the framework. The authority of the County Council is too remote. From my own experience of the Middlesex County Council is that, although there are a large demand for allotments, as been only lately that an Allotments Committee has been formed. The Committee has not yet met, and there has not been any application made to it on behalf of the labourers. Therefore, I submit that there should be an authority of some kind created which would enable the inhabitants to take counsel together, to shape their proposals, and to gather confidence, an element which is essential for the carrying out of the important proposals contained in this Bill. There are many of the inhabitants whose life-acquired knowledge will be available, and that will go far towards facilitating and cheapening the arrangements that would have to be made under the Bill. We know very well that this measure has proceeded from an anxiety to arrest the depopulation from the rural districts. The Bill has been described as an experiment; but it is the kind of experiment having for its object the providing of land for the rural population and the arrest of the rural depopulation; and unless we are successful on this occasion, there will be no doubt be throughout the country a strong feeling of despondency. My proposal is, shortly, this: to enable parishioners to meet in Vestry; then they would make a proposal to the County Council, which the County Council would consider; and if they thought the proposal was reasonable in itself and a business-like proposal, they could delegate it to the Urban Authority or the Parish Committee. Then the Parish Committee would shape the scheme definitely and would bring it up to the County Council, where it would be considered at a meeting, notice of which had been given by advertisement several days previously, so as to invite objections and to secure these objections being properly considered before the County Council gave its sanction to the scheme. That would be a complete safeguard to the persons affected, as the whole thing could be relegated to the County Council for their sanction and approval; and, after hearing them, the County Council would sanction and confirm. Then, Sir, I provide that if the Parish Committee did not acquire the land within twelve months, or if in any way they did not appear properly to carry out the duties entrusted to them, it is reserved to the County Council to revoke their Order, and that any property acquired shall revert to the County Council themselves.

I propose—and this is one of the points of difference between myself and the hon. Member for the Rugby Division—I propose that the County Councils should be elected by an annual meeting of the inhabitants interested. I am most impressed with that form of Local Government not only as having endured longest, but as having been the most successful of any which the country has seen. Another point of difference is, that I think the Parish Committee should not be elected for a fixed term, but only until their successors are appointed. In a small parish, where everybody knows everybody else, it is preposterous that parishioners should be asked to surrender their discretion, their judgment, their rights, and their liberties to the Parish Councils for the term of three years. I think that great danger would be likely to arise, especially in small parishes, from the arbitrary nature of the control that might arise. This is the most important, as it ought to be one of the most popular, of the safeguards. But they would have a great deal of unpaid service and service on the land without circumlocution, which would surely enable them to do the work cheaper, and they would be able to do much of it more efficiently and with greater satisfaction than a distant authority which must act through a large number of officials who would have no direct interest, whereas the inhabitants of the parish would have an immediate interest. In time the County Council might become a kind of landlord of petty holdings. By the plan no doubt the parish would have to pay, but it would get something in return for the payment. In the scheme as it stands under the Bill, parishes will have to pay, but they will get nothing in return for their payment. The parishes themselves will do as they used to do in olden times—seek their own condition from those natural conditions which incline them to seek to get together. It has been said that at a penny rate very little could be done. But, as the money can go further, the parish, so far as its resources are concerned, will get more for its money.

The average rateable value of a parish in Lincolnshire is £4,000, and a penny rate will supply 20 labourers with an acre each, or 40 with half an acre each. As the object of the Bill is to arrest the depopulation of the rural districts, I submit that the best way to arrive at that end is to fix the labourer upon the soil as a freeholder. It is only by diffusing the benefits of the Bill as widely as possible amongst the labouring population that the desired end can be obtained. I beg to move the Instruction which stands in my name.

(11.23.) CAPTAIN BETHELL (York, E.R., Holderness): In seconding this Instruction I would like to say that my hon. Friend who has moved the Instruction is not sufficiently sanguine. He suggested that the President of the Board of Agriculture is not likely to accept the suggestion, but I still hope the right hon. Gentleman may see his way to do so. My primary object in supporting the proposal is, I believe, somewhat different from that of hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. I look forward primarily to this; if we can create some machinery by which parishes can acquire small quantities of land, at a time not in the very distant future, will come when parishes will become possessed of the fee-simple of the land, and where the land will become a property which the parish can use for the benefit of the inhabitants. Objection has been taken that the parish will not be able to manage the financial part of the arrangement, but I am inclined to think there is no reason why the parish should not be able to manage its own finance. At the same time, I think the action of the parish should be submitted to the County Council for approval. Secondly, I think that the parish, ruling as it does over a smaller area, would be a body much more fitted for taking over and dealing with small quantities of land. I wish it to be understood that this is merely a supplemental proposal. The County Council will retain its concurrent power. I certainly entertain a sanguine hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture will be disposed to view this proposal favourably.

Mr. Stephens

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That it be an Instruction to the Committee that they have power to insert Clauses in the Bill providing that, on the petition of any urban sanitary authority, or of the vestry of a rural parish, or of the vestries of two or more rural parishes jointly, to the council of the county within which the district of such urban sanitary authority, or such rural parish or parishes, is or are situate, such county council may make an order empowering such urban sanitary authority, vestry, or vestries, to exercise powers of acquiring, selling, letting, and managing land for Small Agricultural Holdings by voluntary arrangement with the owners thereof, subject to approval by the county council."—(Mr. Stephens.)

(11.30.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): The hon. Member who submitted this Instruction to the House was prudently anxious—and I find no fault with him on that account—to clear himself from any suspicion of complicity with those who sit on this side of the House in reference to the present Bill. He stated that his proposal was a more modest one than the proposal which had just been rejected, and I entirely agree with the hon. Member that his plan is quite distinct from our plan, for we reluctantly have arrived at the conclusion that no plan can be made thoroughly effective without introducing into it the element of compulsion. The hon. Member does not introduce the element of compulsion in any form into his plan, and he therefore vindicates his own character and his political orthodoxy by showing that he is not in the ranks of those dangerous politicians who sit on this side of the House. The question I now have to ask myself is not whether we can give up portions of our own distinctive plan in order to agree with the hon. Member, but whether, supposing our plan to be rejected, the Bill will be improved by the adoption of the plan of the hon. Gentleman. Now I have in my mind the melancholy anticipation that our proposition will be rejected by one of those commanding majorities such as was announced a short time ago. Therefore it is our duty as men of sense, if we have any sense, to look this question in the face, and to consider it as a man does when he has presented to him the alternatives of half a loaf or no bread. The hon. Gentleman fairly offers us half a loaf. I see no objection to the introduction of the voluntary plan of the hon.

Gentleman. The proposal I think does credit to him, and so far as I understand the development he has given to it in the clauses appearing on the Paper it fully sustains the spirit of the proposal itself. If we adhere to the principle of compulsion, it is not for any love of compulsion—it is from the somewhat sorrowful conviction that there are so many landlords in the country who are absent, who are ignorant or indifferent, or who are opposed to the objects we have in view, that we do not see that we can dispense with it. I, for one, entirely meet the hon. Gentleman on the ground that, so far as the voluntary principle will carry us, by all means let us act upon it. Now let us look at the proposition of the hon. Member. As I understand the matter, there are three points which are considered to be of vital importance by the great bulk of those who occupy these Benches. One of these is the establishment of Parish Councils, meaning by Parish Councils Councils which are essentially local bodies—essentially local—and having local information, as contradistinguished from bodies acting for the entire county. The second element in our plan is the point of compulsion, and the third point, and perhaps the most important of the three, and certainly in my view not the least important, is the introduction of a tenure less than a freehold. Now the hon. Member adheres to the voluntary principle, but distinctly he introduces two points for the attainment of which we on this side of the House are most anxious, and I cannot help cherishing the hope that to these points Her Majesty's Government may not be inclined to entertain any vital objection. The first of these is that there shall be some description of initiatory power given to bodies who shall be on the spot and well acquainted with the circumstances of the spot, so as to know who are the persons needing small holdings, who are the persons most competent to take them, and qualified by honesty, solvency, and character to make a good use of them. That is a knowledge which can only be possessed by persons on the spot, and the hon. Gentleman frankly makes us this offer by saying that the County Council may, on the application of the Sanitary Authority or Vestry, authorise the putting in motion such bodies possessed of local information and local experience. Then the hon. Member not only does this, but he adopts our view in all its breadth that a tenure inferior to freehold must be introduced into the Bill if it is to be made a Bill of any real value. As a Bill for the creation of a class of small freeholders I understand and appreciate it, and within its narrow limitations it will be of some value. I do not in any way desire to depreciate it in that direction, but it is not a Labourers' Bill. It should be called a Small Freeholders' Bill, not a Small Holdings Bill, for it contemplates no other small holders than freeholders. Let it not be supposed that we in any way grudge this creation of small freeholds, but these freeholds are unattainable to the great mass of the labouring population. Attainable they may be to certain favoured individuals in a village community—the village carpenter, the blacksmith, or other tradesman; the head keeper, the head gardener, or other head servants of the neighbouring landlord. To all of these the offer of a small freehold may be valuable, but to the labourer struggling to maintain his family from week to week upon the wage of the week the offer is almost illusory unless some inferior tenure to freehold be introduced. The hon. Gentleman proposes that the County Council may give power to an Urban Sanitary Authority or Vestry to acquire, sell, let and manage land for small agricultural holdings, so that under the aegis of the voluntary principle the hon. Member offers us these most valuable, most essential objects, and why should these objects be opposed by Her Majesty's Government? Surely they must agree that what we want is to give a personal and profitable interest in the land to as many as possible of the rural population who are solvent, respectable, and capable of using small holdings to their own advantage. Why should Her Majesty's Government object to the proposal? Had it come from us I admit it might have been considered open to suspicion; but coming as it does from their own supporters who have both recommended it in speeches couched in a spirit of comprehensive intelligence, I cannot abandon the hope that Her Majesty's Government will be inclined to entertain the proposal with favour. Though the hon. Gentleman has expressed a desire that his proposal may not be associated with that which has been made by us, I venture to assure him that I shall certainly give a hearty vote in favour of his Motion, and I would cordially advise anyone who is at all inclined to listen to me to do the same.

*(11.40.) MR. CHAPLIN: If I had been more favourably disposed to this proposal than I am, I own that my suspicions would have been at once aroused by the extreme cordiality with which it has been received by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not quite understand why he dwelt so much on the new form of tenure he says the Instruction will import into the Bill. I do not follow the right hon. Gentleman there. I do not think he is correct in saying that; because, although it is true that the Instruction refers to the power of acquiring, selling, letting, and managing land for small agricultural holdings, that power of letting is not excluded from the Bill now before us. One of the main objects of the Government has been to create an additional number of freeholds, and we adhere to that; but in regard to the letting of land, that is also provided for by clauses in the Bill, and whether it is desirable to extend those clauses or to keep them as they are is matter for consideration in Committee. I listened closely to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved this Instruction, and, as I understand, what he proposes is this: that a County Council shall be enabled to give power to an urban Sanitary Authority, to a Vestry or Vestries, to exercise powers referred to by voluntary arrangement with the owner of the land. But I am bound to say I fail to perceive exactly what it is the hon. Member expects to gain, what advantage he expects will be derived from these additional powers. Anybody in any county can petition the County Council for a small holding, and thereupon the County Council is bound, if it supposes the Petition is made in good faith, to appoint a Committee, and that Committee is bound to make inquiry into the merits of the question. The hon. Gentleman said, from his experience, that these Committees authorised under the Allotments Act had never been appointed; but, if I remember rightly, the power in those cases is entirely permissive; but here in this Bill it is laid down distinctly that the County Council shall appoint a Committee and shall cause an inquiry to be made. The hon. Member says it is not the right way to go to work; but I question exceedingly whether the procedure he recommends will be any benefit at all in that direction. The hon. Member gives power to a County Council to delegate its powers to an urban Sanitary Authority or to a Parish Committee, a Committee for a parish or a group of parishes to be elected by the Vestry; but I do not remember that there is any machinery provided for this election. But if the powers to be conveyed to the Committee are not used, if the land is not acquired, all these powers are to be immediately revoked. On the other hand, if the powers are used, if the land is required, the County Council, if it thinks fit to so, has the right to declare that they shall not be put in force. It does seem to me that we make no progress by this scheme—that nothing is gained in the interest of those who desire to possess small holdings by the incorporation of such provisions into the Bill. In the Bill as it stands at present, part of the powers of the County Council are delegated to a Committee which will be partly composed of members of the County Council and partly of the allotment managers in the parish where the land is situated, and all the powers of the County Council may be delegated to that Committee, with the exception of the power of acquisition. When you come to the power of acquisition of land by these Parish Councils which the hon. Member desires to see introduced into the Bill, we are met at once with precisely the same difficulty we should have had had the Motion of the hon. Member for the Rugby Division (Mr. Cobb) been accepted.

MR. STEPHENS: The right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say there is the greatest possible distinction between my proposal and that of the hon. Member for Rugby. I have never advocated Parish Councils. I have simply had recourse to the old authority of open meeting of the inhabitants in Vestry assembled by whom the Committee would be appointed.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Quite so; I understand that; but I was about to point out the difficulty which would result if the parish proceeded to the acquisition of land. Although the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Commander Bethell) proposes that the limit of the rate should be 4d., that does not seem to be the view of the hon. Member who moved the Instruction. If the rate is to remain, as I think it ought to remain, at a penny, which is amply sufficient for the purpose of making the experiment we desire to make, then I do not see how it would be possible for any parish authority to give anything in the nature of real effect to the Bill. They would not be strong enough to do it; they are entirely inadequate to the acquisition of land, and no matter what the delegation of power in their hands the Act would become, in my opinion, a dead letter. The proposal is open to another objection which would make me extremely sorry to see it incorporated in the Bill, it is open to the objection pointed out by the hon. Member for Bordesley (Mr. Jesse Collings), that it would involve the admission of causes of delay. I cannot look with any approval on the proposal of my hon. Friend, and I hope he will not think it necessary to carry his Motion to a Division.

Question put.

EXTRACTS BILL.—(No. 119.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CALDWELL (Glasgow, St. Rollox): I hope the House will agree to give the Bill a Second Reading. It makes no alteration in the law, but in a very simple manner saves much time and expense. It has the approval of legal authorities, and the Government offer no opposition to the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Caldwell.)

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): If the House will now consent to take the Second Reading of the Bill, I undertake that ample time shall be allowed before taking the next stage.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): The object of the Bill is of such a character that I am afraid I cannot consent that the Second Reading should pass sub silentio.

Second Reading deferred till To-morrow.

GAMING ACT (1845) AMENDMENT BILL.

[Lords.—(No. 247.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): This Bill only consists of one clause, and its object is to remedy a defect in the Gambling Act. Under that Act, all debts payable on account of bets made and lost are void and irrecoverable at law. That was the state of the law for many years until within the last few years, when it was decided that such debts are recoverable when made through agents, and not as made between principals. Obviously this is a scandalous state of the law, and never intended; discreditable alike to the law and the Judges who have to administer it. The Bill has gone through the House of Lords without any dissent. Its object is clear, and I hope the House will not think it needs discussion.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Tuesday, 5th April, 1892.

LOCAL AUTHORITIES (ACQUISITION OF LAND) BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read.

LORD BASING: My Lords, I do not propose to move the Amendments of which notice has been given, but to reserve that for the Standing Committee.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, before the matter is disposed of I must say this. In addition to the very odd collection of Statutes which are engrafted into the Bill by—I was going to say the draftsman, but I will spare the susceptibilities of my noble and learned Friend (Lord Thring)—I do not see him here—by the author of the Bill, I will say, in his drafting, I observe that among the Amendments suggested one is to get rid of one of the provisions of the Mortmain Act, viz., that which renders it necessary that a person who makes a present of land for the purposes suggested should survive at least a twelvemonth. I am not enamoured of the Mortmain Act, as I have said more than once; but, if that provision is wrong, it ought to be repealed, and it ought not, for this particular purpose, to be got rid of in this way. I do not understand that we have got to do it now, but that it is to go to the Standing Committee, and I wish to give warning what will happen to it when it gets there.

LORD BASING: I am certainly very willing that these Amendments and any others shall be discussed in the Standing Committee, and I only wish it were in my power to secure that this and other Bills—I think I may say Government Bills—should set out the whole of the provisions in previous Acts to which they refer.

House in Committee (according to order); Bill reported without amendment, and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

QUESTIONS.

THE PROCURATOR FISCAL AT TOBERMORY.

MR. FRASER-MACKINTOSH (Inverness-shire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that, notwithstanding the answer given by his predecessor, on 16th May, 1890, to the question of the hon. Member for the College Division of Glasgow, in reference to Procurators Fiscal acting against crofters before the Crofter Commission Courts, Mr. William Sproat, Procurator Fiscal at Tobermory, therein specially referred to, acts for the landlord of the Penmore estate in Mull against crofters named Maclean; whether it has been brought to his notice that the said Mr. Sproat, in at least two letters in connection with the Maclean case, uses paper with the engraved heading "Procurator Fiscal's Office, Tobermory;" and whether he will take more effective steps in this case?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I am informed that the Procurator Fiscal at Tobermory has acted as agent for the Penmore estate for upwards of 40 years, and that in the early part of May, 1890, he appeared before the Crofter Commission in the case now under appeal referred to in the question. Mr. Sproat is not restricted from carrying on private practice, and is, therefore, quite within his right in so doing. Having regard, however, to the opinion expressed by my predecessor in July, 1889, in which I fully concur, I shall communicate with the Sheriff on the subject. As regards the second part of the question, I am informed by Mr. Sproat that it is not his practice to use such letter paper in connection with his civil business, but it is quite possible that from inadvertence he may have done so.

Secretary to the Treasury if, having regard to the importance of the Civil Service setting an example to private employers in granting a little extra leave privilege to those who serve the country in the Volunteer Force, the various heads of departments will be authorised to allow, so far as the exigencies of the Public Service permit, Civil Servants who are Volunteers to be with their regiments as required by the War Office on the Saturday before Easter without deduction of annual leave, by combining in that week the usual Saturday half-holiday and that in the succeeding or some other week?

of 14 and 15 miles. From the deposition of the survivor of the Holmrook, it appears that the weather at the time was densely thick with snow. I do not think any useful purpose would be served by holding a formal inquiry in reference to this case, which, so far as I have gathered, appears to have been one of reckless navigation.

THE POLICE AT DRUMOND, COUNTY MONAGHAN.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) (for Mr. T. M. HEALY, Longford, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether for years past a police hut, containing a sergeant and three constables, has been maintained on a farm at Drumond, Ballytrain, County Monaghan, from which a Protestant farmer named Dandy was evicted over ten years ago; whether there has been any outrages to justify this; and, if so, what were the outrages, and when did they occur; whether he is aware that the sole occupant of the place now is a single young woman, and do the Executive maintain that she requires four policemen to protect her; at whose expense is this done, at whose request, and will it be continued; will he state why the sergeant from this hut habitually parades up and down outside the Catholic chapel during Divine Service, although himself a Protestant, and not brought there on protection duty, and why the same parade was kept up during a recent mission; is the local Protestant church similarly paraded; and as the Catholic congregation resent this action towards themselves, would the Government explain whether there is any greater reason for it at this chapel than at other Catholic places of worship in Ireland?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Constabulary Authorities report that the police hut referred to was established in November, 1886, owing to the then lawless condition of the neighbourhood. Meetings had been held for the purpose of intimidating the tenant of the farm referred to, and to induce him to surrender the farm. The only occupant at present is the sister of the tenant. The action of the sergeant is for the purpose of preventing illegal meetings of the local branch of the National League, which has been suppressed. The Constabulary Authorities contemplate the establishment of a permanent police station in the district.

MR. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the fifth paragraph of the question.

MR. JACKSON: The meetings of the League were held in a hall facing the chapel, and it is with a view of detecting attempts to hold illegal meetings that the sergeant has been placed on duty there from time to time. There is no intention to interfere in any way with the chapel.

MR. M. HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not said a single word about Sundays. The question relates to Divine Service.

MR. JACKSON: I presume the answer covers that point. Meetings having been held in the hall facing the chapel is the reason for the action of the sergeant.

MR. M. HEALY: Is it suggested that illegal meetings are attempted during the hours of Divine Service?

MR. JACKSON: That I do not know.

MEDICAL OFFICER IN THE LISMORE UNION.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland will he explain why the Local Government Board of Ireland have refused to sanction the increase of salary of £20 (from £100 to £120) per annum of Dr. Kenny, medical officer of the Tallow District, in the Lismore Union; is he aware that his district is the only one in the Union having two dispensaries, and that the number of tickets have greatly increased within the last few years; and in view of the fact that his predecessor enjoyed a salary of £120 per annum, and that he has been in the Poor Law service eleven years, and that the representatives of the ratepayers, who would have to pay half the additional salary, have repeatedly urged his claims to an increase, the Chief Secretary will suggest to the Local Government Board to re-consider their decision?

MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Board have felt it necessary to decline to sanction increases of salary except where the medical officer has had long service in the district, and where other circumstances exist which render an addition to the salary specially called for, such as a marked increase in the work since the date of the officer's appointment. The medical officer mentioned has been only some five years in his present district, nor did the Local Government Board as the result of their inquiry find that there were any other special circumstances in his case.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): As the predecessor of the present medical officer received the salary the Board refuses to sanction now, and as the work has increased very much, may I ask the right hon. Gentleman to make further inquiry?

MR. JACKSON: I know nothing about the circumstances of his predecessor; but, as I understand, the present medical officer has been in office only five years, and since his appointment there has been no increase of work.

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): Is it a fact that representatives of the ratepayers have unanimously in meeting recommended that the claim of the medical officer to an increase in salary should be acceded to?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know.

MR. WEBB: I will call attention to this matter in Committee of Supply.

THE ACHILL VIADUCT, COUNTY MAYO.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether any steps have been taken by the Board of Works to ascertain the cost of the extra work executed by the contractor in the building of the Achill Viaduct, County Mayo, owing to their alteration and enlargement of the original plans and specifications, the substitution of steel for iron, &c.; whether he is aware that the Grand Jury of Mayo have already paid their portion of the extra cost; and whether, seeing that the contractor holds a certificate from Mr. Peddie, engineer in charge, showing that the amount of work claimed for has been done, something can be done to compensate the contractor for the outlay—namely, £2,700?

SIR H. MAXWELL (who replied) said: The hon. Member will hardly expect me to repeat the answer given to a similar question on 10th March last year by my right hon. Friend the then Financial Secretary, but I have no further information now to give.

MR. SEXTON: It is contested whether the contractor has been compensated, that is the point I wish to elucidate. Are the Treasury or the Board of Works intending to make any inquiry?

SIR H. MAXWELL: The contractor was appointed not by the Board of Works but by the Grand Jury of County Mayo.

TELEGRAPHIC FACILITIES AT KILIMORE, COUNTY GALWAY.

MR. ROCHE (Galway, E.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware of the great inconvenience felt by the inhabitants of the market town of Kilimore, County Galway, owing to the want of a telegraph office there; and whether he will make inquiry as to the desirability of having the telegraph service extended to Kilimore?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): I will cause inquiry to be made, and will let the hon. Member know the result.

CATTLE DISEASE IN NORTH ESSEX AND KENT.

MR. ROUND (Essex, N.E., Harwich): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture if he can see his way to relax the restrictions now placed upon certain petty sessional divisions in North Essex, either by limiting the area of the district now scheduled as infected, or by permitting licences to be given in special cases for the removal of stock (in those petty sessional divisions where there has been no outbreak of disease) into adjoining petty sessional divisions or to the Metropolitan market?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I regret to say that foot-and-mouth disease is still in existence in the Saffron Walden district, and under the circumstances it is quite out of my power to make any relaxation in the rules, though I hope before a very long period it may be possible to do so.

MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): Can the right hon. Gentleman see his way to relax any of the restrictions on the removal of cattle in the County of Kent?

MR. CHAPLIN: No; I answered that question in the negative the other day. There has been a further outbreak of disease only a few days ago.

CONTINENTAL ANARCHISTS.

COLONEL HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his attention has been called to the reported expulsion of 40, or more, reputed Anarchists from the territories of the French Republic, and to the fact that, as the frontiers of Germany, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, and Belgium are closed to them by the administrative laws of those nations, and also, to a great extent, the ports of the United States, by the Acts of Congress forbidding the immigration of undesirable aliens and artizan competitors, the United Kingdom is practically the only refuge for the rejected of Europe; and whether, having regard to their increasing numbers, he proposes to take any steps for the legislative reinforcement of the powers of the Executive in the matter? In putting this question to my right hon. Friend, I wish also to ask him if his attention has been called to the reported arrest yesterday of a Frenchman and a Portuguese with bombs upon them at the very door of the Spanish Parliament, and to the Report for 1886 of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Explosives detailing dynamite outrages in this country, or the Continent, and in America, and recommending that "as the law has signally failed it should be declared by international agreement that these attempts, like piracy, are crimes against humanity?"

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have no information which leads me to believe that the French Republic has expelled, or is about to expel, from its territory members of the criminal classes. If there were any probability of such action on their part, an diplomatic remonstrance were not effectual to prevent it, Her Majesty's Government would not hesitate to ask Parliament for such further powers as might appear necessary. With reference to the second question added this morning, I have seen in the newspapers that a Frenchman and Portuguese have been arrested under the circumstances mentioned. With regard to the quotation, however, from the Report of the Inspectors for 1886, should point out that the Inspectors are not giving their own opinion, but quoting from a pamphlet written by an American citizen who felt warmly of the subject of dynamite outrages.

THE PRISONER O'LEARY IN MOUNTJOY PRISON.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (Tipperary, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether Thomas O'Leary, now incarcerated in Mountjoy Prison, was, after his probationary term of nine months, placed to work in the shoemakers' shop; whether it is the usual practice to give prisoners, after probation, employment in the open air; and, if so, why was the custom departed from in the case of O'Leary; whether the shoemakers' shop in Mountjoy Prison is in an unhealthy situation in the basement, badly ventilated, with water-closets inside; whether O'Leary's health has suffered in consequence of being compelled to work in this shop for years without change; whether it is usual for prisoners to be changed from one class of work to another on their own application; and whether O'Leary made application to the Prison Authorities for a change of employment in the open air; and has his request been refused; and, if so, why?

MR. JACKSON: The General Prisoners Board report that the facts are as stated in the first paragraph. The practice is not as stated in the second paragraph, inasmuch as prisoners who have a taste for trades are in their own interest taught such trades during and after probation. Prisoners acting as shoemakers and tailors receive one hour's exercise in the open air daily.

and a longer period on Sundays. This custom has been followed in O'Leary's case. The shoemakers' shop at Mountjoy is not unhealthily situated. The medical officer reports that it is well ventilated, well lighted, well heated, and that sanitary matters connected with it are carefully attended to. The prisoner has in no way suffered as alleged. On the contrary, the medical officer reports that he is in robust health. The reply to the fifth paragraph is in the affirmative. As regards Paragraphs 6 and 7, the Prisons Board report that this convict's applications for employment at outdoor labour have been several times granted.

PLEURO-PNEUMONIA AND SWINE FEVER.

SIR E. GREY: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether any case of pleuro-pneumonia now exists in Great Britain; and whether he is yet prepared to introduce a Bill, as urged upon him by a deputation from the Central and Associated Chambers of Agriculture and Farmers' Club in February last, to provide means for dealing with swine fever similar to those adopted in the case of pleuro-pneumonia?

MR. CHAPLIN: No case of pleuro-pneumonia exists that we know of, because we have ordered the slaughter of all animals showing signs of the disease, and of those animals which have been in contact with diseased animals. It would be premature, however, to say the disease has disappeared; there have been three or four cases discovered in the present year. As to the second part of the question, it would be quite beyond the resources of the Department to attempt to deal with swine fever until we have arrested the spread of foot-and-mouth disease, to which all the energy of the Department is directed at the present time.

ARBITRATION TREATIES WITH FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of both Houses of the American with any other Power, it is intended by Her Majesty's Government to enter into communication with the American Government, with a view to the negotiation of such a Treaty between Great Britain and the United States?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penrith): On the 2nd August, 1883, the right hon. Member for Midlothian was invited by the hon. Member for the Bordesley Division to reply to a question almost identically the same as that of the hon. Member for Northampton. On that occasion the right hon. Gentleman is reported to have replied, "We are not prepared to do anything of the sort." Her Majesty's Government, although holding the same opinion as that which was held by the Government of the right hon. Member for Midlothian, do not desire to give quite such an abrupt statement of their views. Her Majesty's Government have shown that they are not averse to referring to arbitration several matters of dispute which have arisen between themselves and foreign Governments; but there are questions, such as those involving the title of the British Crown to territory or other Sovereign rights, which Her Majesty's Government could not pledge themselves beforehand in all cases to refer to arbitration.

PRINCIPAL CLERKSHIP, CUSTOMS STATISTICAL DEPARTMENT.

MR. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) (on behalf of Mr. DARLING, Deptford): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury when it is intended to fill up the vacant principal clerkship in the Statistical Department of Her Majesty's Customs?

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL (who replied) said: This vacancy has occurred in the ordinary course, and the Board of Customs will fill it up in the exercise of their discretion. I can give no date.

DISTRIBUTION OF TAXATION GRANT IN SCOTLAND.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether,

Bill, he will lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing how much each county or burgh in Scotland will receive of £100,000, if it is distributed according to valuation, and how much each county or burgh would receive if the money were distributed according to the population as ascertained by the census of 1891?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: There is no objection to giving the information asked for. If the hon. Member will be good enough to move for the Return, I shall use every endeavour to have it presented before the Committee stage.

THE IRISH AND AMERICAN

MAIL SERVICE

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether it has been conceded by the Post Office that the interval between receiving and posting given at Cork on arrival of mails (less than an hour) is insufficient and unsatisfactory; whether the acceleration of the service which the Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland are willing to carry out has been settled on terms acknowledged by the Post Office to be reasonable and moderate, and whether the only opposition to the conclusion of the acceleration of the Cork and American mails has been from the Treasury, who state they could not authorise the expenditure at the present time; whether this expenditure has been recommended by the Post Office to the Treasury; and why and for what reason, under existing circumstances, this Irish and American benefit, having been recommended by the Post Office, is opposed by the Treasury?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The hon. Member's statement is substantially accurate.

DR. TANNER: Will the right hon. Gentleman answer the last paragraph, as to whether there is a conflict between the Treasury and the Post Office?

SIR J. FERGUSON: The hon. Gentleman has put down a question to the Treasury on precisely the same subject, and I prefer to leave it to the Treasury to answer.

DR. TANNER: I ask if there is conflict between the Post Office and the Treasury? I shall call attention to the matter on the Estimates.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the difference between the delivery and time given for answering mails in Cork and Belfast; and whether the Great Southern and Western Railway Company have offered any advantages to secure quicker delivery and return?

SIR J. FERGUSON: Between the time fixed for beginning the delivery of the English letters at Cork and the time for closing the letter box for outward mail there is an interval of 1 hr. 20 min. At Belfast the interval is five hours.

DR. TANNER: I must ask the right hon. Gentleman to reply to the second paragraph.

MR. SEXTON: For what sum of money have the Great Southern and Western Railway Company agreed to carry out this improved service?

SIR J. FERGUSON: I do not think I can answer that offhand. I have said that it was a question of money.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Has the right hon. Gentleman abandoned his efforts to induce the Treasury to concur in his view on the matter?

SIR J. FERGUSON: It is well understood that Her Majesty's Government acts as a whole, and if it has not been thought proper to increase the subsidy to the Railway Company for the service it must be taken to be the decision of the Government generally.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: If the right hon. Gentleman did not intend to improve the service in some way what was the object of entering into negotiations with the Great Southern and Western Railway at all?

SIR J. FERGUSON: We did not initiate negotiations, but we desire to improve the service as much as possible.

DR. TANNER: Have the Railway Company been offered any advantage to secure a quicker delivery and return?

SIR J. FERGUSON: They are treated in the same way as any other Railway Company carrying mails, and we are prepared to give them the same advantages. We made them no offer, but they made one to us.

DR. TANNER: What is the character of these advantages?

MR. MAURICE HEALY: May I ask if it is a fact that the Post Office have approached the Great Southern and Western Railway Company with the object of improving the service, and that negotiations have taken place between them with the object of improving the mail service, and what is the basis of these negotiations? Was it not the payment of an increased sum to the Company?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: That is the purport of what I have already stated.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will explain why the Treasury has refused to authorise increased expenditure for conveyance of American mails via Dublin and Queenstown; and whether said expenditure has been recommended by another Government Department?

MR. GOSCHEN: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to answer this question? I think I have only seen the question to-day, and have not been able to examine into it. On the question generally I can only repeat the words of my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General, that the Government look into these matters as a whole, and it would be most inconvenient that any differences of opinion in a Department should be made a matter of political discussion. The Government acted on the whole case, and the decision of the Treasury or Post Office, as it might be, is final.

MR. SEXTON: Will the right hon. Gentleman supplement the defective information of the Postmaster General by telling us what sum is now paid to the Railway Company, and for what increased sum they will grant an improved service?

MR. GOSCHEN: I have only seen the question on the Paper to-day, and cannot answer that question.

MR. SEXTON: I shall ask it again on Thursday.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Can the Postmaster General say why, if the Government acted in this matter as a whole, and the Post Office entered into negotiations with the Railway Company with a view of increasing the subsidy to the Company, that when the Railway Company acceded to their demand the Treasury refused to carry out what the Post Office proposed?

MR. GOSCHEN: I suppose they negotiated like anybody else would, and that when too much was asked the negotiations were broken off.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Postmaster General said that the demand of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company was most moderate?

MR. WEBSTER (St. Pancras, E.): I rise to a point of Order. I should like to know if hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway have a right to ask six supplementary questions to every question they have on the Paper?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I should like to reply to the question of the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. M. Healy). It is quite true that when I had a meeting with the representatives of the Railway Company and others on this question I said that, in my opinion, if the service was to be paid for the demand of the Railway Company was moderate, but whether it could be done or not was a matter for consideration.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: This is a very important matter. What I want to know is this: what was the object of the Post Office in approaching the Great Southern and Western Railway at all if, when that Company acceded to their views and asked what is admittedly a most moderate sum, they turned round and said that the Company should have nothing?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I did not approach them, they approached me.

THE EMPLOYEES AT HAULBOWLINE DOCKYARD.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty how many dockyard employees are now working at Haulbowline; what is the nature of their employment; and whether any skilled dockyard artificers are now employed at Haulbowline?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will put the question down

Sir J. Fergusson

Friday. He only put it down last night, and I have not had time to get information.

GOLD AND SILVER MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether is the intention of the Government to reduce the royalties on gold and silver in Wales and in Ireland in private lands to the same amount as the royalties have lately been reduced in the case of one mine in private lands in Wales; and, if not, why not?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I have already stated that under similar circumstances similar treatment will be given to mines in Wales and Ireland, but that the case of each mine must be considered separately.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman anticipate that people are likely to open mines unless they know the terms beforehand?

MR. J. O'CONNOR: Is the difference between the royalty in Ireland and Wales 5 per cent. and 1 per cent. respectively?

MR. GOSCHEN: I do not know at this moment whether in the case of land 5 per cent. is charged. Any change in the royalty would apply equally in Wales and Ireland. The sliding scale has been offered in Ireland. It is quite possible that mines in Ireland have not been worked, and that, therefore, no concession has been asked for.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it has not been represented to him by the mining authorities that the sliding scale in metalliferous mines is utterly impracticable and unworkable?

TELEGRAPH EXTENSION IN RURAL DISTRICTS.

MR. THORBURN (Peebles and Selkirk): I beg to ask the Postmaster General when he expects to introduce a Bill for extending to Scotland the provisions of an Act, now in force in England, whereby Local Authorities may assess for the purpose of meeting any deficiency arising out of guarantees given to the Post Office in connection with telegraph extension in rural districts?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: Instructions have been given for the preparation of a Bill for this purpose, and I hope shortly to be able to introduce it.

THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE (Bradford Central): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he can state what action the Government proposes to take with respect to the Report of the Royal Commission on Westminster Abbey, and especially with reference to the recommendation as to the demolition of the houses in Old Palace Yard, which it is alleged would be the cause of danger to the Abbey in the event of fire?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (Mr. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The Government have not yet arrived at any decision as to the alternative sites suggested by the Royal Commission for a Memorial Chapel. With reference to the houses at Portico Corner and in Old Palace Yard, I have been in communication with the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, who are the ground landlords of the houses in question, and I am in communication with the Dean and Chapter of the Abbey. The leases of these houses will expire at periods varying from one to twelve years from the present time, and I think it is obvious that, whatever plan may be ultimately adopted, the leases should not be renewed.

THE NEW POST OFFICE AT LONGFORD.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (for Mr. T. M. HEALY): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will state what is the cause of the delay in the erection of the new post office at Longford?

SIR J. FERGUSSON: The delay has been unavoidable, but it is hoped that the scheme will soon be matured.

THE PROMOTION LIST OF THE WATERFORD COUNTY POLICE.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (for Mr. T. M. HEALY): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many Roman Catholics and how many Protestants are on the

Waterford County Inspectors' Promotion List; how many of each religion were, by a recent circular order to District Inspectors by the County Inspector, found disqualified; how many of these found disqualified by the present County Inspector were found eligible by his predecessors in office; and how many Roman Catholic and Protestant sergeants are now "under supervision," awaiting the Report of their District Inspectors at the expiration of three months?

MR. JACKSON: The Inspector General reports that the present County Inspector for Waterford has just taken over the county, and that on doing so he went through the promotion list of his predecessor, and in no case was the name of any man removed whom his predecessor thought eligible for promotion. The question of religion forms no element in promotion, which must depend solely on individual fitness.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the last paragraph.

MR. JACKSON: I said that religion forms no element in promotion, and I think it very undesirable to give that information.

THE WEARING OF THE SHAMROCK.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (for Mr. P. O'BRIEN, Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty what was the name and length of service of the Lieutenant who ordered Frederick Dwyer to take the shamrock out of his cap at Devonport on St. Patrick's Day last; what was the date upon which Commander Neville reduced Dwyer's sentence from fourteen to seven days; was it as a result of any communication from the Admiralty; and whether, in consideration of the circumstances which led to Dwyer's disobedience, he will see that this occurrence shall not be recorded against him, or in any way interfere with his chances of promotion?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The officer in question was Lieutenant Edward P. Powell, who has seniority as Lieutenant of 16th April, 1878. Dwyer's sentence was reduced on the 20th March, but entirely independent of any intervention by the Admiralty. The man's Christian name is Patrick and not Frederick as previously stated. His conduct since he joined the Service in 1889 is noted as very good, and if he continues to behave in other respects as he has done in the past, his act of disobedience will not be recorded against him.

THE LIGHT ON THE CLOCK TOWER.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (for Mr. P. O'BRIEN): I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he is aware that the signal light on the House of Commons cannot be seen at all from some parts of London, and is very imperfectly visible from many points owing to its position on one side of the tower; and whether he proposes to remedy this defect by placing a powerful electric light on the summit of the tower so as to be visible from all points?

MR. PLUNKET: This is the first complaint I have received as to the insufficiency of the signal light on the Clock Tower, and I believe that under ordinary conditions of the atmosphere the light is well seen in those parts of the town to which it is at present directed. There are times when London fogs are very dense at which neither this light nor any other could be of much service. If I were satisfied that any considerable number of Members of Parliament are deprived of the advantage of seeing the light, or of the sometimes keener pleasure of seeing it extinguished, that would be a reason, if the expense were not thought too heavy by the Treasury, for endeavouring to spread the light more widely. As to whether that could best be done by gas or electric light is a question on which I believe a good deal can be said on both sides.

DR. TANNER: Is it not a fact that there would be very little increase in the cost if the light were put at the top of the Tower, so that it could be seen South as well as West?

MR. PLUNKET: I cannot answer that question without further investigation; but I think there would be a considerable increase of cost.

THE LIMERICK FISHERY BOARD.

MR. J. O'CONNOR (for Mr. P. O'BRIEN): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what is the number of elected members on the Limerick Fishery Board, and what is the number of ex officio members; what are the qualifications of membership for each class, and what is the system of election to the Board; has the present Chairman of the Board, the Hon. Gaston Maunsel, any financial interest in the fisheries; has it come to his knowledge that grave dissatisfaction exists amongst the working fishermen with the Board, and that the Inspectors of Fisheries have been memorialised to investigate the condition of the fisheries; whether he can say if an inquiry will be held; and, if so, when; whether there are vacancies in the districts entitled to elect members to the Board; and whether he will see that elections are proceeded with at once?

MR. JACKSON: 1. There are 24 persons elected every three years to act as Conservators for the Limerick Fishery district. 2. The number of ex officio Conservators varies from year to year, as the number of persons possessing the requisite qualifications fluctuates. 3. The qualifications for an elected Conservator are:—(A). That he shall reside or possess real property in the electoral division of the district for which he is elected. (B). That he shall be duly elected at a properly convened meeting of persons entitled to vote. These persons are those who shall have paid licence duty for the current year within the electoral division only for which the meeting is held. The qualifications for an ex officio Conservator are that he shall possess a several fishery as owner, lessee, or occupier, valued under the Acts for the relief of the poor at £100 a year or upwards—provided that when a fishery so rated shall be held by several persons, one person alone shall act as Conservator; or that he shall be a Magistrate paying licence duty, and be the owner of land abutting on a river. 4. The system of election to the Board is as follows:—The existing Board of Conservators fix, and publish notice of, the date, hour, and place, for the meeting of the electors in each electoral division for the election of the proper number of Conservators for the same. Two weeks' notice thereof is to be given by handbills and advertisements in two or more newspapers circulating in the district. The meeting for election commences at the hour and on the day named in the notice. Votes are not received after three o'clock p.m. on that day. The persons entitled to vote are those who have paid licence duty for the current year. Such persons shall choose a Chairman, who presides and receives the votes of the electors. All persons produce their licences for the current year at the time of voting. Such persons can give votes according to the following scale:—If the licence duty paid by them shall not amount to £2, one vote; shall amount to £2 and not exceed £5, two votes; shall amount to £5 and not exceed £10, three votes; shall exceed £10, four votes. The chairman declares the persons who shall have received the greatest number of votes to be the elected Conservators, and certifies same. 5. The Inspectors have no information as to whether or not the Hon. Gaston Maunsel has any financial interest in the fisheries. 6. The Inspectors understand from reports in the Press that some friction exists between certain fishermen and members of the Limerick Board.

THE BENGAL MUNICIPAL ACT.

MR. SCHWANN (Manchester, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal intends to introduce into the Bengal Legislative Council a Bill to amend the existing Bengal Municipal Act; whether he is aware that the statement to the effect that this was intended has caused widespread alarm throughout the Province as being subversive of the principle of local self-government introduced by successive Viceroys in the Viceregal Legislative Council, and that meetings have been held at Hugli, Howra, Searsole, Bankura and other places protesting against the Bill; and whether in view of the strong and unanimous feeling expressed, the Secretary of State will ascertain the intentions of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal and of the Government of India with reference to the Bill, and lay them before this House?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The proposed legislation to amend the Bengal Muni-

the proposed distinctive management of the Irish products the Commissioners have nothing to make known, but they are considering the advisability of establishing a special department in Dublin to deal with the Irish exhibits. I may point out to the hon. Member that the proper person to give information on the matter is the secretary to the Commission.

SIR J. PULESTON (Devonport): Has anything yet been decided with reference to the proposal that the total amount to be granted for the purpose of the exhibition should be increased?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I hope so. The application for such an increase was forwarded by the Commissioners to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. J. O'CONNOR: How soon does the right hon. Gentleman expect to know the decision of the Government?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: There is a meeting of the Commission to-morrow at five o'clock at which the matter will come up for consideration, but whether any reply has yet been received from the Treasury in regard to the matter I do not know.

THE TRUCK ACTS.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in the absence of any written agreement, an employer has any legal right to deduct from his workpeople the rent of the houses in which they live; and whether such deduction is not a violation of the Truck Acts?

*SIR R. WEBSTER: There is no violation of the Truck Acts in deducting the rent of premises occupied by workpeople if they are the property of the master, whether the agreement is in writing or otherwise. By Clause 23 of the Act of 1831, and Clause 5 of the Act of 1887, the rent of such premises is expressly reserved from the operation of the Truck Acts.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS.

(2.52.) MR. DALZIEL (Kirkcaldy, &c.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the very great importance of the Local Veto (Scotland) Bill, he will use the influence of the Government towards allowing the House to take it into consideration?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The Government have no influence to enable them to alter the order of private Members' business.

MR. DALZIEL: I would remind the right hon. Gentleman that the Mover of the first Order to-morrow, the Rating of Machinery Bill, is an hon. Member upon whom the Government are in a position to bring influence to bear.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT (ELECTION AND DISSOLUTION).

(2.50.) MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg, Sir, to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Return for which I have asked in Notice No. 4 will be granted as an unopposed Return?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I see no objection to the Return, though I do not see what useful purpose it will serve.

MR. LABOUCHERE: Then, Mr. Speaker, I move for a "Return of the dates on which each Parliament was Elected and Dissolved since the passing of the Septennial Act, together with the periods that elapsed in each case between the Dissolution and the Meeting of the new Parliament."

Motion agreed to.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR) SELECT COMMITTEE.

Special Report from the Select Committee on Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) read, as followeth:—

SPECIAL REPORT.

The Select Committee on Railway Servants (Hours of Labour) have agreed to the following Special Report:—

"Your Committee, having considered a letter dated 21st February, 1892, from Mr. Harford, General Secretary of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants, and printed in Appendix A., alleging that certain witnesses who had given evidence before them during the last Session of Parliament had been dismissed from their employment in consequence of the any decision on the point. The Committee have said that So-and-So have done certain things calculated to deter witnesses from giving evidence before the Committee. I say that this is not a breach of the Privileges of this House, because the Committee left it expressly to this House to affirm that principle; and I venture again respectfully to ask you whether we are in Order in summoning to the Bar of this House persons of whom we have not said yet that they have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member will observe that the Committee have not decided that any breach of Privilege has been committed, but only that action has been taken by certain gentlemen which is calculated, in their opinion, to intimidate witnesses. It is upon that allegation that the House would like to hear the gentlemen who are referred to in the Report in order to know whether they can say anything in excuse or mitigation of the allegation which is charged against them. I do not think that any injustice can be done to any gentleman by asking them to attend at the Bar of this House.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That John William MacLure do attend this House in his place upon Thursday next.

Ordered, That Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher do attend this House upon Thursday next, at Three of the clock.—(Sir M. Hicks Beach.)

SMALL AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS

BILL.—(No. 183.)

COMMITTEE. [Progress 4th April.]

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

*(3.2.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I move, in page 1, line 7, to leave out from "If," to "this Act," in line 10. The words which I propose to leave out are these:—

"If the council of any county are of opinion that there is such a demand for small holdings for the labouring population in their county as justifies them in putting in operation this part of this Act."

This Amendment must be taken in connection with a subsequent Amendment which I propose to move—in line

10, after the word "council," to insert "of any county." If, therefore, the Amendment is carried, the clause will run: "The council of any county may," &c. These words as they now stand either have no meaning and are mere surplusage, or they have a meaning. If they have a meaning, I venture to think that there will be a certain ambiguity as to what that meaning is, because how can a Council form any opinion? The words obviously refer to the 1st sub-section of Clause 4, in which it is stated that

"Any county council may, and every county council not being a council of a county borough shall appoint a committee to consider,"

&c. As the words stand now it is possible for any County Council to state beforehand whether it will, or whether it will not, adopt the Act. That is the meaning of which these words would be susceptible, and it is in order to avoid any ambiguity of that kind that I propose to leave them out.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, to leave out from the word "If," to the words "this Act," in line 10.

(3.4.) THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have listened with attention to the arguments of the hon. Gentleman, but I fail to see that there is any objection to affirming in Clause 1 the principle on which the Bill is founded, although that general principle finds expression in Clause 4. I presume the House will agree with me that the Act should only be put in force where it is required, and I see no reason why that principle should not be affirmed in Clause 1.

*(3.5.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: There are two ways in which the County Council may affirm its opinion, but there is no necessity for the County Council, previous to any demand for land taking place, affirming the opinion whether it should put the Act in force in any particular county. It would be time enough for the County Council to affirm the opinion when an actual specific demand for particular land is sent up to it.

(3.6.) MR. H. H. FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): There is a clear contradiction between these Clauses 1 and 4; and although the First Lord of the Treasury wishes them to be left unchanged, I think if he endeavoured to reconcile them he would find it beyond his powers. Clause 4 contemplates that County Councils shall, in the first instance, whether they like it or not, appoint a committee, and that committee is to institute an inquiry, upon which, apparently, the object of Clause 1 will be carried out. I desire to call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the extraordinary phraseology of this clause, and ask him what it means. I have no doubt he has seen the speech of the Lord Chancellor in Birmingham on Saturday night, in which, in very severe terms, his Lordship commented on the phraseology of the Bills sent up by this House, and suggested that it is the lay Members of this House who are responsible for the extraordinary language which some of those Bills contain. I will not presume that this language has proceeded from a lay mind, but I think we may fairly ask the right hon. Gentleman to put a meaning upon that clause: "If the council of any county are of opinion." I do not know how a Council can be of opinion. I know how an individual can be of opinion, and I know how a Council can resolve, but I always thought that the way in which a body, whether House of Commons or Board or Council, expresses its judgment is by resolution. I can understand if we are told that they are to resolve. Then we find that the demand is to be made by the labouring population, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to define labouring population. We know that he is a large landowner in Lincolnshire, and that no man works harder than he does in his capacity of President of the Board of Agriculture, and in that sense of the word he labours. I suppose, however, that the meaning is to exclude from this Act those persons who do not earn their living in the form of weekly wages. But the judicial mind and the legislative mind are in perpetual conflict; and a great deal of litigation is brought about by people seeking to give to Acts a meaning which Parliament never intended, and endeavouring to make Acts do what Parliament never contemplated. I would ask, does this Bill include the fishermen of Lincolnshire, the cotton spinners of Lancashire, and the miners of Staffordshire, or is it confined to the agricultural population? A part of this clause appears to me to be mere surplusage, and if it means agricultural labourer why should it not say so? I do not see how men, such as blacksmiths, village carpenters, or the classes mentioned last night, are to have a community of interest with the labouring agricultural population who are earning weekly wages; and, therefore, I submit to the right hon. Gentleman that Clause 1 and Clause 4 are in absolute conflict, and that they must have been inserted in the Bill upon two different sets of instructions, one contemplating one state of things and the other another state of things. And I submit to him that the vagueness and incertitude about the meaning of the words put into this clause will tend, amongst other things introduced into the Bill, to nullify the measure altogether.

*(3.11) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): The right hon. Gentleman has spoken of a judicial mind in connection with the language of this clause. It appears to me to be perfectly clear to almost any layman in the world. The right hon. Gentleman has taken exception to the clause as it is drafted, and said he had never heard of such a phrase as "in the opinion of the Council," and did not know how a County Council could express an opinion. I ask him, then, "How can this House be of opinion?" And yet it is one of the commonest forms of expression employed in Motions in this House. It is used week after week and day after day. "That this House is of opinion" is one of our commonest forms of expression. That is a sufficient answer, I think, to the objection of the right hon. Gentleman. Then he talks about the labouring population and asks are they to include such men as blacksmiths, village carpenters, and the classes mentioned last night, or does it only include persons who are agricultural labourers alone? Certainly it is intended to include a far wider circle than that. According to our reading of this clause it includes all the classes to whom he has referred; and let me remind the right hon. Gentleman that in every agricultural district and village, during the period of harvest at all events, all the mechanics, blacksmiths, and village tradesmen, are engaged in agricultural work. Surely the right hon. Gentleman knows enough of the country to be aware of that fact. Harvest-time is the busiest time in the year, and during that time the whole agricultural population are engaged very often; but let it not be understood that the application of this clause is to be limited to that class. The words in the clause which cause such dissatisfaction to the right hon. Gentleman have been taken out of the Allotments Act. In that Act it was provided that the labouring population should be provided with allotments, and I never heard a whisper of complaint against it upon that ground. It appears to me, therefore, that the criticism of the right hon. Gentleman is hypercritical altogether. With regard to Clause 4, I think I can convict the right hon. Gentleman of inaccuracy. Under that clause it is the duty of the County Council to appoint a Committee to consider whether the circumstances of the county justify the Council in putting into operation this part of the Act; and when a petition is presented to them it becomes the duty of the County Council to make inquiry into the whole of the circumstances with the view of putting the Act into operation. As regards the Amendment which the hon. Member has moved, it seems to me to be open to this objection, that if these words were omitted, then the position would be this: that even if there were going to be no demand whatever for the provision of small holdings, so far as the labouring population were concerned, the County Councils would have to proceed notwithstanding. It appears to me that the language used in the Bill is the ordinary language of Acts of Parliament, so far as I am acquainted with them, and is in accordance with the precedent of the Allotments Act. I am bound to say that the Amendment is altogether unnecessary, and that the observations of the right hon. Gentleman are not altogether well-founded.

(3.16.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE (Devon, Ashburton): I think, in the case of the Allotments Bill, the Minister who had charge of the Bill expressed the opinion that the words "labouring population" did not include anything but agricultural labourers. If I remember rightly that was the explanation he gave when we endeavoured to introduce other words.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As I suppose I am the Minister referred to by the hon. Member, I feel bound to state that no such opinion was expressed by me. It always seemed to me that the "labouring population" would include artisans belonging to the towns.

MR. SEALE-HAYNE: At that time I recollect distinctly it was stated that the words "labouring population" would not include such men as the village blacksmith and the village carpenter.

*(3.17.) SIR W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): The Allotments Act of 1887 in some of its clauses was worded in the same way as this Bill in saying that the Local Authority is of opinion, but there the important words are added "after inquiry." In this case the right hon. Gentleman contemplates, I apprehend, that the County Council is to come to an opinion without any previous inquiry, and in that respect I think this Bill is inferior in its wording to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman's colleague sitting on the same Bench. The County Council may have an academic discussion on these points as to the general desirability of small holdings in particular parts of the country; and later on, after inquiry, they may find that their opinion is wrong. It would be more logical and more conducive to the effective operation of the Act, if the right hon. Gentlemen allowed their opinion to be formed after a public inquiry of some kind has been made.

(3.19.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): I cannot agree with the complaints that have been made with regard to the words used in this clause.

It seems to me that the language is perfectly clear. There is a subsequent Amendment dealing with the insertion in the clause of the words "labouring population." It seems to me that when we are dealing with land up to 50 acres that really not only the labouring population strictly so called should be included, but it would be desirable to include also tenants or freeholders.

(3.20.) MR. H. T. KNATCHBULL HUGESSEN (Kent, Faversham): This Bill is intended to benefit not only the agricultural labourers but some others who combine other occupations with that of agricultural labour, and it would be a great pity if by any possible ambiguity they should be excluded.

THE CHAIRMAN: Order, order! There is a subsequent Amendment dealing with the question of the exclusion of the words "for the labouring population," and the hon. Member is not in order in discussing the matter now.

*(3.21.) MR. F. S. STEVENSON: First of all a Committee is to be appointed before the Act can be put in force; and, secondly, there is a Committee proposed in Sub-section 2, Clause 4, which contains some safeguards which in my opinion are altogether sufficient and adequate without previous inquiry. Neither the right hon. Gentleman nor any other hon. Member has suggested that these words are necessary, and, therefore, considering that there is no necessity for their insertion, I cannot understand why the right hon. Gentleman should not consent to their omission.

*(3.21.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): I rise, in the words of the Minister of Agriculture, to try to pour oil on the troubled waters. I consider that the benefit of this clause should be open to all, and, therefore, I am against leaving out these words. I am also in favour of taking out the words "labouring population," because the great good of this Bill—if it is to be of any good—will be to small farmers, who might not come quite under the definition "labouring population." I would venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he should insert the words "after inquiry" after Council, which would be following the precedent of the Allotments Act, and that he should take out the word "may" and put in "shall."

(3.23.) MR. H. GARDNER (Essex, Saffron Walden): I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether my interpretation of the Bill is correct. I wish to know whether Clause 1 contemplates the case that the County Council may take the initiative in putting the Act into operation; and, if so, whether Clause 4 is not somewhat contradictory in its terms?

Amendment negatived.

(3.24.) MR. OLDROYD (Dewsbury): I beg to move, in page 1, line 7, after "county," to insert "or of any borough." I wish first of all to assure the right hon. Gentleman that this Amendment is not inspired by any avowed or by any concealed opposition to the Bill of which he is in charge, nor is there any intention in any way to thwart or cripple the operation of the Bill. But what I simply desire is this: that the Town Council of a non-county borough shall have the same power in the administration of this Bill as under its present framing is accorded to the county borough and County Council. This is a simple modification of the proposed administration of the Bill, and one which I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept. During the discussion on the Instruction to the Committee last night there seemed to be a consensus of opinion that the County Councils were on the whole too massive and too distant a Body to consider with detailed accuracy all the questions that might arise in the consideration of the operation of this Act; and I think the right hon. Gentleman himself from his reply in that Debate did not say that the Parish Councils or District Councils would be less calculated faithfully to discharge their duties under this Act than the County Councils. But his objection to the Instruction was this—that the Parish Councils or District Councils were not in existence, and that the creation of such an authority to deal with this Bill might be fatal to the measure itself. But in the case of the Amendment which I propose that argument does not apply, because we have in the councils of the non-county boroughs already an authority established which, in the general opinion of this House, it is agreed is an authority which may safely be trusted with the carrying out of this Act. I think it will not be disputed that the duties which are imposed on these Bodies already are far more weighty and more responsible than the duties which will be entailed by the administration of this Bill. I could submit that the capacity of Town Councils for carrying out the work in their boroughs is recognised by Parliament, and additional duties are constantly being put upon them in recent years. Public libraries have been authorised to be constituted and managed by Town Councils; and even in this Parliament, under the Technical Instruction Act, additional powers were given as to rating for that purpose, and so on. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board will remember, in the case of the Allotments Act, the Town Councils were constituted the sole authority for the administration of that Act in their own districts. The right hon. Gentleman need have no fear as to the general willingness of Corporations to undertake and discharge this important duty. Some two years ago, in a discussion on the Allotments Act, it was pointed out to the House that in the matter of the provision of allotments the Town Councils or the boroughs had faithfully discharged their duties, and had shown no reluctance whatever to carry out the allotments Act in their districts. It would be very hard indeed if those boroughs, more especially such as are of an agricultural character which have already provided free libraries and made ample provision for allotments, should be told by Parliament, "Notwithstanding the fact that you have administered the Act well and faithfully, we have no confidence in you. We distrust you, and would not leave to you the responsibility of carrying out this Act." I contend that the Town Council is the only proper authority for dealing with this Bill. It cannot be gainsaid that

Town Councils have a better local knowledge than any other authority for the purpose of this Bill; they know what boroughs are adapted for the purposes of these small holdings; they know the needs of the people, and what is most important; they have a knowledge of the individuals concerned. The persons who are authorised to administer this Act should have personal knowledge of the applicants, and should confer the advantages of small holdings only upon those who by their thrift and industry are well-known in their districts as being worthy to receive them. It may be argued that the rateable value of these boroughs would be very small, and that the limit which the right hon. Gentleman has fixed as the amount of purchase-money for these small holdings might militate against the extensive operation of the Act; but the right hon. Gentleman himself says that this measure is simply an experimental one; and if it be found that in the smaller boroughs the limit is too small, that amount can be extended by the County Councils themselves. Speaking to-day on behalf of these smaller boroughs, I may say that a very strong feeling exists in them, not against the Bill itself, but against the interference of County Councils in the administration of the affairs of boroughs which could be equally well carried on, if not better, within their own limits. This objection to the Bill is, I consider, a reasonable one; and it would be unworthy of those who have so long enjoyed such privileges if they were to silently acquiesce in the proposals of the Bill, which would have the effect of introducing an alien authority. I do not wish to magnify the friction which, more or less, exists between the smaller boroughs and the rural parts of the county, but we should not shut our eyes to the fact that this interference may possibly culminate in a very considerable amount of friction. The right hon. Gentleman seems, by the provisions of the Bill itself, to contemplate that a possible loss may arise out of it, and he has accordingly introduced certain restrictions to which I have already referred. Let me deal with two alternatives that may ensue after the passing of this Bill. Firstly there may possibly be a great rush for these small holdings; and if that be the case, I should like to know what would be the feeling in those boroughs of an urban character, which would be brought under the penalty of subscribing to the deficiency that may arise? In the other case the rural boroughs might complain that this loss had arisen in consequence of the laxness of the County Councils in administering the Act, and contend fairly that they would themselves have been able to provide against such a deficiency occurring. The right hon. Gentleman will admit that there will be ample opportunity for the administration of the Act in the smaller boroughs, and it would be only equitable and fair that those boroughs should have the administration of it left in their hands. There seems to be an idea that the County Councils might possibly be able to administer the Act more carefully, because, under Clause 4, they are instructed to proceed by Committee, and that on petition inquiry is to be held. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that in the case of these smaller boroughs there would be no need of proceeding in this dilatory method, because the members of the Council would not only know how far the district is affected, but would be able to select those men who are best fitted to carry out the Act. I trust, therefore, that, in the interests of Local Government and in support of the franchise rights which boroughs now enjoy, all the friends of sound Local Government will support the Amendment I have now the honour of moving. In the interests of the Bill itself, I think my Amendment might be fairly agreed to, because there would then be a larger number of authorities empowered to administer the Act, which would be some guarantee for its success. I trust the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept it, proposed as it is in no unfriendly or Party spirit, and that he will thus prevent another blow being struck at those Local Authorities whose interests ought not to be jeopardised by their being forbidden to carry out this Bill.

Mr. Oldroyd

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the word "county," to insert the words "or of any borough."—(Mr. Oldroyd.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

*(3.45.) SIR A. ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I think it is desirable to say what I have to say upon the subject now rather than to do it hereafter upon similar Amendments which stand on the Paper in my own name. The view which the hon. Member has just put before the House is that which is entertained very strongly by the Municipal Corporations' Association of the United Kingdom, which represents the whole of the boroughs, both county and borough. So strong and general is the feeling in favour of the Amendment in this non-political Association that, when the subject was discussed, a resolution was passed unanimously asking that they should be all put on the same footing under the Bill. I am sure the right hon. Gentleman will accept this as a fact—that the Amendment is not put before the House in any hostile spirit. Speaking on behalf of the boroughs, I believe that the feeling in them is one of great satisfaction, both with regard to the Bill itself and the manner in which it has been introduced by the right hon. Gentleman. But the present question is really a most important one; it affects the integrity of the borough life of this country. I do not forget what has been said in this House, and at no distant day the general question may have to be again discussed. For the present, however, I content myself with saying that the feeling which still exists on the subject was strongly and well expressed in the discussion on the Allotments Bill, and experience has added to the conviction that the existing system is not advantageous in the interests of either one class of boroughs or of the other. The President of the Local Government Board on the occasion of the Allotments Bill recognised the right of boroughs to autonomy in dealing with such matters; he recognised their knowledge, their experience, and their interest in managing their own affairs, and the result has been that that Act is now working well and is giving satisfaction both in boroughs and counties. There are many points connected with small holdings which can best be considered locally, such as the situation and quality of the land, its adaptability for small holdings, the efficiency of the men who are going to cultivate it, and the methods of cultivation. These and various other matters must be considered, whilst it must also be borne in mind that it is certainly not desirable to stereotype too much any particular method of agriculture over the whole area of a county, especially those of very large area. I hope that in connection with these small holdings means will be found of quickening experiments on a small scale in agriculture, and therefore the local aspect of the methods of cultivation must not be lost sight of. Now, Sir, the old chartered boroughs which have done so much good work in the past desire to apply this measure for themselves. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture said recently that the only popularly Elective Bodies at present are the County Councils. Sir, I can hardly agree with that. The County Councils, well as they have done much of their work, are affairs of yesterday compared with many of the chartered boroughs, which have existed for centuries; and if the right hon. Gentleman supposes that the old boroughs will contentedly accept delegated powers to carry out matters confided to them by the County Councils he is very greatly mistaken. The right hon. Gentleman also said that the County Councils alone possess the necessary borrowing powers, but these words are ambiguous, and they appear to me to be somewhat misapplied. The borrowing powers of the boroughs are ample to meet the case. It is quite true that there is in the Bill a limitation of the amount chargeable on the borough rates to one penny in the pound, and I grant that in the case of some of the smaller boroughs there might be a difficulty in raising the requisite funds. Similar difficulty would, however, certainly not be experienced by those boroughs whose population fell short by a few thousands of that of the county boroughs. The penny limitation will, I venture to say, be found disadvantageous to the working of the Act, and might well be increased for furthering that truly conservative work, the rooting to the soil of the men who till the soil. But, Sir, if there is to be a centralised authority there must be some check on the want of information and knowledge possessed by that body. On the other hand, if the services of men of long experience and local knowledge are obtained there will be no need of the penny limitation, which is one of the leading features of this Bill. If you decentralise and give to the old experienced boroughs a power of management over their own affairs there will be no need of this limitation. This provision, again, will operate most unfairly. A borough may or may not desire to have small holdings. If it does desire to have small holdings the Act will be carried out; and if it does not desire to have small holdings, why should it be taxed for the purposes of others at a distance? We all know of boroughs with corporate land which is let out for small holdings, land which has been managed for centuries by these boroughs, not always well, but now much better than before. A borough in such a position does not desire to exercise those powers. I take one borough in which the success of small holdings is one of the most notable and commendable features of the history of Local Government—I mean the borough of Nottingham, which has 180 acres of land that the Corporation years ago let out in allotments, thus initiating the system of small holdings. These people supply the best produce in the Midlands, and the holdings give occupation and pleasure to a large number of persons. Now, Sir, if a town possesses land and has power to do this work without expense, is it right to impose taxation upon it for the benefit of another locality in which it has not the slightest interest? The main point I want to impress upon the Committee is this—do not let us make the Local Government Act into a centralising measure. That is at variance with its principle, which must be maintained; we must not make the Act a means of centralisation, but of localisation; and to that end the Amendment will be conducive.

(4.0.) MR. STORY-MASKELYNE (Wilts, Cricklade): This subject of the boroughs and their relation to this Bill is a very important one, and I should like to see the principle carried further than is proposed by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Dewsbury. All the arguments which have been used are applicable to the urban districts and to the smaller towns. There are a large number of towns with from 10,000 to 15,000 inhabitants to whom this Bill will come home more closely, as regards their immediate interests, than to the large boroughs whose case we have been discussing. It is for the rural boroughs that I plead, and if the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture concedes anything in this direction he will open his arms to and include those boroughs. They are showing a deep interest in the Bill, and are anxious to share in its advantages. For example, in Swindon, which is in my constituency and which is one of the most thriving towns in England, the people are looking forward to this Bill in the hope that the Town Council may be able to deal with land in the same way as the County Council will be empowered to do. It is quite true that if you abstract from the rating area of the county those important places you have a smaller rating area. But after all a penny is not a very large tax on the county, and if you doubled that penny you would not make up the loss by abstracting the boroughs from the rating area. I do feel strongly the argument in favour of decentralisation, and if you do not make the area too small, decentralisation will be found to be the key to the working of these principles which are coming on the tapis, and with which we are now beginning to deal. We must not be jealous of the Local Authorities which are every day growing in power and in importance. They are centres of education, units of intelligence around which the county is crystallised; and I hope the right hon.

Sir A. Rollit

Gentleman will show his sympathy with that decentralising idea and will recognise in some form the appeals made to him from various quarters of the House in no Party spirit on behalf of those boroughs, and in the interests of the legislation we are seeking to pass.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I quite recognise the desire of those representing the boroughs that they should be included in this Bill, and I can assure hon. Gentlemen that it is not because of any feeling of jealousy or unfriendliness towards those particular localities or Borough Authorities that they have not been included. I accept very gratefully the welcome assurances of my hon. Friend that this Amendment is not dictated by any feeling of hostility to the Bill but rather with a view to promote and strengthen it. At the same time my first duty on this occasion is to guard against any addition being made to the Bill which would in my opinion be likely to retard rather than advance its operation; and I will state to the Committee some of the reasons why, in my humble judgment, the Amendment should be rejected. In the first place, it appears to me that in an enormous number of cases if the boroughs were to be the authority empowered to acquire the land, present rate of a penny in the pound would be altogether insufficient, and the holdings would be so small as to be absolutely useless. I have only to run over the non-county boroughs, and I find borough after borough with an assessable rental of £9,000, £4,000, £3,000 and so on. The borrowing powers of these boroughs would be absolutely useless for the purpose of securing small holdings. They might borrow from £400 to £1,000, but it must be obvious to the Committee that under the present limited rate that we propose these sums would be wholly and totally inadequate for the purposes of this measure. If that is so, the Committee must recollect that while the boroughs would do no good to themselves they would detract from the powers of the County Council to make provision for small holdings. Surely these are considerations requiring the serious attention of the Committee, and they are sufficient to exonerate me from any charge or even from any suspicion of having unduly or unfairly overlooked the interests of the boroughs, and of having been guided by any considerations other than those which are the genuine interests of the measure. It is certainly not because we cannot trust them. I am as sensible as anybody can be of the admirable way in which the work is performed by these Corporations. Then the hon. Member who proposed this Amendment laid great stress upon the greater knowledge of local circumstances which would necessarily be possessed by the boroughs. That is quite true; they have greater local knowledge than the County Councils. But the County Councils are expressly empowered, and indeed compelled under the clauses of the Bill, to make a local inquiry, and there can be no difficulty whatever in the County Council acquiring sufficiently accurate local knowledge to enable them at all events to acquire land in the most satisfactory manner. Now I hope the hon. Gentleman who proposed the Amendment, and my hon. Friend below the Gangway who asks us to make this concession, will observe that it has been practically admitted that if this concession is made and the Amendment added to the Bill it would necessarily involve an addition to the present rate of 1d. per £1. That is a step to which I could not consent, and upon which I am obliged to take my stand, because the amount of money is as much as we would be justified in raising in the first instance. As the Bill stands some ten or eleven millions of money may be borrowed; and surely that is a sum which is as large as we are justified in throwing upon the rates for the purpose of what is avowedly and admittedly an experiment. The hon. Member says it would inflict a blow upon the boroughs. But I would do nothing to inflict a blow upon the boroughs; nothing could be further from my intention than that, and I repudiate very strongly such an interpretation of the Bill and say it would have no effect whatever of that kind. The hon. Member below the Gangway talked of the difficulty in agricultural districts of applying local restrictions, all of which would be much better done by the authorities on the spot, and he also referred to the case of those boroughs which have lands which are managed by them already. My hon. Friend forgets that for all purposes, except the actual acquisition of land, there are provisions in the Bill already delegating such management to the Local Authorities. I should be quite prepared, after we are done with the consideration of that part of the question, to consider the extension of those powers of delegation; but in every other single respect, except the acquisition of land, I am bound to say I still adhere to the opinion that the powers of the boroughs are adequate and sufficient. The hon. Member pointed out that it might operate unfairly upon some particular boroughs, and asked, Why should a borough that does not want to buy small holdings of its own be compelled to undergo taxation for other localities which do desire to do so? But the argument goes a step further; it affects the whole Bill, and, if it were carried out to its logical conclusion, we should be able to do nothing whatever in this matter, because the further question to be asked is, Why should any individual be rated for the purposes of this Bill who has not got a small holding himself merely because other people have got small holdings? That is an argument which goes to the very root of the whole matter. For the reasons I have stated to the Committee, I think they will see that we have, in adopting the course we have taken, acted not without good reason. We have done it because we believe the Bill is far more likely to have a good effect, drawn as it is at present, than if we accepted the Amendment of the hon. Member. He talks about matters to which, perhaps, he may not have given so much attention as we have done, and I hope the Committee will support the Government in their Resolution.

(4.15.) MR. ROWNTREE (Scarborough): I regret the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade is not here to appeal to on this matter. I should be very reluctant to support any Amendment which would be calculated to retard the progress of this Bill, and I believe the acceptance of this Amendment would most distinctly promote the purposes which this Bill has in view. And this is no sentimental difficulty on the part of the towns. Even if it were a matter of strong sentiment, I think there is very much to be said for it. We should do all we can to promote a feeling of honest pride and interest in the self-government of the smaller communities of our country. This is a matter by which, if this Bill is passed into law, 260 self-Governing Bodies in England will be made liable to additional burdens under the County Authorities. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture says, "Why is this to be distinguished from making one individual liable for the burdens entailed on others?" Surely everybody will agree that there is a very wide distinction in this matter. We are continually told that we of the towns are very lavish in our expenditure and that our rates seem to be of very considerable amount. No doubt it is perfectly true that the rates of boroughs are large, and we are all of course compelled, by sanitary measures, by educational measures, and in other ways, to call largely upon our ratepayers. But is it quite a just answer to say that ratepayers who are at present subject to rates of something like 6s. in the £1 are to be made liable to a further burden of 1d. in the £1 in order to provide small holdings in agricultural districts which are rated at 1s., 2s., or 2s. 6d. in the £1, those districts being perhaps 30, 40, 50, or 60 miles away from the town? You are by this Bill inviting the County Authority to come into the municipal area to purchase land, to sell land, to build houses, and to lay down conditions for the building of those houses, and all that without necessarily implying any negotiations whatsoever, or any communication whatsoever with the Governing Body of that municipal area. I venture very respectfully to put to the Committee the consideration that that position of things cannot possibly promote the easy and smooth working of this measure. Further than that, will the Committee consider how very many of our boroughs have very large districts of land within their municipal area? And I may confidently suggest that we are much more likely to give effect to the provisions of this Bill if power is entrusted to the boroughs than if it is handed over to the County Councils 40 or 50 miles away. I regret that the noble Lord who represents Colchester (Lord Brooke) is not present in the House, for he could have given us some information on this matter. But in the absence of the noble Lord, I would simply say that I have a letter from the Chief Magistrate of Colchester pointing out that they have 11,000 acres within their municipal area, and no less than 64 agricultural villages in the Municipality. I believe no gentleman who knows the facts will at all suggest that the Corporation of Colchester have in any way whatsoever been lacking in the attention which they ought to have given to the well-being of these agricultural villages, but that, on the contrary, they have done very much for the well-being of the people. Why should this House by this Bill say the Corporation of Colchester, with a rateable value of £150,000, is to be put to one side and told that the County Council is to see to the extent of the small holdings within their municipal area? That is a very strong attack upon the self-government which such boroughs prize so highly, and which has answered its purpose so well. But there are other towns which have larger areas even than Colchester. Why should not these boroughs be able to put this Bill in force within their own areas for the benefit of their own people, and why should it be needful that some County electors within their borough should have to forward a petition to the County Council, asking them to send a roving Commission to ascertain the wants of the population under their own self-government, which has been working satisfactorily generation after generation? Take the case of the borough of Scarborough, which I have the honour to represent. If it is thought desirable for our town to endeavour to increase its estate, to add small holdings to the allotments which we have already, or to make experiments for the disposal of our sewage or refuse, why should we, a borough with a rateable sum of £180,000 and 33,000 of a population, have to send an humble request to the County Council of the North Riding, 50 miles away, asking them if they will be so good as to come and look into the circumstances of our borough? I venture to think it is most undesirable that we should have to do so. I do trust that the Government will consider this matter further. We do not wish to raise the general question, but I would earnestly appeal to this Committee to do nothing to impede the working of this Bill in the areas of towns, but to enable us to work together for the object which I believe this Committee has in view.

*(4.23.) SIR W. BARTTELOT (Sussex, North-West): I can only say, if my right hon. Friend in charge of the Bill had allowed this question to pass, and said he would accept this Amendment, difficulties would have immediately arisen with regard to the various people who would have been left out in the cold if you had admitted the boroughs. My experience of boroughs is that they conduct their business exceedingly well, and in a manner that does them unqualified credit; but there are certain things which we are bound to do, although we may regret them. The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has put forward a strong case with regard to Scarborough with its £180,000 of rateable value. But before that he passed rather a slighting remark upon we poor unfortunate agricultural people, who have to pay 3s. or 4s., or even more, in the £1, when we are not making one single farthing out of the land we hold. I am stating the absolute truth. If people would look into these balances and accounts and make a fair statement of what is the amount that is made upon the present prices of agricultural produce, I venture to say they would be astounded at the present position in which many are placed.

The local rates we are called upon to pay are enormous, and the difficulty we have in finding the money to meet them is exceedingly great. I objected most strongly when my right hon. Friend placed 1d. upon real property. I think that those who have personal property might be called upon to pay their full share with regard to this rate. We only show our heartiness in the cause which we desire to support, but we say this should be taken out of the Consolidated Fund and not put upon the rates. If you are to look at the boroughs, and those whose rateable values are excessively small—and they are very numerous—you should also look at some of those towns which are managed by other Local Bodies, and see how much higher their rateable values and how much larger their populations are. As my hon. Friend the Member for Swindon pointed out, you would never have them satisfied until they were taken out of that category and placed in the same position as county boroughs are placed in by the Bill, and as it is now sought by this Amendment to place all other boroughs in. There is another question. It has been said they have no representation. I would like to point out that the larger the town the greater the representation it has upon the County Council. And I will venture to say in any County Council the voices of the towns will be heard, as they have been heard during the last three years, more strongly than the voices of the county, and they will point out what it is they require, and those requirements will have the careful consideration of those who deal with the questions which are brought forward. I would only say, further, that I am delighted to find that my hon. Friend stands firm to his guns, because I am quite certain the most mischievous thing that could have been done would have been to give encouragement to this Motion. I venture to think that those boroughs which are below the mark must wait till they are above the mark; and when they are above the mark and become counties, they will receive the benefit of all those things which have been pointed out. If my right hon.

Friend should think it necessary to extend the delegation of powers to rural Local Authorities, I hope he will be careful, especially with regard to rating, as to how any power is delegated to any small authority.

(4.30.) MR. R. T. REID (Dumfries, &c.): The position of the non-municipal boroughs is that they are kept within the purview of the County Council so that they may contribute to the rate. As the rate is limited there will not be sufficient money to provide for the wants of all places, and if there be a conflict between a rural borough, five or six miles in the country, and a thriving, prosperous town as to which shall have holdings provided, does anyone suppose the rural borough will have any chance at all? Practically, boroughs kept in the county for this purpose will have none of the benefit, but will have to pay their full share of the burden. The right hon. Gentleman says that for the purpose of this Bill we must tax many people for the benefit which only one will receive. I agree that is so, but I think he will hear more of that in the Debate, because some of us hold that it is wholly unwarrantable and unjustifiable, except on the condition that some equivalent is given to the others.

*(4.33.) MR. WYNDHAM (Dover): As the Representative of a populous but non-county borough, I listened eagerly to the speech of my right hon. Friend the Minister for Agriculture, in the hope of being able to reconcile my constituents to his refusal of the object which they all desire. But my task will, I fear, prove a hard one. The non-county boroughs view with jealousy every fresh sphere of action from which they are excluded, and now that the question of small holdings is receiving the attention of Parliament they are anxious to manage their own affairs in that matter, and not to have the County Council placed above them in everything. My right hon. Friend has based his refusal solely on financial grounds; he says that the non-county boroughs will not have enough funds to do the work for themselves, while withdrawing them from the county would cripple the County Council. The distinction between county and non-county boroughs is purely arbitrary; it is based on population, and not on financial grounds, and the non-county boroughs will say, "How much more does the independence of the county boroughs limit the funds at the disposal of the Government for their scheme, as they have greater wealth, and can use it or not as they choose?" I do not know if my right hon. Friend sees his way to make any change in the direction of lowering the population limit, so as not to make the non-county boroughs which are able to deal with the question subservient to the County Council. If he would make a concession in that direction the Representatives of non-county boroughs would have an easier task before them. But if he should hold that any such step would cripple the financial basis of his scheme, I am so anxious for its success that I would accept his view in the matter in preference to my own.

(4.35.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS (Birmingham, Bordeley): This matter has been argued mainly from the point of view of the large non-county boroughs, but there are many small boroughs of 3,000 or 4,000 inhabitants, which are packed with agricultural labourers, and what is their position? At present any one of these labourers can go to the County Council and ask for land, and the County Council may make inquiry with the view to putting the Bill in force, so benefiting the people it is intended to benefit. The Amendment proposes to take this class of people and say that they shall only benefit to the extent of the rating power of their own borough. That is putting the agricultural community outside the Act altogether. I hope, therefore, less importance will be given to the large non-county boroughs, which, after all, are not injured in any way, and that attention will be given to the wants of the labourers and others who are packed in these small boroughs. The hon. Member for Islington does not say a word about Local Board districts which have sometimes populations of 30,000 or 40,000. A similar Amendment was moved to the Allotment Bill of 1890 by the hon. Member for Finsbury, and great stress has been laid on the fact that it was accepted by the President of the Local Government Board on that occasion. But it was accepted with great reluctance under the pressure of hon. Members who represented small boroughs. He knew it was damaging to the Bill. The hon. Member opposite said it acted very well; it acts very badly and inflicts a grievance on the labourers in these small boroughs in this way: where a Sanitary Authority will not put the Act in operation the labourers can appeal to the County Council, who will compel the Sanitary Authority; but in these small agricultural boroughs where the Local Authority has declined to put the Act in force the labourers have no remedy. I think that should be sufficient to sustain the right hon. Gentleman in his determination to keep the Bill as it is, and I heartily trust that in the interests of the labourers he will do so.

(4.40.) MR. A. ACLAND (York, W.R., Rotherham): I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman how the Bill is going to work if he does not accept some provision of this kind? The hon. Member for Islington is quite right when he says it raises important Local Government questions. The feeling of many of these boroughs and Local Board districts of 30,000 and 40,000 inhabitants as to the working of the Technical Education Act is a growing one. In the West Riding the money was given to the County Council for the purposes of the Act, and they keep it in their pocket and the boroughs have not been able to get it out. If in the West Riding the right hon. Gentleman withdraws boroughs of 30,000 and 40,000 and Local Board districts of 10,000 or 15,000 there would still be left sufficient agricultural areas equal to many in the South-west and centre of England. These boroughs and districts would then have a fair chance of saying whether they would rate themselves on behalf of the labourers. But if he leaves within the county a borough, like my own, of 40,000 and two Local Board districts of 10,000 each, none much interested in small holdings but all deeply interested in having no penny rate, he will not give the agricultural part of the West Riding a fair chance of working the Bill at all. The right hon. Gentleman should consider from the point of view of the West Riding and Lancashire whether he will not withdraw some of these large boroughs.

(4.43.) MR. M'LAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): It seems to me that under the Bill as it stands the non-county boroughs and large Local Board districts will have to pay a very heavy share of the rates which are liable to be levied to make good deficiencies under the Act, and at the same time cannot hope to reap any benefit. I think they should have exemption. The case is not so strong for the Local Boards, as if they feel aggrieved they can take steps to become municipal boroughs, and I should be sorry to see the Bill complicated by leaving out Local Board districts over a certain population. Non-county boroughs will have to pay without getting any appreciable benefit, and I think that is a material injury which the Bill proposes to inflict upon them. The Corporation of the place I represent feels very strongly on the matter, and I trust the right hon. Gentleman will consider the arguments which have been put before him.

*(4.45.) MR. T. H. BOLTON (St. Pancras, N.): The tone of the Debate has rather disappointed some of us who desired to see the power of the County Councils extended. When the Local Government Bill was introduced it was proposed to exempt from the county only the large boroughs of 100,000 inhabitants, but the President of the Local Government Board had to give way to similar pressure to that being exercised now, and extend the exemption to 50,000. Since that time, whenever a measure has been brought before the House dealing with a question in any way affecting the powers of the County Councils, there has been an attempt to exempt municipal boroughs from the jurisdiction of the County Councils. That is altogether destructive of the principle on which the County Council Act rests. The desire was to relieve Parliament of such work as could be done by representative local assemblies; and it was hoped that the County Councils would be very much strengthened with that object. Now it is proposed to exempt boroughs from the control of County Councils in relation to the provision of small holdings. Under these circumstances, do not let it be said that hon. Gentlemen opposite are the opponents of local self-government. The proposal comes from, and is supported by, many Members on this side, and arises entirely from the action of hon. Gentlemen representing small Municipalities. Many of these Municipalities control what are practically mere villages, while larger populations, represented by District Boards, would have to accept the control of the County Councils. If you exempt these Municipalities, you must exempt Local Board districts also, and so deprive the County Councils of a great deal of their power and usefulness; creating a patchwork system destructive of efficiency. I rose to point out that the proposal to exempt non-county boroughs is a retrograde step in Local Government. Our object should be to strengthen the County Councils and give them fuller power, and at the same time to create other Local Bodies, such as District Councils, and to revise the parish assembly, so that there can be co-operation between these bodies, the final control resting with the County Council—the greater representative body—in order that there may be uniformity and satisfactory financial arrangements, which would be fair to all parties. The proposal now before us is so retrograde that I hope the right hon. Gentleman will not accept it.

*Mr. AINSLIE (Lancashire, N. Lonsdale): I rose to say very much what the hon. Gentleman just said. In the discussion on the Local Government Bill, the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Gully) desired to have his city among the county boroughs. At that time I rose—anxious for my large County of Lancaster—to protest against the frittering away of the county proper. If the principle sought by this Amendment were carried into effect, our counties would present a patchwork which I think would be almost unrecognisable by a schoolboy fresh from his maps. I think the Committee will do wrong if they accept this Amendment, and I rise to protest in the name of my Division of the County of Lancaster, which has not got one of these boroughs in it.

(4.52.) Mr. MORTON (Peterborough): We have just listened to two Tory speeches, one from each side of the House, and I gather from the hon. Member for St. Pancras (Mr. Bolton) that he is in favour of centralisation and therefore opposed to Parish Councils. I happen to represent one of these non-county boroughs which is in favour of the proposal embodied in the Amendment, and it appears to me that the time has arrived when the Minister for Agriculture might give way on this matter, which is not a Party question. I think this is a matter which the non-county boroughs might be left to manage for themselves, because, as a rule, they manage their business very well. In my own city we have a bishop, a cathedral, and a river, and we manage these things very well, and I think we could also manage the business imposed by this Bill. I trust the President of the Board of Agriculture will not waste the time of the House any longer, but will give way now with good grace, for he will have to give way in the end.

*(4.54.) Sir W. FOSTER (Derby, Ilkeston): I should like to suggest, as there is a large amount of feeling in favour of populous places being taken out and allowed to act by themselves, that some kind of compromise is desirable. I quite agree with the hon. Member for Bordesley that there are many small boroughs where agricultural labourers live which ought not to be excluded from the operations of the County Council, for in these places we consider that the County Council is the most suitable body to administer this Act. But in the larger places of 10,000, 15,000, or 20,000 inhabitants I think the Local Authorities might be safely left to act for themselves. If the right hon. Gentleman would put a limit of 20,000 or 25,000, though I would prefer it at 10,000, he would meet the views of many Members on both sides of the House.

(4.55.) Viscount GRIMSTON (Herts, St. Albans): I should like to point out that if the County Councils were prevented from drawing some portion of the rate from these small boroughs they would not be prepared to place the population of these boroughs under the operation of this Bill. That would be a check on one of the first principles of the Bill, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will adhere to the Bill in its entirety.

(4.56.) Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 174 ; Noes 210.—(Div. List, No. 69.)

(5.10.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): I beg to move, in page 1, line 7, after "is," to leave out "Act," in line 10, and to insert—

"In any parish or parishes within such county, a demand for small holdings."

The object of this Amendment and of another Amendment which stands in my name further down on the Paper is to enter a sort of qualified protest against the form in which the Bill is drawn, and which might lead County Councils to buy land in large blocks in some parts of the county with the view of an experiment being carried out there rather than to localise the experiment by making the small purchasers of land in a greater number of parishes or areas in the county. The two Amendments that stand in my name amount to this: that where a County Council is satisfied that there is a desire for small holdings in any specific parish or parishes in a county, that then the procedure of the Act will be set in motion in order to provide within such parish or within adjoining parishes, or at any rate within reach of those who locally require the lands, that their purchases should be directed to supply that local demand and local requirements; and that the County Councils should not by the form of the Bill be led to enter on an experiment in one or two parts of the county by buying a large block of land. I do not know that I should be justified in discussing an Amendment of this nature at any length; but I wish to move it in order to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman such a statement of his intention with regard to the distribution of the money in large areas as will indicate whether, if this particular Amendment cannot be accepted, he will himself deal with the question which I wish to raise—namely, where there are local wants that these local wants shall, as far as possible, be supplied locally, and that the action of the County Councils shall be directed to the local provision of land rather than to one or more experiments of blocks of land. I beg to move the Amendment which stands in my name.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 7, after the word "is," to leave out the words to "Act," in line 10, and to insert—

"In any parish or parishes within such county, a demand for small holdings."—(Mr. Channing.)

*(5.12.) MR. CHAPLIN: The effect of the hon. Member's Amendment if adopted would be to limit the powers of the County Councils for the acquisition of land to the parish or parishes in which the persons who applied for it resided or to which they belonged. Well, I do not understand why we are to limit the powers of the County Councils in this direction. The County Councils, no doubt, will attend to local requirements, and it must be assumed that this is one of the main and chief objects of the Bill; and I think there is no reason to suppose that the County Councils will not perform their duty, so that there is no reason for excluding the power from the County Councils of taking land in other parts of the county. The Amendment proposed by the hon. Member is a distinct limitation of the power of obtaining small holdings for people who want them. We must assume that the County Councils are composed of men of business who thoroughly understand the work they have to do; and I cannot see anything more unsatisfactory or more prejudicial to the general scope of the Bill than to limit it in this direction. I hope the hon. Gentleman will not persevere with his Amendment.

MR. CHANNING: I will not press the Amendment to a Division, or press it further. I beg to withdraw it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

(5.16.) MR. JESSE COLLINGS: I beg to move the Amendment which stands in the name of my hon. Friend the Member for East Somerset (Mr. Hobhouse), in page 1, line 8, to leave population, but that it was not meant to be applied exclusively to agricultural labourers. The right hon. Gentleman, I understand, practically admits that. Might I suggest that he should put in the words "and others" after "labouring population"? (Laughter.) The right hon. Gentleman laughs, but I may remind him that in the Glebe Lands Act the words "cottagers, labourers, and others," were inserted, thereby indicating that the Act should be applied to some others. I think the object of the Bill is for the benefit of the labouring classes in the main, yet I think that other classes, such as shopkeepers and others, have a perfect right to derive benefit from the Act.

(5.25.) VISCOUNT GRIMSTON: This Bill, I think, obviously includes blacksmiths and others of that description; and the obvious object of the Bill is to put on the land such persons as are capable of using it being benefited by it. I think the Bill ought to contain the words as they now stand.

(5.26.) MR. HALLEY STEWART (Lincolnshire, Spalding): In the small towns and boroughs there is a large population of clerks, about whom no one has yet said a word. Take the law clerks, for instance. Why should not the law clerks in boroughs, and the clerks engaged in shops, and the shop assistants be included in this Bill? They are amongst the labouring population; and I venture to think that the curates in some instances might also be included as belonging to the labouring population. I hope all these limitations will be removed so as to provide for the inclusion of all these classes if it is thought necessary.

(5.27.) MR. WHITBREAD (Bedford): I think the intention of this measure is clearly that the agricultural labourer is to have the first chance. I will not go into the question of whether clerks or curates should have a share in the land; but I say that the labouring population have the first claim. It is to prevent them from floating into the towns that Parliament has embarked upon this sort of legislation; it is to meet their needs, and they have the first claim. I want to know what sort of a claim the labouring population are going to get out of the money at the disposal of the right hon. Gentleman. I should like to know what the right hon. Gentleman is going to get out of his penny on the average valuation of the agricultural districts. It is the labourers who have the first charge, the most urgent claim, and therefore I desire to keep these words in the Bill. If you can satisfy their claim, and still have money to purchase land to give to other classes, I do not at all object to the Bill being changed in that sense; but I think the right hon. Gentleman should hold fast to these words.

(5.29.) MR. STEPHENS (Middlesex, Hornsey): I hope the words "for the labouring population" which have been introduced into the Bill for the purpose of carrying out its main object, which is to retain the labouring population in the rural districts will be allowed to remain. My hope to-day is that we may be able to create a peasant class by lifting the labourers out of the terribly dependent position in which they are now situated. Hitherto they have had no resources, but if they had a small amount of land upon which they could fill up their time, it would be a source of benefit to them and a relief to the farmers who employ them. By devoting their spare time to the cultivation of their acre of land they would be able to get a considerable produce, but the moment they went beyond that limit and kept a horse they would be taking a hazardous step, for the cost of keeping a horse is equal to the whole income of the family of an agricultural labourer. Therefore I think it extremely important to retain the words "labouring population."

(5.33.) MR. SEALE-HAYNE: It is obvious that the words "labouring population" restrict the benefits of the Act to actual working-men. Now what actual working man has sufficient capital to enable him to pay one-fourth of the price of a small holding? There are very few such men in existence. The right hon. Gentleman announced, when he introduced the Bill, that it was intended to create small freeholders. But how are you to create small freeholders unless you extend the operation of the clause to those who have the money to pay for the holding?

(5.35.) MR. HALDANE (Haddington): There are nearly three Parties in this House who would deal differently with this matter. There are those who would restrict the operation of the Bill and make it too fine; there are those who do not wish to restrict it at all; and there are also the Government who do not wish to be judged by the Bill, and who have introduced words into it that are not wanted. I think the drafting of the measure would be considerably improved if the words in question were left out. The Government evidently do not mean to restrict the application of the Bill to the labouring class.

*(5.37.) MR. CHAPLIN: The matter is not one of vital importance, it is only one of detail. The words it is proposed to strike out would not exclude from the benefit of the Bill any class which hon. Government opposite would like to include. If I had had the slightest idea that they would have done so, I would either have accepted the Amendment, or I would myself have moved to omit them. The words are only intended to generally indicate the class for whom the Bill is intended, namely, the labouring population of the country. If there had been no demand for the Bill on the part of that population it would not have been brought in. The class intended to be benefited is mentioned in the 4th clause of the Bill, and I hope the words will be allowed to remain.

(5.40.) MR. H. H. FOWLER: The right hon. Gentleman was rather severe on me this evening for presuming to question the accuracy with which the Bill has been drawn. We have got into a position, as the hon. Member for Haddington has observed, in which there are three parties in the House who attach different meanings to the words in question. The right hon. Gentleman asks us, in the interest of saving time, to pass them over although their precise meaning is not understood by the great portion of the Members of the House. The right hon. Gentleman has said that his intention is that no class should be excluded from the benefit of this Act. Why are these words to be introduced if they mean nothing? Judges will not look at the pious intentions of the Legislature; they will take the words which they find in the Bill. The County Council is to decide, first, whether there is a demand for small holdings for the labouring population. Now, if that means anything, it means that they are to decide whether the labouring population demand small holdings for themselves. The clause does not go on to indicate, as you would expect, that they shall enable the labourers to acquire them if they require them. It has been stated that it will enable everybody to acquire them. Now that is what we want. Then why leave the words in? I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider this matter, and decide to leave them out for they have no meaning whatever.

(5.43.) MR. ROBY (Lancashire, S.E., Eccles): I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to insert in the twelfth line of the clause the words "farm labourers and other persons," which I believe would cover the classes intended to be covered, and would remove ambiguity.

*(5.44.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM: I have not heard any answer given to the argument of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bury. I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture can have weighed what that right hon. Member put so clearly. We all agree that the labourers should first and foremost benefit from the Bill, but others should not be excluded who desire to occupy land for cultivation.

(5.45.) MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN (Birmingham, W.): I scarcely think it will be necessary to go to a Division in regard to a matter of such small importance. Either these words mean something or they mean nothing. If they mean nothing there can be no objection to striking them out; if they mean anything, then I strongly object to them, and I would request the right hon. Gentleman to leave them out. Of course this is a Bill for the benefit of the labouring population; it is also a Bill for multiplying small holdings, and are anxious that it should be a great social reform. Whether the small holder is a blacksmith, a small shopkeeper, or a labourer does not affect the matter in the slightest degree; therefore, I should exceedingly regret if anything were done, either intentionally or advertently which in the slightest degree would restrict the classes to whom small holdings should be given.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am very anxious to meet the views of the Committee in this matter. I will assent to the insertion of the words "and others," after the labouring population," which have been suggested.

(5.48.) MR. ASQUITH (Fife, E.): It is well known to all persons who are connected with the legal profession, or who are engaged in Courts of Law, that there are no two words in the English language which have given more trouble to the Judges than the words "and others." They may mean persons of the same class, or persons of a different class. If they mean persons of the same class they are utterly unhelpful. If they mean persons of a different class then a Judicial Body has to discover some class to which they might possibly apply. I trust the Government will re-consider the desirability of inserting words which might be appropriate enough in dealing with the Preamble of the Bill, but which otherwise must obscure its meaning and defeat the intentions of Parliament.

MR. CHAPLIN: As the meaning of the words does not seem to be satisfactory to the Committee, and as I have never attached any importance to them, I will assent to the Amendment as it stands on the Paper.

(5.50.) Question put, and negatived.

SIR W. FOSTER: I beg, Sir, to propose in page 1, line 10, to leave out the word "may" and to insert the word "shall," and I do so with the view of bringing this measure into closer harmony with the Allotments Act. The clause as it stands gives a double permissiveness. If the Council are of opinion, after deliberate inquiry, that it may be necessary, they may proceed to create these small holdings. I propose that the word "may" should be altered to the word "shall," which is the word in the Allotments Acts. I believe the Bill would be improved by the alteration that I suggest.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, to leave out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."—(Sir W. Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'may' stand part of the Clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: This Amendment would involve the question of compulsory powers.

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: The right hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. The substitution of "shall" for "may" does not at all involve the granting of the compulsory powers dealt with in a subsequent Amendment. The right hon. Gentleman said last night that "may" and "shall" are interchangeable terms involving the same meaning. We merely appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to carry out his own dictum. The word "shall" inserted here simply means that a county, as soon as they have decided that they are justified in putting the Act in force, shall go on to provide suitable land.

*THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): The real question is what construction would be put upon the word "shall." There are Acts in which "may" is read "shall." These are Acts in which a public duty is involved and some latitude given. If this word "shall" is here inserted, County Councils having only a limited power of purchasing a certain amount of land must buy. If it does not involve the question of compulsion the word "may" is the proper word, because that will leave the matter to the discretion of the County Councils. This is not a case in which on a question of construction the word "may" would be read as "shall."

SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): I cannot think that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture is right in saying that this involves compulsion. The words immediately after the word "may" are, "subject to the provisions of this Act." If the words are voluntary and not compulsory, the word "shall" would not have a compulsory effect so far as the sale of land on the part of the owner of land is concerned. If you leave the word "may" there, though the County Councils could by voluntary arrangement with the owner acquire land, yet they may not do so. There is nothing more absurd than the legal decisions of the Courts of Law as between the words "may" and "shall." The matter ought not to be left in a condition of ambiguity. It is said that this Amendment does not leave it open to the County Council to take land which it may acquire voluntarily. Therefore, I wish to clear up the idea that this involves compulsion.

*SIR R. WEBSTER: I really think the ambiguity would be increased if the word "shall" was inserted. The section is to enable County Councils to acquire land "subject to the provisions" of the Act. I admit that the word "shall" would not involve compulsion. All that is required to make the section read properly are enabling words, and the word "shall" would require to be followed by the words "if possible."

MR. LLEWELLYN (Somerset, N.): The words as they stand are clear enough.

*SIR W. FOSTER: I should like to withdraw the Amendment in the interests of the progress of business.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*SIR W. FOSTER: I shall now, Sir, move an Amendment, providing that the Council may acquire land either by voluntary agreement or compulsorily. If this experiment is not to be foredoomed to failure, we should take every step that is possible to insure that land is acquired under such conditions as will enable the Council to sell or let it to the agricultural population on easy terms. If the land is to be obtained at an advantageous price there must be compulsion. I do not want to harass the landlord, for compulsory powers in the background would be seldom used. If compulsion is not in the Bill the land will not be obtainable at a fair price. The experience of the Allotments Act is not favourable and encouraging to the attempt to acquire land voluntarily. Small holdings must, moreover, be diffused throughout the country. They must not all be placed in one locality. Therefore, if you have one landowner willing to sell to the extent of the financial powers of the county, others may not be so minded, and the land will not be, as it ought to be, distributed all over the county. Again, landlords may refuse to sell, and the Act may thus be rendered nugatory by the action of a few owners. Further, the expense attaching to proceeding under agreement as in the Allotments Act is great. As much as £90 an acre has been paid on the average. It is a prohibitive price that would bring about the failure of this Bill. The rates, moreover, must not be burdened by the purchase of a large quantity of unsuitable land, because in such a case as the purchase of large parcels of land from owners unwilling to sell suitable portions alone, much of the land would require to be sold at a considerable loss. The right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture said he was a convert on the question of the application of the principle of compulsion to allotments. I hope he will be a convert in connection with the Bill before us. The people in the country are agitating for the insertion of compulsory powers in this Bill, believing that an Act with compulsory powers would do something to arrest the depopulation that is now going on in the rural districts. Having attended Conferences in various parts of the country, I have been very much impressed by the earnestness with which a stand has been taken on behalf of the labouring population for compulsory powers to be put into this Bill. The teaching of the right hon. Member for West Birmingham and of the hon. Member for Bordesley has taken deep root in the minds of the people in the rural districts, and I believe no legislation of this kind will give them what they want—access to the land on easy and fair terms—unless that legislation contains the principle of compulsory purchase.

Amendment proposed, in page 1, line 10, after the word "may," to insert the words "either by voluntary agreement or compulsorily."—(Sir W. Foster.)

(6.12.) MR. BARCLAY: I do not believe it would be possible for any man to make a living with farming land bought by compulsory purchase. It is very well to say the compulsory price is 10 per cent. over the fair price; but those who have acquired land by compulsory purchase will agree with me in saying that the increase in almost every case over the fair price is from 25 to 50 per cent. Members must recollect that it is desirable to have land in the neighbourhood of villages and towns, and valuers do take into account the possibility of such land becoming building land. The additional price due to compulsory purchase does not make so much difference to a labourer who is working on only a fourth or an eighth of an acre of land; but when you come to 20 or 50 acres, the excessive price due to compulsory purchase would more than swallow up any profit made upon the land. I do not think compulsion would have the same effect as the case of the sale of small holdings in the case of allotments. For instance, the sale of land by allotment is rather a retail business which the landlord does not care to be troubled with unless he is compelled to do so. The success of this Bill depends entirely upon the landlords being as willing sellers as the County Council could be willing buyers. It is of essential importance to the success of this Bill that the land shall be bought cheap, and, in very many counties in England already, land can be bought at an extremely low figure. Within a few miles of London you can buy land for 10 an acre which would be suitable for these small holdings. In such cases this Bill would have a beneficial effect, not only with respect to the labourers, but also with respect to every other person in the community. I do not think we would be doing any service to the agricultural labourers if we induced them to take land acquired under compulsory terms. I would impress upon Members of the House that the increase of the value of the land to the agricultural labourer depends more upon the climate and situation with reference to the market than on considerations as to the quality of the soil. I cannot speak so much for England, but I know that in Scotland the holdings might be as large as 30, 40, or 60 acres. But if it is attempted to purchase such holdings upon compulsory terms, then it must be impracticable for the cultivators of those holdings to live upon them. Under the economic conditions now in force, the low prices of agricultural produce, and the steady increase of wages, it looks as if only the finest land in England will be worth an economic rent. I would certainly deprecate strongly the insertion of compulsory powers in this Bill.

(6.16.) MR. JEFFREYS (Hants, Basingstoke): I would ask my right hon. Friend the Minister of Agriculture to resist the demand for compulsion. I would remind the House that a Committee of the House reported that if you had compulsion you would be doing a great injury in many cases to landowners. But I think you would be doing a great injury to small farmers when any land is wanted. I do not think land which is now sold at £10 an acre will be land which the labourers will want. They know that the land is no good, for people cannot make anything out of it. What they want is the best land they can get, and it would be very hard upon the farmer that you should compulsorily take away the best portion of his farm, especially when that farm is near a village. I would remind the Committee that farmers themselves feel very strongly on the subject. This morning I attended a meeting of the Central Chamber of Agriculture, and a resolution was unanimously passed against giving these compulsory powers. Although I am all in favour of small holdings, and hope and believe we shall be able to get them by the voluntary sale of land, I hope the Committee will not sacrifice the small farmers and small owners by taking away the best portion of their farms in order to make these small holdings.

because I was not at that time a member of the Government. But I specially supported it because allotments were proved and ascertained to be for the public good, and of that I had not the shadow of a doubt for a moment. With regard to the provision for small holdings, I do not think there is any Member of the House at present who will be bold enough to say more than this: that they are an experiment, and that the Bill which is now upon the Table of the House contains proposals which must be regarded as an experiment, but which we all hope, and think there is reason to expect, may succeed. There is that complete difference between the two cases which, there were nothing else to be said, could be, in my opinion, quite sufficient to justify the distinction in the action of the Government in the one case and also in the other. There is another reason in addition: that the power of compulsion at the present moment is absolutely unnecessary. I stated on the First Reading of the Bill, though the hon. Member appears altogether to have forgotten it, that the quantity of land in the market for sale at the present moment was something remarkable, and that the difficulty was rather on the part of the owners of land to find a market for their land than to induce them to sell it. I had some figures given to me only yesterday, coming from a single firm, dealing with this question. I have mislaid them at the present moment, but I collect them sufficiently well to state them generally to the House. This is a firm who, during the last three years, sold some 67,000 acres of land in England alone out of 375,000 which they had at their disposal, but for which they were unable to find purchasers. If you take the number of eminent firms who have land at their disposal and multiply the number of acres which they succeed in selling, at the same proportion, you will find that there is in the market at the present time waiting for purchasers an amount of land which makes the idea of compulsion entirely unnecessary and even ridiculous. The hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay) pointed out that close to London, within 40 or 50 miles of the Metropolis, there were thousands of acres of land which could be sold and purchased at £10 per acre at the present moment. That is quite true; but, as far as I am acquainted with that land, it is not of a character which I should purchase myself. But the hon. Gentleman, who is a much better practical farmer than I am, and who knows a great deal more on the subject of the cultivation of the soil, said it was land that, so far as he was concerned, he would be very glad to buy. The hon. Member who moved the Amendment gave as one of his principal reasons for compulsion that he was anxious to see the land obtained at the cheapest possible price, by which I understood him to mean obtained at something less than a fair market price.

SIR W. FOSTER: No, no!

*MR. CHAPLIN: Then what on earth is the object of compulsion when so many acres are waiting for purchase?

SIR W. FOSTER: I mentioned the land at £90 an acre was too high, and that was the price paid by voluntary agreement. We want compulsion in the background, not for the purpose of using it but to prevent the advent of a new purchaser in the market having the usual result of raising the price.

*MR. CHAPLIN: That is to lower the price by the force of compulsion.

SIR W. FOSTER: To prevent the rise.

*MR. CHAPLIN: Well; that appears to me to be just the same thing. I understand that it is the view of the hon. Member that the land ought to be cheap because it is required for a great national object. Granted that it is for a national object, should not the burden of this fall upon the nation and not upon a limited class of the nation, the owners of land? That is my view, and therein I differ from the hon. Gentleman in the view of compulsion. Compulsory measures, instead of bringing cheap land, so far as experience goes, means dear land. When the

St. Faith's case is given as an instance, the hon. Member says— "Do not be afraid of that; we will soon insert other clauses which will prevent all losses from compulsion in future." That is to say, he is going to take from landowners the protection given by Parliament which they at present enjoy—"No, no!"—wherever land is taken by compulsion by what may even be the arbitrary, unfair action of a Local Authority. There is another practical objection to the introduction of this. It is quite certain, whatever else happens, that the new holders when they embark in their career will have very considerable difficulties to face, many troubles to get over in regard to which they will be very glad to receive assistance from neighbours and friends, and with the application of the principle of compulsion there will be a certainty of a great deal of friction between classes on the land. It is certain that when an owner has land taken from him under compulsion he will feel considerably aggrieved, and I question very much if it will tend to encourage that assistance what is now given by farmers to their poorer neighbours. I know many instances of this, and one especial instance I recollect in relation to the small holdings in East Lincolnshire. Visiting the spot where I have property of my own, accompanied by an old tenant-farmer, I was struck with the manner in which he was looked up to by the small holders whose land adjoined his. Over and over again did he afford assistance at times of trouble and difficulty. When his horses were not at work he would lend a team to plough their land, and in many ways he rendered the greatest possible assistance to the occupiers of small holdings. The first effect of compulsion will be to destroy all this kind of good feeling among the various classes, and I believe, instead of advancing the success of this measure, it will do much to retard the prosperity of the small holders. I could say much more on the subject, but I do not desire to do so now, for I think the Committee will be prepared to come to a decision on this question.

Mr. Chaplin

*(6.35.) MR. HALDANE: The right hon. Gentleman is mistaken if he thinks this question of compulsion can be disposed of with so little discussion. This is one of the most important questions arising on the Bill. The question of whether we do or do not accept compulsion goes to the essence of the difference of parties on this subject. Let us see what is the argument the right hon. Gentleman has presented. First of all he comes forward as an advocate of this small holding measure, but as an advocate with little faith. He regards it as an experiment, and he has no great hopes of its success. We do not advocate this as an experiment merely. It may be difficult to develop a prosperous system of small holdings; it may take time, the plan may not work out at once, but we do look to this measure with a desire that in its framework it shall have an educating effect on the class of agricultural labourers that never yet has legislation had. It is not merely the possession of a small holding; we look to the possibility of raising the whole class of labourers, and because of the facilities this measure may offer for that purpose we lay much stress upon it. The right hon. Gentleman objects that the principle of compulsion will create friction among classes, but have we not had the principle applied for many years for public purposes? Legislation has sanctioned the compulsory acquisition of land by Railway Companies, and it is recognised that for public purposes it is not only desirable but natural that there should be this power of compulsory purchase. Then it is said that in the case of Railway Companies there is the protection of Parliament for landowners, and in the case of allotments there is the indirect protection of the Provisional Order system. Now, we do not propose to place all landowners at the mercy of a County Council or any other body. We propose compulsory purchase by a cheaper means. It is true that the Lands Clauses Act provides a machinery which is costly and clumsy, but which at the same time does afford protection to landowners. Nobody, so far as I am aware, has suggested that County Councils should have unlimited power to take the best part of an estate or the prettiest piece of a park; what is suggested is that there should be a power of compulsory purchase to be put in motion under the sanction of a competent authority, whether of Parliament, as in the case of a Railway Company, or in the case of small holdings under the sanction of the County Court Judge, who, with the aid of an Assessor, would be a suitable tribunal. At all events there is nothing in the point that we propose to place unlimited power with the County Council without check or protection. Then the right hon. Gentleman proceeded to another argument; he said we want land cheap, and that is desirable, but that sale under compulsion makes land dear. That is an argument put forward by the hon. Member for Forfar, and repeated on either side. I suppose there is something in it. But I am utterly unable to understand why, because you have compulsory power, you should pay more for land; surely you can take it by voluntary agreement if voluntary agreement gets it more cheaply than compulsion. Though the compulsory clause be introduced in the Bill it will not be the exclusive method; it will be only an alternative method, and I believe in 99 cases out of 100 in the future the compulsory clause would not be resorted to. But our experience of the St. Faith's case and others with which we are painfully familiar shows us how desirable it is in the interest of the working of the Bill that a compulsory clause should be included. With such a clause landlords will be more willing to treat, and in the natural course of things a great deal of land near villages and small towns will be made available for holdings. There is a great deal of such land in the country not wanted for building purposes and which never will be used for building, and yet under the name of accommodation land it is only sold to small cultivators at an unreasonable rate. It is just there should be this power of compulsory purchase at fair market value for the purpose of small holdings, and that County Councils should not be at the mercy of extortionate landowners.

*(6.45.) SIR F. MILNER (Nottingham, Bassetlaw): It seems to me that a certain number of hon. Gentlemen opposite regard the word "compulsion" with the same veneration as that with which a certain pious old lady looked on the blessed word "Mesopotamia." For my own part, I cannot see how it will be possible to insert compulsory clauses in this Bill without causing the greatest amount of friction, irritation, and injustice. Take such an instance as that of an owner of 100 acres of grass land attached to his house near a village. This land is his only means of subsistence; he keeps cows on the land and goes in for dairying, his wife making butter and cheese. Half-a-dozen village Ahabs cast longing eyes on the land, and, setting some patent Parish Council machinery in motion, compel the owner to sell the land for small holdings, and that man's means of livelihood and maintenance of his family is gone. It is obvious that in such cases the greatest amount of injustice may be inflicted. No one can be more anxious than I am, that this Bill should be a real Bill for the benefit of the agricultural classes, and I am certain that it will be found that owners of land will be quite ready to co-operate as they have done in relation to the Allotments Act. There is no need to introduce the friction and irritation compulsion must cause. I am very glad the right hon. Gentleman the Minister for Agriculture takes a firm attitude on the question, and I hope the majority against the proposal will be sufficiently large to knock on the head all idea of compulsion in reference to this Bill.

SECOND READING. [ADJOURNED DEBATE.]

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate [31st March].

(6.48.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): I hope the attempt will not be made at such a time as this to rush a Bill of this kind through without explanation. The main business of the Sitting is concluded, and I must remonstrate against the Government taking advantage of an unexpected couple of minutes to smuggle a Bill through its Second Reading. Though I have read the Bill I cannot say I have given sufficient study to its provisions in which I know many Members take a keen interest.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member objects the Debate stands over.

A LORD OF THE TREASURY (Sir H. MAXWELL, Wigton): I may mention that the Bill has been the subject of consultation between Members of either side who are interested, and it has been agreed there need be no opposition at this stage.

Debate further adjourned till Thursday.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.—(No. 31.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

(12.40.) MR. GERALD BALFOUR (Leeds, Central): In rising to move the Second Reading of this Bill, I am sensible that I have to contend against a double disadvantage. In the first place, though the practical issue is one of extreme importance, the subject is so complicated, difficult and technical that only speakers happily and exceptionally endowed could hope to invest it with anything like interest. In the second place, a Bill dealing with the rating of machinery has now for so many successive Sessions appeared among what are called the "hardy annuals" that it is difficult, if not impossible, to say anything on the subject which has not already been said, and better said, by hon. Friends who have had charge of the Bill on previous occasions. On the other hand, there is some encouragement in the reflection that on no one of these occasions, so far, has this Bill met with an adverse vote in the House of Commons. The Bill introduced in the year 1890 by my hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester (Mr. Winterbotham) passed its Second Reading by a majority of no less than 239 to 87; and last year the Bill introduced by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. H. S. Wright) passed its Second Reading, no Division being challenged. Under these circumstances, and considering that the present Bill contains certain modifications which are intended to disarm criticisms brought against the Bill in its original form, I venture to express a hope that this Bill will be received as favourably as its predecessors have been. I think I may also claim not merely that the principle is one which on more than one occasion has received the emphatic assent of the House of Commons, but it has been supported, and is being supported, more and more in the country. Petitions have flowed in from manufacturing firms, from Chambers of Commerce, from Trades Councils, from Trades Unions, from Assessment Committees, in favour of the Bill; and only yesterday an influential general deputation waited upon the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board in favour of the Bill, showing what force and importance this movement has attained. I am aware that opponents of the Bill will probably not lay very much stress on petitions and representations which have come from manufacturing firms and Chambers of Commerce. It has been said, and I daresay it will be said again, that the Bill is intended for the relief of rich manufacturers. Well, Sir, I am not a manufacturer, rich or otherwise, but I support the Bill not as one which is intended to relieve a particular class in the community from burdens that class now bears, but rather as a Bill to avert from the industrial community generally a danger hanging over them, which, if now merely a danger apprehended, will become a danger realised unless some present remedy be adopted to avert it. But I would call the attention of those who describe this as merely a manufacturers' relief Bill more particularly to the action which has been taken in connection with the Bill by the representatives of Trades Unions and of Assessment Committees. We have been given to understand by opponents of the measure on previous occasions that whatever advantage the Bill may give to manufacturers means by so much an addition to the rates; and this will practically be an addition to the rent paid by the artisan. But that is not the view taken by the majority of the Trades Unions—I might say of the overwhelming majority of Trades Unions. I believe the deputation the right hon. Gentleman received yesterday represented half a million operatives. Now Trades Unions are sufficiently enlightened and intelligent to be thoroughly aware how taxation affects the interests of the industrial community, especially having regard to foreign competition, and they know that in part the loss must fall upon the operatives. They are entirely at one with the manufacturers in this matter. But the adhesion of so many Assessment Committees is even more incompatible with the view I am now dealing with than is the action taken by the Trades Unions. Assessment Committees have to value the property of manufacturers, and when you find that two parties whose interests are prima facie entirely opposed acting in complete harmony, I think there is ground for a strong inference that the Amendment of the law which is suggested is one in the interest of the community generally. Now, what are the causes of the dissatisfaction which has brought about this state of things which has united the raters and the rated in one common action in favour of the Bill? We contend, first of all, that the present law is uncertain in its operation and application. We contend, secondly, that the most recent decisions on the question, the most authoritative declaration and interpretation of the law, tend toward a complete departure from the usages which have been followed hitherto by Assessment Committees; that if the principles of these recent decisions are carried out with strictness and severity they will really produce nothing less than a revolution in the present practice of assessment, and that the change will undoubtedly operate with great hardship on all the industrial classes in the country. These are our two main contentions. I do not say the principle of the law is uncertain. I only say the application of it is uncertain. I am aware that many legal gentlemen hold the opinion that the law remains unchanged in principle, and I am quite willing to avoid as far as I can ruffling their legal composure; therefore I will not even contend that the law has been changed. I will merely say there has been a development—and development is to my mind an equally efficacious word for describing what has taken place—and it is at the same time less disputatious. It has been my not altogether pleasant duty, since I undertook to move the Second Reading of this Bill, carefully to study the cases upon which the most important declaration of the law have been made. I cannot say it is exactly the study I would recommend to any friend, unless he should happen to be very much at loss for something to do—something to occupy his leisure hours. Indeed, to say the truth, I would advise him to adopt the alternative of the study of German metaphysics—a subject not more obscure, and certainly more attractive. But I have taken the trouble to thread my way through the winding mazes of argument and counter-argument leading up to judicial decisions on the subject, and I would like just as shortly as I can and avoiding all unnecessary details, to state to the House the direction in which there has really been a development of Judge-made law in connection with the rating of machinery. For this purpose it is not necessary to do more than to make a passing reference to the great landmark in this legislation, the Act of 1840. During the period since the passing of that Act no doubt important decisions have been given on the rating of machinery, but I do not think I need trouble the House with any of these until we come to the case "The Queen v. Leigh." In this case, tried before Lord Chief Justice Cockburn and Mr. Justice Blackburn, Lord Chief Justice Cockburn laid down a triple classification of machinery in respect to rating. The first class he spoke of as mere chattels, or simply chattels, and this class is not rateable. Then there is another class of machinery which is so far attached to the freehold as to form part of it, and with regard to this class of machinery there is also no obscurity or dispute: it is, of course, rateable with the rest of the hereditament. But between these classes there is an intermediate class, and that is where the trouble has arisen. With regard to the ordinary hereditament—a dwelling-house, for instance—does not exist or is so important that we may rate it. But that is not the case with manufacturing machinery. A rateable class uniting the two contradictory descriptions of "contradictory descriptions," or it is "attached chattel." It may be said, on the one hand, it is not rateable, or, on the other hand, it is not exempted. It is not rateable, for this reason: it is certainly machinery which is the personal property of the owner, and as no personal property is rateable it follows that this is not rateable. Neither is it exempted, and therefore a new phrase has been found for it; it cannot be said to be rateable, but it is said to enhance the value of the hereditament for the purpose of rating. How is this non-descript class, which is "neither fish, flesh, fowl, nor good red herring," to be defined? Lord Chief Justice Cockburn defines it thus:—

"Things which though capable of being removed are yet so far attached as that it is intended that they should remain permanently with the undertaking. . . . remain permanent appendages to it, and essential to the working of the undertaking."

Now, in this definition there are two points to which special attention must be paid. In the first place, the machinery must be "attached"—whatever meaning may be conveyed by the word "attached." In the second place, it is to remain a "permanent appendage" to the premises, to be "essential to the working" of the premises. Then further light is thrown on the meaning of the word "attached" by the judgment delivered on the same occasion by Mr. Justice Blackburn. I will read his words—

"The rule laid down has been that when the things are attached to the premises, although they are removable afterwards, still they are part of the premises. . . . But if things or chattels be merely fixed to the premises, and so far fastened to the premises as to be still chattels, but fixed and steadied for the purpose of use there, they remain chattels altogether. . . . The ordinary illustration is a mirror. . . ."

I need not give all the words.

"On the other hand, a grate which is built into a chimney, although it is capable of being removed by a tenant, would still be fixed to the premises, and, therefore, part of what would be considered to be let to the hypothetical tenant, and for which he would pay rent. . . . Look at the various matters put here. They all, with the exception of the meters. . . . are, although but slightly, attached to the premises. Nevertheless, I think it clear that they are all, in fact, attached to the premises, so as to come within the principle laid down."

Now it is clear from these words of Mr. Justice Blackburn that in his view the word "attached" implies that there must be some physical connection that the article must be in some way physically attached to the premises. Therefore, the result we arrive at from these two judgments is as follows: That first of all there are three kinds of machinery; first, machinery which is a mere chattel and not rateable; secondly, there are fixtures rateable with the rest of the freehold; and, thirdly, there is a debateable class not in itself rateable, but which is taken into consideration as enhancing the value of the premises on two conditions—first, that in some way the machinery is physically attached to the premises; and, secondly, that it is essential to the premises for the purposes for which the premises are used. I do not say the definition is perfect; I think it is rather calculated to give rise to litigation and increase lawyer's bills, and I think it is also possible, under a strict interpretation, that it might include certain machinery which by ordinary usage is exempted from rating. But I think if matters had remained there, notwithstanding our objection, we should never have heard of "Rating of Machinery" Bills; and it would not have been necessary for me or other Members to trouble the House with these somewhat dry disquisitions. The case at Bishop Wearmouth and the Tyne Boiler case have, however, completely swept away all these tests which, in the case of "The Queen v. the Inhabitants of Leigh" were recognised as necessary in connection with this debateable machinery—namely, the test of attachment. The Judgment of the Master of the Rolls really only enforced that in the Bishop Wearmouth case, and it so clearly and undeniably excludes attachment, in the sense of physical attachment, that I will read it—

"The rule, as I shall try to express it, will leave out that word 'attached,' will leave out 'fixed,' and will leave out a great many other words that have been used, and I believe that that case and all the other cases will be found to come under this rule, that things which are on the premises to be rated and which are there for the purpose of making and do make them, that is those premises, fit for the particular purpose for which they are used ought to be taken into account in ascertaining the value of the premises for rating purposes. I have left out advisedly the words 'attached,' 'fastened,' 'annexed,' and the other words."

duced by my hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham are not the same as the Bill of 1889. These Bills are not the same, and far from being more strong or drastic than that of 1889; they are distinctly weaker, and recommend less thorough-going amendment of the existing law; by the existing law I mean the law as interpreted by judicial decisions, and not the Statute Law. The history of the modifications is very simple. The Bill of 1887 was opposed by my right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade (Sir M. Hicks Beach) for the purpose of allowing the interested parties to endeavour to come to some agreement; and the promoters of the Bill, while not admitting that it went beyond the limits of fairness and justice, were not unwilling to accede to a compromise which would secure the passing of the Bill. A compromise was arrived at and embodied in an Amendment, but, unfortunately, the Bill was squeezed out at the end of the Session. The Bill of 1889 really embodied the Amendment of which I have spoken, but that also was squeezed out at the end of the Session. The present Bill is, in the main, drawn on the lines of the Bill of last year. The objection of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General (Sir R. Webster) to the original form of the Bill was that it proceeded affirmatively—that is to say, it defined the machinery which was liable to be rated, and left all other machinery, free. He contended that such a measure should proceed negatively—that is to say, should define the machinery which was not to be rated, and leave all the machinery which did not come within that definition within the area of rating. We have endeavoured to meet that objection in the 1st clause, in which we say that “Any increased value arising from machines, tools, or appliances which are not fixed, or are only so fixed that they can be removed from their place without necessitating the removal of any part of such hereditament shall be excluded.”

It will be observed that this definition is really a definition of movable chattels. We do not attempt to define the debateable machinery, but, incidentally, reversing Lord Esher's procedure, we have re-introduced the test of attachment. We say that machinery not attached in the manner described in the 1st clause is not to be rated; and where it is so attached it is to be rated, and by inference we indicate what are to be the limits of debateable machinery. The clause is really intended to enable a clear and distinct line to be drawn between debateable machinery and mere chattels, and I think it is so drawn that the rating authorities will have little difficulty in applying it. It is true that this definition is somewhat wider than that of last year's Bill, and if taken alone would exclude from rateability machinery which that Bill included; but we have introduced a proviso which will prevent the possibility of the unfair or unjust application of it. I do not refer to the second proviso, which is common to both Bills, and is to the effect that machinery for producing or transmitting first motive power shall not come within the Act, and shall be rated as heretofore. I refer to the previous one, which is to the effect—

“That the gross annual value of any such hereditament containing machinery shall be estimated at not less than the sum at which it might reasonably be expected to let for the purposes for which it is used on a tenancy from year to year void of the machines, tools, and appliances which it might reasonably be expected would be supplied by the tenant.”

I shall be quite prepared to contend that that proviso contains in itself the right and proper rule for estimating the value of hereditaments containing machinery if they are to be rated on the same principle as dwelling-houses. But we have not gone so far; we contend that this rule merely expresses the minimum at which such premises should be rated. We are told that under this proviso such premises would be rated as mere shells. That is not our intention, and we make that clear by declaring the minimum at which such buildings shall be rated. If there were machines belonging to the debateable class over and above what would fall under the proviso the rateability of the hereditament would be by so much increased. Looking at the definition, and the way we have hedged it round from the possibility of abuse, I do not think it can fairly be contended that we are attempting to obtain for manufacturers relief to which they are not properly entitled. I have shown how precarious is the position of manufacturers in most towns—how uncertain is the law; have pointed out how unequal it is in different districts, and in what an awkward position the rating authorities are placed; and have endeavoured to explain how the Bill will meet these points; and for these reasons I think the Bill should be passed. I would now venture to say something in anticipation of the objections which may be brought against it. From what quarter does this opposition come? Principally, so far as I have been able to gather, from the agricultural interest. I think if the operation of the Bill were fully understood this opposition would be largely abated. The agricultural interest cannot be affected by it, except in districts partly industrial and partly agricultural. In purely agricultural Unions the effect of the Bill, if any, would be favourable. At present, under Lord Esher's interpretation, it is impossible to define what is and what is not a chattel, and machines used in agriculture will probably be swept into the assessor's net. If the machinery in the Chard case ought to be rated, one cannot see why agricultural machinery should not also be rated. Take the case of Unions, partly agricultural and partly industrial. I would ask hon. Gentlemen representing agricultural constituencies whether it is really in their interest to take a step which would prevent the increase of industrial pursuits in their constituencies? Can it be to the advantage of a mixed agricultural and industrial population, that the employment now given to operatives in manufactures should be taken away? I should say it was to their advantage, as far as possible, to foster such industrial pursuits, and to afford full employment for everybody in the Union, and prevent throwing on the rates those who, not having the opportunity of following those industrial employments, might be unable to support themselves. If the principle of the Chard case is applied to districts partly agricultural and partly industrial, and manufacturers and others become liable to additional assessment, they will be very careful to see that the farmers and others employing agricultural machinery do not escape. They will undoubtedly put the law into motion, and will take very good care that the agricultural interests do not escape. I would ask the Members for the agricultural constituencies to look frankly at this matter and consider whether this Bill does not offer a fair compromise. I do not think we are demanding more than we are really entitled to. I think in this Bill we have been as moderate as we could be expected to be, and I trust that the opposition will be withdrawn. Beside the agricultural interest, we have of course, to meet the opposition of the property owners, who are afraid that a portion of the rates now borne by the manufacturers will be thrown upon them. "Someone," the manufacturers say, "will have to pay the rates;" and if the manufacturers are relieved, the excess, they contend, will be thrown upon the owners and occupiers of house property. With regard to that, I should like to point out that, if the burden is borne by the community generally, it will not bear so hardly on any single member of the community. If the proposals adopted in this Bill are adopted, the rates will be raised something like 5 or 6 per cent. I do not deny that that is a very serious rise; but compare it to the additional assessment thrown on hereditaments containing machinery. If that is to be assessed at three or four times what is the ordinary practice of Assessment Committees, the hardship may be so great as to make it impossible to carry on such establishments at all.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I think I ought to tell the hon. Member that his estimate is excessive.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I was anxious not to overstate my case. I believe, in the case of Sunderland, the difference would be larger than in some other parts of the country. But I can understand that this House will not be prepared to accept the proposals we make in this Bill if the effect of those proposals is to transfer from manufacturing establishments rates which they have hitherto borne and place them on the shoulders of those who do not now pay. Our case is that we are not proposing what in practice would produce a large change.

We are endeavouring to prevent a large change. Sunderland is altogether an exceptional case, and my own belief is that in 99 cases out of every 100 no change would take place. The rating authorities have stuck to the old practice, and an opportunity should be given to them of not changing but of continuing their practice. On this subject, if I am not wearying the House, I will read a letter which was read yesterday in the course of a deputation to my right hon. Friend the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Ritchie). The letter was from Mr. Thomas Lings, Controller of Poor Rates for Manchester, to my hon. Friend (Sir William Houldsworth.) Mr. Lings says—

"With reference to your inquiry I am able to say from personal experience, as the Controller of Poor Rates for the township of Manchester, that there is absolutely no foundation for the statement that the Bill to amend the laws as to rating of machinery will in any way affect the existing poor rate for the City of Manchester or render a re-valuation necessary. From my experience I am also able to say that the Bill practically embodies the principle which has always been adopted in the manufacturing districts of Lancashire, Cheshire, and the West Riding of Yorkshire, and I believe throughout the Midland Counties also. I therefore think it is equally without foundation to say that the Bill, if passed, will render a new valuation necessary in any of those districts."

It is clear from that letter that my contention is supported by a very high authority—that this Bill will not produce a change in the practice of the rating authorities, but will merely avert a change which is otherwise threatened. We have also been threatened with opposition from the Representatives of Birmingham; but the case of Birmingham is rather a peculiar one, because they have simply a valuation which I do not think has been adopted in any other place—according to the normal horse-power. I fail to see how our Bill would make any difference to Birmingham. The rating authorities of that town say that their system really carries out the existing law, for in making this valuation for horse-power they really include in the valuation hereditaments with machinery which comes under the debateable class.

We really restrict it to machinery which comes under the debateable class, and, as I said, I do not see how the Bill will interfere. I may further say that I do not believe Birmingham is more severely rated at present with regard to manufacturing establishments, than it would be rated under our Bill. I have gone through some of the objections which I imagine may be made to this Bill, and I can only say that, however natural it may be that these objections should be urged, I hope they will not prevail with this House. I deny altogether that it is a true description of this Bill to say that it is brought forward in the interests of a particular class of the ratepayers; on the contrary, it is a measure of national interest and national importance. We do not ask that the manufacturers of this country should have any special privileges. There are some countries in which the manufacturing industries are protected by means of bounties and protective tariffs, and where they are actually free from liability to the rates which are imposed on other forms of commerce. We do not ask for anything of that kind; we simply ask that the law should be clear, that it should be equal, and that it should be equitable. At present the law is not clear and it is not equal. It differs in different parts of the country, and what is more important is that it is different from the law of Scotland and Ireland. This Bill would simply assimilate the law in all parts of the United Kingdom. I do not think it is fair that English manufacturers should be called upon to bear a burden from which the manufacturers of Scotland and Ireland are free. All that we ask is that the law with regard to the rating of machinery should be on all-fours with the law for rating other kinds of hereditaments, and that the rating authorities of the country should not be compelled against their wishes, against the established practice, and against what they conceive to be best for the interests which are committed to their charge, to adopt what is practically an entirely new form of rating. There are some gentlemen who admit that a grievance exists, but they say this is a large question which should not be dealt with piecemeal. They say it is a question which the Government should take up and deal with as a whole. That is also the view that was taken by the Select Committee in 1887; but five years have passed since then, and has anything been done? Are we any nearer to the prospect of this question being taken up by the Government? And it must be remembered, too, that the Select Committee, while they expressed the opinion that the question should be dealt with by the Government as a whole, at the same time added a recommendation to the rating authorities not to depart from the system of assessment which they had so far adopted. In the main, the rating authorities have observed that recommendation; but there have been exceptions, as in the notorious Chard case. But we cannot expect that system to go on perpetually. We cannot expect that the rating authorities will be content to remain much longer in their present position. They have to administer the law as it is laid down by the Judges, and that is why we ask the House to pass this Bill. We ask the House to relieve the rating authorities from the awkward position in which they are now placed by assimilating the declaration of the law to what has hitherto been the practice of the rating authorities and to what has also been the spirit of the law itself.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Gerald Balfour.)

* (1.45.) SIR E. BIRKBECK (Norfolk, E.) moved the rejection of the Bill. He said: I do not think anyone in this House can object to the agricultural interest having the opportunity of raising its voice against a proposal which, if passed, will impose increased burdens on the shoulders of their constituents; and especially do we feel the grievance in the matter, because it is only too well-known that the agricultural industry has suffered more than other trades, and is nearer the Bankruptcy Court than any other trade in the United Kingdom. The depression of the last 15 years proves conclusively the truth of what I say. But I do not only speak on behalf of the agricultural interest, because there are others who would feel deeply aggrieved if the burdens now imposed on the manufacturers were transferred to the shoulders of the small traders, the small shopkeepers, small owners of property, and others, who can ill afford that any fresh burdens should be placed upon them. It is perfectly natural that hon. Members representing manufacturing constituencies should welcome this proposal, and everyone will congratulate them that, through the medium of this Bill, they think they are going to escape from rates which they have paid for many years. The supporters of this measure have sent round a number of circulars to Members on the subject of this Bill, and in one of them I find these words:—

"Any taxation laid upon the industries of the country is a tax upon labour, and must to a large extent come out of the pockets of the labouring classes."

That is precisely what we say. If this liability is to be transferred from the manufacturing to the agricultural industry, the farm labourers will, according to this argument, be sufferers in consequence of the change. The House must be aware, and, indeed, it is a well-known fact, that the manufacturers of the country have been making astounding fortunes, to say the least of it. At any rate, some of the limited companies have been paying very high dividends, and I would ask has the trade of the country suffered in consequence of this Bill not having been passed? The gross profits assessed under Schedule D of the Income Tax have increased between 1881 and 1890 by seventy millions, and the exports of home produce from the United Kingdom have increased by no less a sum than forty millions. But as regards the unfortunate industry for which I am pleading—an industry that is bound to be affected in some districts if this Bill passes—the value of the land assessed under Schedule A has decreased since 1879-80 by no less a sum than twelve millions, and that, I believe, is understated rather than overstated. This is some explanation of the fact that the Central Chambers of Agriculture and the Associated Chambers, 53 in number, have protested against this proposal, and have asked hon. Members who represent agricultural constituencies to do everything in their power to prevent its passing. Within the last few days more than 40 Petitions have been presented from the agricultural interest against this Bill, and I fail to see why rates which have long been borne by the manufacturers, who are able to bear it, should be transferred to the shoulders of an almost bankrupt industry. The whole system of rating is an anomaly; but why, I ask, should this single question of machinery be taken up and everything else left out in the cold, and a pile of grievances created, simply because the Government had not acted upon the recommendation of the Select Committee? The Committee recommended that the whole subject should be dealt with by the Government in a comprehensive way, and my hon. Friend says that nothing has been done since 1887. I regret that the Government have not dealt with this matter as recommended by the Select Committee, and I should be glad to hear from my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ritchie) that when the Government come into office again after the next General Election they will take up this question and settle it once for all. It is no use trying to settle this matter piecemeal. Besides those I have mentioned, there is another class of men who will be affected by this Bill, a body for whom my right hon. Friend (Mr. Ritchie) has done so much—I mean the allotment holders in the vicinity of some of these manufactories, and, again, the small holders whom we are trying to create will be affected; and I ask are these men, on coming into their allotments, or their small holdings, to find themselves saddled with these increased rates which the manufacturers have borne in the past? It has been very justly said by the Birmingham and District Joint Rating Authorities that "If this Bill is passed into law the rating authorities throughout the country will have to revise their valuation lists and largely reduce the rateable values of buildings containing machinery; and many of such buildings will be rated simply as warehouses containing machinery." Further, they say "Parliament is asked to pass a law in the interests of one section of ratepayers at the expense of, and prejudicial to, the interests of the general body of ratepayers." Why is such a state of things to be allowed? On behalf of the agricultural industry I say most unhesitatingly that it will be a very great disappointment to us if the Government encourage the passing of this measure, and I hope in the Division we shall see—though in all probability we shall be thoroughly well beaten—the President of the Board of Agriculture supporting the agricultural interests of the country in this matter.

MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E., Gorton): I should like to ask whether, for the sake of information, the hon. Gentleman will name any one agricultural district which will be affected by the Bill?

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: Every county in England will be more or less affected.

MR. MATHER: Kindly name one.

*SIR E. BIRKBECK: My own county. In conclusion, let me say that although we may be beaten on this Bill, we are determined to do our utmost to prevent it from being carried through. I think it is only fair that I should state that we shall oppose it at every stage, because we feel that the recommendation of the Select Committee ought to be carried out, and the matter dealt with by the Government in a comprehensive manner. I trust, therefore, that every Member representing an agricultural constituency on this side of the House, or on the other, will do his utmost to prevent this Bill becoming law, a Bill which I consider is a mischievous attempt at piecemeal legislation, and one which this House ought not to pass to a Second Reading. I beg to move the Resolution standing in my name.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Sir Edward Birkbeck.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*(2.16.) MR. JOICEY (Durham, Chester-le-Street): I listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of this Bill. I agree with him that the question is a very complicated one, and I congratulate him too upon having so well mastered the legal difficulties in connection with it. I will not attempt to follow him through the legal part of the case, because I think that that will be much more ably dealt with by hon. Gentlemen in the House who belong to the legal profession. But I was interested in the reasons that he gave for bringing in this Bill. He said, first, that the present law is uncertain in its operation. Well, I think that the decisions in our Law Courts are often uncertain, and I cannot think that the law in connection with the rating of machinery is any more uncertain than that in connection with any other matter. Then he said, as a second reason, that the recent decisions are against the usages of Assessment Committees in various parts of the country. Now, I take issue with him on that point. No doubt, for a number of years the manufacturers in Lancashire and the districts surrounding it where there are cotton mills and other mills of that description have been fortunate enough to avoid paying rates upon their machinery, owing, in my opinion, either to the negligence or the ignorance of the assessors, or possibly to some extent the fear that the assessors have of incurring expenditure. I can quite understand the action of an overseer when he refuses to assess machinery, if he is threatened by two or three large manufacturers, who say that if he persists in assessing their machinery, that they will take the matter into every Court that they possibly can in order to fight him. Naturally, looking at the interests of the ratepayer, he thinks it is undesirable to go to any great expenditure if he can avoid it; and he may think that the advantage he would get by levying the rate would be very much less than the disadvantage that he would put the ratepayers to by insisting upon it. The hon. Gentleman went on to allude to some of the disadvantages; and one in particular I should like to call his attention to, when he stated that if this Bill were not passed overseers or Unions would awake to their duties and undoubtedly rate all those people who have been fortunate enough for some years to avoid these rates. I quite agree with him; and I think it is high time that manufacturers, whoever they may be, who have not paid the rates that they ought to have paid legally, should be compelled to contribute their proportion to the rates of their own districts. He said, too, that if this were carried through we should undoubtedly see rates put upon the agricultural people on their farms. Well, in my opinion—and I maintain and think that my opinion is the correct one—the agricultural people on their farms are actually rated now; and I maintain that they are. Every bit of machinery which contributes to increase the produce of the farm tends to increase the value of that farm for renting purposes; and if a farmer introduces machinery which largely increases the produce of his farm, you may rest assured that if the value of that farm has to be fixed by the landlord he will take that into consideration and will expect to have a larger rent. I maintain that the agricultural implements are indirectly assessed now for rates; and I should not be sorry if the same principle were adopted with regard to large mills which are now so fortunate as to avoid it. The hon. Member proceeded to say that many of the gentlemen who opposed the Bill last year and the year before should withdraw their opposition to some extent this year because of its being a much more moderate Bill. Well, that is a matter which rather increases my opposition. This Bill now intends to give a small section of manufacturers advantages which no other class in the community possess. In the part of the country which I come from we have always been assessed upon our machinery, and I confess I cannot see why we should continue to pay this assessment—this rate—and that gentlemen in Lancashire should be exempt from it. We have paid on all our machinery which is necessary for the working of our mines. All the machinery I possess is the property of the tenant or the lessee. If the mines run out, or my mines have to be let to another, of course I take away my machinery; and it is as much personal property in my opinion as any of the machines which hon. Members have in their mills. I cannot understand why any particular machine, because it happens to be fixed by a bolt to a wooden floor, should be exempt; and another machine, from simply being heavier, and having to be fixed to the hereditament by means of cement and a bolt, should not be exempt. I think this extraordinary consideration for machinery in connection with our mills is quite unnecessary. Now, I oppose this Bill on other grounds. I oppose it because I believe that it is to the disadvantage of the community. I have notices from a considerable number of boroughs in connection with the coal trade on this question. The Durham Coal Trade Association, which is a very important body, because in that county some 20 millions of tons of coals are turned out every year, oppose the measure because, they say, the object of the measure is to relieve certain classes of machinery from rating; and the effect of it, if passed, would be to seriously diminish the rateable value in manufacturing districts by the exemption of a large amount of machinery used in factories and works which have hitherto been liable, and consequently the Bill largely increases the rates in order to make up for the deficiency thus caused under the Bill. No relief will be given to the class of machinery used in mines, because it does not come under the definition of that class which is to be excluded from rates; therefore, the colliery owners will have their rates increased in order to reduce those paid by the owners of machinery which the Bill proposes to exempt. Another important body in connection with the mining industry is the Mining Association of Great Britain, representing probably nearly the whole of the collieries in the country. They oppose the Bill because they believe that if it were passed into law the effect of it would be to relieve manufacturers owning extensive moveable machinery at the expense of colliery owners and other ratepayers. In many cases collieries are situated wholly within boroughs and Local Board districts, and are assessed for all improvement purposes; and colliery owners view with great dissatisfaction the attempted protection contained in the Bill, which is, in fact, a proposal to relieve the textile manufacturers and other owners of machinery which the Bill proposes to exempt at the expense of all the other ratepayers. I maintain that no case has been made out for that special advantage. I think that this is a question which requires very great consideration, and, in my opinion, it will never be satisfactorily solved until the Government take the matter in hand. But it will affect another class very seriously, and that is the working class. In the borough of Gateshead the population is composed almost entirely of working people, who depend for their living upon the manufacturies situated in the borough; and I am told by the borough accountant, who has gone into the matter, that if this Bill should pass it will be most disastrous to the ratepayers. The rateable value of Gateshead is £262,189, and he estimates that if this Bill passes, the rateable value will be reduced by the exemption of machinery proposed by the Bill to the extent of £40,000. Now at the present time the rates in the borough of Gateshead are no less than 5s. 10d. in the pound; that on £40,000 represents an income of £11,666 13s. 4d. What this Bill proposes is to take this large sum from the manufacturers and to place it practically upon the employees; and as most of them are men who have built their own houses out of Building Societies and own their own houses, of course they will have to pay a considerable increase in the rates. This is equal to nothing less than a considerable reduction in their wages. I confess that with such facts before me I think I am in duty bound to give all the opposition I can to this measure. Lord Salisbury in his speech about three months ago, speaking on this question, said that he considered it possible that the time might come when personal property should be taxed. Well, I think if that be Lord Salisbury's opinion it is most unwise of this House to enter into this retrograde method of taxation. When you consider the immense amount of money that has been spent by Local Authorities on the present method of taxation—I believe something like £190,000,000—I think this House ought to consider well before it attempts to decrease the area of taxation.

*(2.35.) MR. ELTON (Somerset, Wellington): I rather agree with one of the lines of argument used by the last speaker, in which he pointed out that revenue is raised on what I, for one, consider rather an obsolete principle. He touched upon the importance of fixtures attached to the freehold; and I think when the Government, as they will some day, take up the question of rates, they will probably consider that the question should be regarded in a wider view. From studying the answer which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board gave to the various deputations that waited upon him, I am satisfied that the Government would not permit this Bill, if passed, to be made into an engine for transferring the large weight of the rating from one class of persons to another. And I should for one vote against this Bill unless I had sufficient confidence in the Government that that particular result would not in any case be allowed to take place. The only reason I intervene in this Debate is because I happen to be a member of a body which has certainly been held up to opprobrium, the Chard Board of Guardians.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: What I said was that the Chard Rating Authority showed more good sense than good law.

*MR. ELTON: The hon. Member takes it as rather a question of good sense than a question of good law. I observe that it has been described as notorious. There are several small factories in the neighbourhood of Chard and the Wellington Division of Somerset which it is necessary to protect, and for this purpose, and with regard to the question of rating, I think it is very important that we should ascertain and make the law clear upon the subject, and I shall support the Second Reading of the Bill.

*(2.41.) MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): Reference has been made in vague terms to the alleged serious effect which would be entailed upon the community at large if the rating authorities carried out the law as it now exists; but I cannot understand why the general rating of machinery should be disastrous to the country. I admit that this is one of the Bills in which great interest is taken; but I cannot ignore that it is one in which many hon. Members have a strong personal interest, either as manufacturers or as Representatives of constituencies where much alarm is felt at the prospect of seeing the existing law on the subject of the rating of machinery enforced. However, I am glad to think that, on the other hand, there are a number of hon. Members who represent constituencies in which machinery is rated at the present time, who have consistently opposed the passing of it in the form in which it has been introduced into the House year after year. The hon. Member who introduced the Bill said his opponents would be found characterising it as a Manufacturers' Relief Bill; but I am not at all sure that that is an accurate description of it. It seems to me that it would be better described as a Bill for the relief of those who are interested in textile industries. It may be that hon. Members who have promoted this Bill are in favour of a system under which personal property should not contribute towards the rates. That is not my view of what should obtain, nor is it the view that was originally entertained in this country, for centuries back, in the time of Edward I., it was laid down that every member of the community should, according to his ability, contribute towards the sustenance of the poor so that none of them should die of starvation. That seems to be a sound principle to go upon, and I fail to see why, if a man should invest his money in machinery instead of in house property, he should be relieved from paying according to his ability towards the relief of the poor. We have heard a great deal about the notorious Chard case, as the hon. Member who introduced the Bill styled it; but is the House aware that the Chard case was only decided by the Court of Appeal? Those who find fault with that decision should have taken the case before a higher tribunal and ascertained what the law really was upon the subject if they were and are sincere in their contention that there is great confusion on the subject of the law with reference to the rating of machinery. Those who are against this Bill have always maintained, and always will maintain, that there is a real uncertainty in the mode in which the right hon. Gen for Bury is rightly reported in the Times, he seems to be of the opinion that the difficulty has arisen out of the Chard case; but I take it that the promoters of this and previous Bills on the same subject deny this, and have consistently maintained that it arose not out of the Chard case, but out of the decisions in earlier cases.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): We did not carry the appeal in the Chard case further, because we thought we would wait until we had a better case to take to the House of Lords.

*MR. KELLY: The hon. Member, when in 1890 he brought in the Bill, said it was brought in entirely for the purpose of clearly defining the law upon the subject, and, further, that it would settle the law of England and put it on all-fours with what it is in Scotland.

MR. WINTERBOTHAM: Hear, hear!

*MR. KELLY: I am glad the hon. Member says, "Hear, hear!" for I have looked into the Act which regulates this matter in Scotland, and I say there is a considerable distinction between the present Bill and that Act of 1854. In the present Bill we are told that the machinery shall only be exempt which is so fixed that it cannot be removed from its position without necessitating the removal of a portion of the hereditament in which it stands. I think the hon. Member will be the first to admit that the words of the Scotch Act are very much wider in their meaning. The present Bill has been described as a measure which would put an end to the difficulties which now exist in regard to the rateability of machinery, but I will venture to say that, instead of doing that, it will make confusion worse confounded.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I do not think the hon. Member has fully understood the object of the Bill. Its object is to draw a line distinctly between what I would call typical classes of machinery and those which are not typical.

MR. KELLY: If we are to have the machinery defined which is to be rateable, then there will be no difficulty in putting the law in force, but if there is to be a debateable—the word used by the hon. Member—class of machinery, the law had better remain as it is.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: If the distinction was made it would cease to be debateable.

*MR. KELLY: The whole question of the incidence of taxation must be dealt with on a permanent and satisfactory basis, and what we maintain is that it should be dealt with in a comprehensive scheme brought in by the Government. The Committee who had to deal with this matter in 1887 could never have thought that it could be dealt with in any other way than by means of a Bill which would cover not only the small question of the taxation of machinery, but the whole question of the incidence of local taxation. I think it has been proved that since 1783 down to the present day the law has been the same as it now is. The Judges have never decided that machinery per se is rateable. Personal property is not rateable, and they have never sought to make it rateable. Well, Sir, as I have stated, since 1783, when the case of "Reg. v. St. Nicholas, Gloucester" (Cald. 265), was decided, there has been a continuous stream of decisions by which machinery, under a given state of facts, has been made subject to rating. In the case I have just mentioned it was held that a house valued by itself at £5 should be rated at its enhanced value by reason of its containing a steel yard, which was treated, in the arguments which were addressed to the Court, as not being annexed to the freehold. In that case—which dates from a period when the non-rateability of personalty was a matter of local custom and not of law—it is very remarkable indeed to find that these striking words were used by Lord Mansfield:—

"What is the house? It is the machine house. They are one entire thing, and are together rated. The steel yard is the most valuable part of the house, which may be said to be built for the steel yard, and not the steel yard for the house."

Now, Sir, it is idle to look to the question of the yearly value of premises without considering the purpose for which they are used, and the machinery put into them. I quote another case—that of "Reg. v. Guest, 1838" (7, A. & E. 951), which is one of the cases most strongly relied upon by the Parochial Authorities in furtherance of their contention. The question there involved was the rating of machinery and ironworks, and what Lord Denman said was this:—

“Real property ought to be rated according to its actual value, as combined with the machinery attached to it, without considering whether the machinery be real or personal property, so as to be liable to distress or seizure under a writ fiery facias, or whether it could descend to the heir or executor, or belong, on the expiration of the lease, to the landlord or tenant.”

Now, Sir, in that case it was not by any means laid down whether machinery was personalty or realty; the real question was, how far the two were so identified as that in considering the one you had to consider how far its value was enhanced by the other. I will pass to the next case, that of “Laing v. Bishopwearmouth,” in which Lord Chief Justice Cockburn divided the matter subject to rateability into three classes, thus:—

“First, things removable, such as office and station furniture; secondly, things so attached to the freehold as to become part of it; and, thirdly, things which, though capable of being removed, are so far attached as that it is intended they shall remain permanently connected with it, as certain permanent appendages to it, and essential to its working.”

Now, Sir, it was held that it was impossible to rate the first; that the second was clearly rateable; whilst the third was treated and governed by the principle which has already been laid down by the Courts. To some extent I admit that this case presents, in the matter of permanence and intention of continued user, ideas different from those which have recently been accepted as the test for distinguishing rateable from unrateable machinery. Now, Sir, I come to the case of “Reg. v. the Tyne Boiler Works Company,” where the counsel for the appellants were obliged to admit that in valuing the premises from the point of view of a tenant from year to year their capabilities for the purpose of boiler-makers’ business must be taken into account, and under this head the Court conceded, as they were almost bound to concede, the fact of the machinery and plant being there for a tenant to take if he chose. Now, Sir, I was astonished to hear some of the comments on the words used by Lord Esher in his judgment in that case. Some of the hon. Members who are responsible for this Bill have actually contended that the words of Lord Esher would clearly justify the rating of a plough or a drill, or any agricultural machine. The absurdity of such a contention is at once manifest when one considers that a plough may be in one parish to-day and in quite another parish to-morrow. But, Sir, the question the House has to consider is whether the Bill now under consideration is likely to make the law clearer; or whether, as a matter of fact, it will not have an exactly contrary effect. In the words of the first clause, there are many material alterations from the language of previous Bills. We always heard in previous Bills introduced on this subject that the object was to exempt from rating that machinery that was not affixed to the hereditament, or that was affixed only for the purpose of steadying it. Well, Sir, this is the first occasion upon which such an alteration of the incidence of taxation has been proposed as is involved in the substitution for the word “machinery” of the words “machines, tools, and appliances.” Now, Sir, in so far as this matter is concerned, or at any rate in so far as I can judge the fact, there could be no words more likely to lead to confusion than the words I have read. In every trade the words “machines, tools, and appliances” have a different meaning, and a different signification must necessarily be given to them. They include sewing machines in some trades, and in others they include the enormous and weighty engines used in an engineering establishment, or very costly and intricate pieces of machinery; and I can conceive no words which in this connection would be likely to lead to more doubt and difficulty. Then, Sir, we are told that these machines, tools, and appliances are to be exempt only when not affixed, or so fixed as to be capable of being removed from their places without necessitating the removal of any part of the building. I fail to understand how those words, entailing as they must endless litigation, can remedy the grievance of which the promoters of this Bill complain. Now, Sir, the first proviso of the 1st clause says that—

"The gross annual value of any such hereditament shall be estimated at not less than the sum at which it might reasonably be expected to let for the purpose for which it is used on a tenancy from year to year."

I fail to understand how any tenant from year to year would ever be able, with regard to ordinary business considerations, to place expensive machinery in his premises. It might be worth a man's while to do so if he had a lease of the premises, but if he held under a yearly tenancy of course he could not do it. But whether I am right or whether I am wrong in that matter, I wish the House to consider the meaning of the words in the proviso—

"Machines, tools, and appliances that might reasonably be supplied by the tenant."

Just as the meaning of the words "machines, tools, and appliances" varies in every trade, so the different articles described by them "which the tenant might be reasonably expected to supply" must also vary. If that is so, it is idle for the promoters of this Bill to contend that the measure will be an improvement on the existing conditions of things. The 2nd proviso says that—

"The term machines, tools, and appliances, for the purposes of this Act, shall not apply to any machinery, machine, or plant used in or on the hereditament for the purpose of producing or transmitting first motive power or for lighting or heating the said hereditament."

I cannot see the justice of such exceptions, which would mean that a man wishing to make provision for the health of his workpeople by having the electric light in his factory would be rated on his dynamo. I suppose the clause was introduced in order to disarm the opposition that would otherwise have come from the Corporations; but, at the same time, it is liable to confusion, and there can be no doubt that if it is carried it will operate most unfairly in the case of small people. For example, a nurseryman will be rated on his heating pipes, whilst a manufacturer whose valuable machinery is removable will go scot free. But that the confusion is greater far than this may be made abundantly clear by taking only two or three typical cases. There are two well-known processes for the manufacture of steel—the Siemens and the Bessemer. The Bessemer process is so carried on, the converters not being attached or fixed, that it will be exempt; whereas in the Siemens' process the whole plant will be rated. That arises from the different character of the machinery used, and not from any difference in value. Let me take another case—that of a man who establishes blast furnaces for the purpose of making pig iron. He would be rated, whilst his neighbour, an engineer, who had expended the same amount of money in engineering plant (lathes, planing machines, slotting machines, punching and shearing machines, boring mills, &c.) would be exempt. These are samples of what will necessarily arise if this Bill passes, so that I am justified in saying that the claim of those who introduce this Bill, that it will extinguish the prevailing confusion, is a claim that cannot be sustained. It is perfectly clear that if you take the rates off these buildings you must, as the same amount will have to be raised, put them on other classes of property. It is said that in the interests of the working classes there should be some re-adjustment of this matter of the rating of machinery. Now, Sir, I have some figures which may be relied on to throw some light on the question as to how far the working classes now suffer from the rating of machinery. The first case is that of Messrs. J. L. Thompson and Sons—estimated turnover, £450,000, rateable value of works, £1,300, rateable value of machinery, £300, amount paid thereon, £75; proportion of rates to turnover, .001. The next case is the Hendon Paper Works—turnover, £144,000, rateable value of works, £2,573, of machinery, £1,200; amount paid in respect of machinery, at 5s. in the £1, £300; proportion of rate to estimated turnover, .20. The last case I will mention is that of J. Priestman and Co.—turnover, £127,794, rateable value of works, £408, of machinery, £90, rates paid on machinery, £22; proportion of rates to turnover, .017. These figures show that there is no foundation for the contention that either the working man or the manufacturers will gain a great relief if this Bill passes. In the Chard case, the amount on which machinery was rated was reduced from £1,000 to £500. Supposing it was still rated on £1,000, that at 5s. in the £1 would only be £200, and what difference would that make to the undertaking? With a turnover of £100,000 a year, there are very few businesses in which a matter of £200 a year in rates would mean the difference between a paying and a losing concern. The working classes have been led to take a view of this matter that would have been impossible if the full facts had been before them. Attempts have, however, in vain been made in districts where machinery is rated to get them to take that view. It was attempted in the North of England and utterly failed, and I am also aware that it was sought in London to get a very important Body, representing hundreds of thousands of working men, to petition in favour of the Bill. They declined, as I was told by Mr. Shipton, the Secretary of the Parliamentary Committee of the Trades Congress. We who oppose this Bill oppose it mainly on the ground that unless a far stronger case can be made out it would be wrong to shift the burden of taxation from the wealthy machinery owners to the community at large, and thus to some extent to the working classes. Though ridicule has been thrown upon the statement it is unquestionably the fact that in towns like Sunderland the operation of the Bill would make a difference of 2d. or 3d. in the £1. It is, I believe, admitted that the taxation of land for local purposes is calculated on 98 per cent. of its annual value; upon ordinary houses at 80 to 84 per cent. of their annual value; whilst in the case of manufacturers they are only assessed upon at from 66 to 75 per cent. of the annual value of their premises. If manufacturers are coming to this House complaining of the burden which is cast upon them in the matter of the rating of machinery, it ought to be able to be stated that they are as fully rated as owners of house property; that their factories are rated as other buildings are rated; then they might possibly claim the exemption of this machinery from rating, but they would not claim it, because they would be enormous losers. They have no right to possess the advantage which they have now of paying upon only 70 per cent. of the value of their premises, and at the same time to complain of the infinitesimal amount which is levied upon their machinery in those parts of the country where machinery is rated. I have never been able to understand why machinery should not be rated all over the country, except that I am aware that in many districts the influence of the manufacturers is so great that it cannot be withstood, and that in some they have expressed, in no vague terms, their determination to fight the question, so that to impose a rate and seek to enforce it would be ruinous to the ratepayers. At any rate, we are not to blame because the proper taxation has not been enforced, and we can conceive that nothing would be more easy than for the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board to see that instructions were given to rating authorities which would lead to one uniform and proper practice by such rating of machinery as would compel manufacturers, like everybody else, to contribute according to their ability to the maintenance of the poor, and to pay their proportion of all the rates in their Unions.

* (3.35.) MR. MATHER (Lancashire, S.E. Gorton): One of the false issues which have been raised in the course of this Debate is that which has been placed before the House by the hon. Member who has just sat down—namely, that this Bill is an attempt to shift the burden of taxation from one set of taxpayers to another; that great capitalists would be relieved from the taxation which they are at present paying, and that some of the poorer classes would have to bear the burden. I am surprised that the hon. Member for Camberwell (Mr. Kelly) has not listened attentively to the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. G. W. Balfour), because in that very able speech on the Second Reading of this Bill I thought he made it quite clear to the House that the promoters of this Bill had no desire whatever to alter the prevailing customs of this country. The hon. Member for Camberwell has reminded us that the law of this land has been the same for about a hundred years. To say we all of us. This law has been interpreted up to recent times by the common sense of the country, by the Local Authorities of the country, by the Assessment Committees of the country, by surveyors and valuers in the same sense only — namely, that the manufactory consists of land, bricks and mortar, plus that kind of machinery which constitutes and actually gives the character to the land and buildings of a manufactory—namely, boilers, engines, driving gear, &c., and this alone shall be rated. That state of things has never been disturbed by any Assessment Committee in the great industrial centres of England, until Sunderland adopted another system of rating. And, with all due reference to Sunderland, Lancashire and Yorkshire, and some portions of the Midland Counties, are as much interested in the industries of this country as Sunderland. There is no case in point, up to the time when the Judges gave their recent decision, in which any Assessment Committee ever doubted as to their interpretation of the law of the land in regard to enhancing the value of buildings by taking machinery into account. They have invariably throughout the country taken the motive-power machinery into account, excepting in the agricultural regions of the South, where the Assessment Committees have not had sense or wisdom in the matter. If they have not reckoned these things as giving value to the buildings, I am very sorry that the localities have been so badly served. I think there is abundant testimony to prove that the universal custom has been to rate the building according to the appliances which constitute it a manufactory. But that is a very different thing from estimating not only that which constitutes a manufactory in the form of machinery and building, but that the tools and appliances used in the manufactory are to be taken into account. That is an entirely new matter.

MR. KELLY: There is no decision of the law which allows the rating of tools and appliances. The word in this Bill is "machinery."

*MR. MATHER: The Chard case proves beyond doubt that in the opinion of certain Judges, that tools used in the buildings and instruments driven by gearing do not of themselves constitute anything of that quality of the building by which it is designated a manufactory, and yet they have interpreted the law to admit of such tools being rated contrary to custom. The term manufactory receives its full and complete development from the fact that it is a building especially designed to hold machinery and is supplied with a certain class of driving power to enable it to be devoted to any of the purposes of a manufactory. In that very Chard case you might have taken the machines out of the building and put in another class of machinery on the floor. Those buildings we have on our minds, and which we desire to exclude from increased rating by reckoning the value of the machines they contain, are manufactories which might be devoted to any purpose whatsoever which could be called a manufacturing purpose. I have personal experience of this matter in Manchester, where I have large works which have been used for all sorts of purposes, one part as a woollen mill and another for bleaching works, and others for separate purposes, but by degrees I have included all those buildings in an engineering establishment, and they are just as good as if I had erected fresh buildings in the green fields. The custom universally adopted up to recent times by Assessment Committees and assessors has been to interpret the law according to common sense. It has given satisfaction to the manufacturers throughout the country, and would have continued to all time, probably, to be the custom of the country had it not been for the extraordinary genius of a surveyor in the North of England who thought he might ride to fame by upsetting the interpretation of the law when he got the Judges to differ, thereby putting the whole manufacturing interests of this country into a state of disturbance. I do not propose to support this Bill on considerations as an owner, but I claim that the working man may be injured if you do not pass this measure. The hon. Member for Camberwell has spoken of exceptions. I do not know whether Sunderland is an exception to the rule, because it is lower in public spirit than we are, to be assessed in this way.

MR. KELLY: Part of Manchester?

MR. MATHER: The Chorlton Union, part of the City of Manchester, has attempted to put this interpretation of the law into force in one particular small portion of Manchester and that happens to be in my own division. They have tried to do it, and, if justice is on their side and the law has been wrongly interpreted in the past, let them do it. They attempted to adopt this new interpretation of the law with reference to one of the largest concerns in the country, Messrs. Whitworth & Co., and I shall be willing to stand by any final decision on the point without regard to the way in which it might affect my pocket or the industry in which I am engaged. But there is a very serious question involved in this, and I would remind hon. Members that the industries of this country, large as some of them are, yet great establishments have almost invariably been built up from small beginnings. The smallest industries of this country are the pride and glory of our land. We do not take sufficient notice perhaps of the fact that, though we have colossal concerns like the Armstrongs and Whitworths, and other enormous manufacturing industries in Lancashire connected with the cotton trade—we do not take into consideration the fact that the perpetual flow of energy, enterprise, skill and intelligence, is ever from below upwards. The maintenance of small industries, the encouragement of the working man who has saved a little money to push forward his ideas and inventions, is a thing we should keep steadily in view. In that way seed may be sown from which will spring a large and flourishing concern should look with favour. Is it not important that this field for enterprise should be left unrestricted and unembarrassed by any kind of taxation—is it not important that we should prevent such small industries from being in any way afflicted by higher taxes or rates than hitherto they have had to pay? At the present time not one small industry could receive any impediment from a movement of this kind. How would this new ruling operate? I know many men—I know off-shoots from my own concern—that have become very flourishing in their way. The men who start these concerns, after having probably held responsible positions as foremen, save a little money and start small works of their own. Probably they have some new idea or invention to perfect. The first thing is to find a piece of land or a building which can be rented at almost next to nothing, and they put the whole of their savings into the machinery necessary to enable them to make this particular article by which they hope to start a fresh industry. But if they have to encounter, under the new custom established by the recent decision of law, not only the expense of their buildings, but also the great difficulty that for every machine they put down they will be taxed, is that not an obvious impediment in their way in entering upon those small industries which are so essential to the well-being of the country? As small holdings are important to the agricultural interest, in order to cultivate the energy, fertility of resource, and scientific knowledge of small farmers in the enormous field of agriculture, so are small industries in the great industrial, producing, and manufacturing world necessary to keep building up the important and large concerns which make this country so famous over the length and breadth of the globe. Technical instruction is now spreading, and adding immensely to the fertility of the resources of the country on the part of our matter how slight, to put a tax upon energy, enterprise, fertility of resource, and inventive power must in the long run materially affect those industries which we most desire to promote. The circulation of the life blood of industry is of the greatest importance to us, and Parliament ought to remove every impediment from the path of the working classes in these matters rather than promote this impending evil which the hon. Member for Leeds has described and pointed out as likely to come into the region of industry. It is the duty of the Legislature to seek to remove impediments from their path so that there should be no difficulty whatever in their enterprise and intelligence increasing, or any impediment in the way of the working classes of England entering more and more into the development of our resources and producing products which will go over the globe and enable us to compete with foreign nations, and maintain the sway we have hitherto held among the nations of the world. It is on this account that I support this Bill. I may remind my hon. Friend the Member for Sunderland, who with his usual sledge hammer eloquence will endeavour to smash my arguments up, that there are eleven cases on record of towns or districts already placed in difficulties which the recent decision of the Judges has brought about. In some 60 other cases they are doing precisely now as we have done for all time. It is to confirm a well-known and established rule of the past, and to make it well-defined in the future so that no quibble can come in on the part of those who are in utter ignorance of the trade of the country, and who give us all sorts of varying decisions on certain important points, that we have endeavoured to promote this Bill. I trust the House of Commons will express unmistakably this view of the matter on the grounds on which I have put it. It will give great satisfaction to the working classes of this country, especially the small trading class, if they do so, and it will not damage a single agricultural district. A purely agricultural district cannot possibly suffer. Mixed communities, partly agricultural and partly industrial, may have some objections to this Bill, but, according to the return to which I have referred, there is nothing on record to justify the statement which has been made by several hon. Members to day, that we are seeking to remove a burden from one set of men altogether and put it on another set. On the contrary, we are trying to avert the burden which threatens to weigh eventually on the smaller producers of the country.

*(3.45.) MR. STOREY (Sunderland): The interesting speech to which we have just listened appeals rather to our sympathies and hearts than to our heads. When the hon. Member appeals to us to do what we can to foster the great industries of the country, such an appeal touches us just as much as it touches him. But the consideration we have to act upon here is legislating for the country at large—what is just and what is fair for the great body of the country. The hon. Member's argument, if it amounts to anything, amounts to an argument for relieving all machinery from taxation.

MR. MATHER: May I explain what I said was the very reverse. I said there had been a general custom of including machinery in the rating, and, it was only a pending evil which we were seeking to avert.

*MR. STOREY: That was not the point of my observation at all. I say the hon. Member's argument if it amounted to anything at all amounted to this, that in order to foster small industries we ought to relieve all machinery from taxation. I can understand that that is an argument that might be very consistently urged in this House. I for one, if this had been a proposal to relieve all machinery from taxation, should have been able myself to give some sort of general assent to it. But this is a proposal to relieve a certain class of machinery from taxation and certain industries but not others. For instance, take the great coal mining industry, an industry which involves the employment of hundreds of thousands of men, and the engagement of millions upon millions of capital. Will my hon. Friend tell me whether this Bill, as it is drawn, will relieve to the extent of one farthing of liability for rating coal mining machines? No; because the bulk of the machinery in coal mines is fixed machinery, and being fixed machinery this Bill will not relieve it of rates.

MR. MATHER: My hon. Friend obliges me to interrupt him again. I will only say that in this Bill fixed machinery in the sense of being motive power, such as pulleys, shafting, &c., shall be rateable.

*MR. STOREY: I quite understand that, but I am pointing out that this relief from taxation which he appeals to us to grant in respect to trades only, affects certain other trades and industries, and he now admits that, so far as the Bill goes, it would make no appreciable difference in the method of rating mines and mining machines. Now, who would it relieve? The hon. Member could scarcely realise the fact that there are ship-building yards in Sunderland which turn out hundreds of thousands of pounds' worth of shipping in the year, and the effect of this Bill will simply be to relieve them to the extent of some £75 to £150 a year. My hon. Friend opposite urged that such a relief as that was an inappreciable relief, and was not worth taking into account. As to any poor man starting in the ship-building line—and poor men have done so—my hon. Friend (Mr. Mather) does not think there is any great necessity for making a change in the law; at any rate, he does not propose it. To whom will this Bill give relief? There is a certain class of manufacture which involves the use of a large amount of non-fixed machines or partially-fixed machines, and these are woollen manufactories, cotton manufactories, machinists, or makers of machines, whether for land or sea. And when I look into this Bill I find it is practically a relief for these three classes of manufactories, and therefore I am not surprised to find Gentlemen like the hon. Members for was more frank. He said, "I admit that the law has not changed; but what I want is to act because there has been a development of the law." He said the law was so because the Judges defined it to be so; it was a development of the law. It is the law; for the law is always the law as the Judges define it, whether in England or Ireland. It has been defined by one Court after another, and always in the same direction. The hon. Gentleman spoke as if Lord Esher, in the Tyne-boiler case, altered the law. I see the Attorney General agrees, as he nods his head.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I agree that he did not alter the law.

*MR. STOREY: Then I need not say another word about it. The law, as defined by Lord Esher, was the same as that laid down in case after case 40 or 50 years ago. Besides being a Bill for the relief of the three classes I have mentioned, it is a Bill for the relief of defaulting Local Authorities. The Mover of the Second Reading said he wanted the law to be clear and equal, and then said if it had been carried out the law would have been equal as it is.

MR. GERALD BALFOUR: I said it would be equal in Scotland and Ireland, but not in England!

*MR. STOREY: We have nothing to do with Scotland now. The reason the law is not equal in England is from no defect in the law, but is owing to the inaction or wrong action of the Local Authorities. Reference after reference has been made to Sunderland, as if Sunderland had found out some new and improved method. What Sunderland has done with the definition of the law, when founded on justice—which course has always distinguished the town—has been to apply the law to all classes of property, and to rate everybody according to the law, and because we have done that the law is little industries, have disobeyed the law that it is unequal with them. If I were a ratepayer in one of those counties I would quickly undertake that they should carry out the law, for any one ratepayer in a county can upset a rate which is not founded on the law, and the law compels the rating of machinery. It compels the authority, in estimating the annual value of a factory, to take into account what that building with the machinery, fixed or unfixed, would let for as a manufactory. Is the law as it exists fair or unfair, just or unjust? I will take a concrete case as an example; I will take the case of our own factory in Sunderland—for I am concerned in some great manufactures, and would get any benefit if the law were changed, so that I argue from the public point of view—at the present moment this factory is rated as a building containing machinery for the purposes of manufacture, and the Assessment Committee take what would be the fair letting value of this building, standing on this ground, with this machinery all ready for the purpose of carrying on manufacture, and we pay on the annual value of that. If this Bill were passed, we, as manufacturers, would be assessed at a considerably less amount, because large portions of the machinery would be exempt from rating. What would be the effect on the town generally? From 30 to 40 manufacturers would be rated at so much less per annum, but that money would have to be found, and the tax collector would go to the small shopkeeper and the small householder for twopence or threepence more in the pound in order that the manufacturers might be relieved. I call that inequitable and unjust, and especially unjust when I consider that we have put the ratepayers to expense. There is not a large factory in the North which has not caused additional expense to the ratepayers. In our own case, instead of the ordinary macadamised road, the Corporation had to put down one of the best paved roads, so that our heavy waggons could pass over it in the most economical manner. If we have been an extra charge on the rates, is it not right that we should pay a reasonable share of the rates? Why should we who have works not pay on their annual value? I think it is extremely difficult to reconcile the proviso with the clause, and one proviso with the other. The first proviso is—

“Provided that the gross annual value of any such hereditament containing machinery shall be estimated at not less than the sum at which it might reasonably be expected to let for the purposes for which it is used on a tenancy from year to year void of the machines, tools, and appliances which it might reasonably be expected would be supplied by the tenant.”

Now, Sir, I would suggest that this house was the house we were dealing with, and that next to it there is a similar house filled with machinery, all provided by the landlord, and let to me for £1,000 a year. My hon. Friend gets this house for £100 a year and puts his own machinery in. How would you rate us? At £100 each. Then a building full of valuable machinery is to be rated to the relief of the poor at the rate of £100 a year. That is what you say if the machinery is movable. If you put in an engine and boiler they are to be rated, but if you put in a steam hammer it is not to be rated. Then it comes to this: that hon. Gentlemen who want to relieve and help poor industries say if you go into a business which uses engines and boilers and fixed machinery you shall be rated, but if you go into one that only requires a small engine and a lot of looms you shall not be rated. My hon. Friend says it is a defined class, but it is a definition which will itself have to be defined, first, by the Assessment Committee, and then by Courts of Law. I say that is inequitable and insufficient, as it only deals with one class. There is another point which I should like to press on the House, and that is that my hon. Friend has unwittingly misled the House when he stated that there are only eleven districts where our method of assessment is followed. What he really means is, that there were only eleven districts from which he got replies. But Sunderland by no means stands alone. Newcastle is a larger town than Sunderland, and Newcastle carries out the law. The whole of Tyneside, an enormous manufacturing district, carries out the law; the whole of the County of Northumberland, and the whole of the greater County of Durham, carry out the law. When my hon. Friend says it was the energy and activity of a clever valuer at Sunderland which drew the attention of the Authorities to the fact he is quite right, and though he seems to sneer at Mr. Hedley because he moved in the matter, we think we are under an obligation to that gentleman for having pointed to the Assessment Committees what the law actually was. The members of Trade Societies have been seduced, without full knowledge, into supporting the Bill, because they are assessed at more than they ought to be, and are actually paying more rates than they should pay; whilst a certain class of manufacturers in the same localities are being relieved and are escaping from their legitimate share of the burden. But we in Northumberland and Durham have put an end to that state of things. We have vindicated the law and carried out what is just between poor and rich. Therefore, we come boldly to the House and say, as the Attorney General said, this is the law, and it is the duty of the Assessment Committees to carry it out; and it ought to be the law because it is founded on justice and fair play, whereas the system which is adopted in other parts of the country is illegal, and is used for the purpose of relieving certain rich classes from taxation and imposing an undue share of the burden on those who are less capable of bearing it. There is another point which I will submit to the House. Many of these municipalities have borrowed money on the security of their rates, and we learn that the total amount borrowed is about £190,000,000. We in Sunderland have borrowed £450,000 on the security of the rates, but if my hon. Friend achieves the change in the law which he is seeking you will be saving the interests of that large class of persons who have lent money on the security of the rates should be properly safeguarded. In conclusion, we hold that the present law is a good law, a just law, and an equitable law. We think the change which is proposed will only benefit a certain class of manufacturers and not the manufacturing industry as a whole, and therefore on the ground that the law is good, and that the change which is proposed is insufficient if a change is desirable at all, we shall resist this Bill both now and at every other time.

*(4.21.) SIR W. HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has insisted very much on the law in this matter, but I think he has omitted to notice that in the Bill which is now before the House that law is embodied, and that the proviso which embodies that law goes further than the Acts from which it was taken, and provides that not only shall the hereditament be assessed at the sum at which it might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, but that it shall be assessed at the sum at which it might reasonably be expected to let for the purpose for which it is used. The hon. Gentleman knows very well that these words are not to be found in the old Acts, but they have been inserted in order to prevent the danger of hereditaments which contained machinery, and are being used as manufactories, being simply assessed as empty warehouses, or, in the case of shipbuilding yards, as vacant spaces. The words in the Bill which I have just quoted cover this case. The hon. Member for Camberwell referred to the Report of a Select Committee which recommended that a comprehensive scheme of assessment should be introduced by the Government. I can say, on behalf of the supporters of the Bill, we have no objection whatever to such a comprehensive scheme of rating being a dwelling-house as well as the machinery in a hereditament I should offer no objection. But this does not seem to me a fair argument to use against our humble attempt to avert the very serious evils which will arise from the introduction of an entirely new system of assessment under the shelter of present Acts of Parliament. The hon. Member for Sunderland (Mr. Storey) said that if this Bill passed there would be a very great change made in the incidence of rating in that town. That may be so, because we know that Sunderland is in a peculiar position. But I do not know that everyone in Sunderland is very well satisfied with the present system, for I see the boiler makers and iron shipbuilders of Newcastle, where the same system is observed, are opposed to it, and so is another important trade society in the same district. But although it may be perfectly true that if this Bill passes there will be a great change in the incidence of taxation in Northumberland and Durham, the hon. Member forgets that if it does not pass a very great change will take place in the incidence of taxation all over the country. I think, therefore, that we are entitled to make use of the hon. Gentleman's argument and to say if it is desirable that the incidence of taxation should not be altered in Sunderland and the neighbourhood, how very much more desirable it is that the incidence should not be altered over a very much wider area and a very much larger population. This afternoon I have noticed that there ran through many speeches the fallacy that machinery is being rated. That is not the case. In the first place, machinery in a manufactory is not by law rated, and, in the second place, except in special districts in the country, machinery is not at present actually rated.

MR. STOREY: That may be true; but, while it is not rated, it is taken into account as enhancing the valuation of the premises.

*SIR W. HOULDSWORTH: That is so; but it is by judge-made law, and, while I do not wish to say anything against judge-made law, I think we have a right to say that that law should be perfectly clear and without any mistake whatever, so that the Assessment Committee on the one hand and the manufacturers on the other may know exactly what the law is, so that the system throughout the country may be uniform, and that no injustice may be done between one district and another and between one class and another. I take an extract from the Judgment of Lord Esher which has been inserted in a circular, in which it is described as perfectly clear, and fair, and reasonable. Lord Esher, in his Judgment, stated that—

"Machines, whether fixed to the floor or not, if necessary to the use of the premises as such were to be taken into account in estimating the rateable value."

Well, that does seem a tolerably clear definition; but I find in the same Judgment, only a line or two above, he actually says—

"In the case of sewing machines they are not necessary to the use of the premises, and therefore they ought to be excluded."

I cannot see why it is to be said that sewing machines, in a factory which is used for sewing machines, are not necessary for the use of the premises as such—as a sewing machine manufactory—any more than other machines in other industries; and, therefore, I say that if we are to have Judge-made law, let us have a clear, definite law, so that we shall know exactly what is meant, and that will treat properly of the rating of all machinery, whether large or small, whether fixed or not. And I venture to say that a system should not be introduced, even under the ægis of Judge-made law, unless it is carried a great deal further, and that the furniture and fittings of the house, and, more than that, the appliances and stock-in-trade of warehouses, should be taken into account in the estimate; so that all—manufacturers, farmers, and citizens—may be placed on the same footing. I should like to refer for one moment to the case of Birmingham. The case of Birmingham has not come up to-day so strongly as it has done on former occasions. But I do not know whether the Representatives of Birmingham have realised what I think really is the case: that this Bill, if passed into law, would not in the slightest degree, as it appears to me, touch them or affect them. They have a peculiar system in Birmingham—I will not say it is peculiar, because a similar system exists in other parts of the country. But the way in which their rates are assessed is not by valuation, but by 40 or 50 shillings per indicated horsepower; that is taken to represent the value of the manufactories. I believe in Bolton, and I believe in other parts of Lancashire—certainly in Bolton—a very similar principle is used: they take a certain rate per square yard of flooring, and work out the result from that. But I have calculated very carefully as far as I could the Birmingham and Bolton system, and I find that the result come to is really entirely in harmony with the principles of this Bill. I would point out that if this Bill passes no change need be made in the system under which the Assessment Committees arrive at their results. Reference has been made by the hon. Member for Camberwell to the words of the proviso, but if any complaint is to be made with regard to them in Committee, it must be remembered that in this Bill we have kept as close as we possibly could to the Act as it at present exists. We believe that we are defining more clearly what the present Statute Law is, and in that way preventing the evils which from time to time arise owing to the various decisions which are given under this Act of Parliament. We have been asked why we do not go to the House of Lords with an appeal. If we did that, under present circumstances, we should have to take every case to the House of Lords. Assessment Committees have complained that no broad principle has been laid down for their guidance, and it is in order to give them that guidance that this Bill has been introduced. I believe that if it is passed it will promote the interests not only of manufacturers but of the country at large.

*(4.40.) MR. WINTERBOTHAM (Gloucester, Cirencester): The hon. Member for Sunderland referred to the names which are on the back of this Bill, and he almost intimated that we were looking after our own personal interest and advantage in promoting this legislation.

MR. STOREY: No, no!

*MR. WINTERBOTHAM: The hon. Member deprecates having had any such intention. I am very glad to hear it. I understand there is not a single Member whose name is on the back of the Bill whose works and machinery have not always been rated in accordance with the custom of the last century, and who does not wish to make it quite clear by passing this Bill that this almost universal custom has been right. Neither of them, I am sure, seek to derive any personal advantage out of it. I am one of those who say that the true interests of capital and labour require that they should be good friends, and that labour is in favour of this Bill is sufficiently shown by the fact that half a million of men, through their trade societies and organisations, have petitioned in support of it. I repeat what I said on a former occasion, that this is no attempt to alter the existing custom. The object of the Bill is only to define the law so as to prevent litigation, and to put an end to the ravages of two or three valuers who have made a rare picking out of the uncertain interpretation of the law. That is a state of things that ought not to be allowed to continue. I admit that Sunderland and Tyneside are an exception to the general rule; but, after all, the figures with respect to Sunderland come to this: that the total difference caused by Sunderland reverting to the old rule and custom would be only 1s. 11d. a year on a £6 house. And the House will mark that is the worst case that can be taken. The opponents of this Bill have got into their heads a strange misconception—that this is a measure for the relief of machinery from rating. Now, by 3 & 4 Vict., cap. 89, machinery per se is not rateable. Only 16 per cent. of the rating authorities in this country have adopted what has been called by a previous speaker the new Judge-made law, while Scotland and Ireland have not adopted it at all. The policy of the opponents of the Bill is a sort of ostrich policy. Attempts have been made to tax different articles. In Gloucester an attempt has, I am assured, recently been made to tax such things as the machinery of a dairy, of a laundry, of a sausage maker, and even portable engines! That is getting very near indeed to the agricultural interest, in whose favour some hon. Members who have opposed the Bill profess to have spoken. Now, I ask, where is this to stop? What about furniture in hotels? It is there on the premises for the purpose of carrying on the business for which the premises are specially constructed or adapted, and it cannot be carried on without it. It would even be necessary to tax the books in lawyers' libraries, with the aid of which they make use of the hereditament for their special profession. When some Government, able and strong enough, shall have tackled the whole question of rating, it must follow that there will be no longer any excuse for inequalities in the Death Duty or for Grants in Aid of local taxation from the National Exchequer. Meanwhile the owners of machinery ask the House for justice. They say—"Do not single out this personal property alone for exceptional treatment, because, after all, it is a class of property which employs labour, and you cannot tax it without handicapping injuriously the industry of the nation." I will repeat what I said some years ago—"Tax the products of industry as much as you like, but do not tax the bees who make the honey; rather tax the honey when it is made." We want the law in this respect to be made precisely like the law of Scotland and Ireland, and we ask the House by a large majority to decide this principle of equal laws throughout the United Kingdom by passing this Bill. We have tried to meet our opponents in this matter, and small thanks we have had for it. It is by endeavouring to settle the question by a fair and reasonable compromise that we seem to have failed to please both friend and foe.

*(4.53.) SIR H. JAMES (Bury, Lancashire): I wish to say a few words on behalf of a class of supporters of this Bill who by no means desire to see machinery entirely exempt from rating.

Many votes will be given for the Second Reading of this measure by those who do not wish for one moment to cast any additional burdens upon those persons who are not now rated for machinery. In the course of this Debate it has been apparently mentioned, as a matter of reproach, that those whose names are at the back of this Bill represent constituencies in which machinery is employed to a great extent, and that, therefore, they are interested in obtaining exemption of machinery from rating. I would point out that such Representatives are most interested in seeing this question properly settled, and for this reason: those who are interested in agricultural constituencies within which there is no machinery must recognise that it is of comparatively little importance to them whether machinery is rated or not. Those, however, who represent manufacturing constituencies are interested in seeing that machinery bears its proper quota of the rates, and its proper quota only. If you exempt machinery from rating you will directly benefit a few, but by seeing that it is only properly rated you will benefit a great number, because machinery might be overrated to such an extent that the factories might have to be closed, and the workmen employed in them would thus be deprived of their wages. If we unduly relieve machinery from rating the amount of the assessment must still be lessened, and somebody must pay for the relief afforded to the owners of machinery. It seems strange that hon. Members on this side of the House should treat this Bill as if it were a Bill to exempt machinery from rating. There is no such intention. All really fixed property will still be rated. Such fixed machinery as exists in collieries, to which the hon. Member for Sunderland referred, will, when placed in factories, still be rated. On the other hand, it is agreed that perfectly movable machinery shall be exempt. But in textile factories it is unfortunately difficult sometimes to determine what machinery is "movable" and what is "immovable." Although I quite admit that there has been no technical alteration of the law, yet there have undoubtedly been alterations in the practice, and unfortunately disturbing ones, which make it very difficult for Assessment Committees to know what course to pursue in the matter of rating different classes of machinery. When we cast upon voluntary bodies like Assessment Committees the duty of administering the law, we ought to show them what the law really is and to make it clear and definite; and, further, we ought to see that manufacturers in different localities are treated equally. I would therefore appeal to the Government to see whether they cannot do something definite in the direction I have indicated. I would undertake to say that if I could enjoy the luxury of cross-examining, say, the Attorney General, I would make him admit that he could not tell how to apply the Chard decision in its entirety, nor could he define the exact meaning of the Court of Appeal. The burthen of the rates will differ according to the opinions—according to the state of things—existing in different localities. Are we to say that it is an impossible duty to define the subject-matter of rating? If this Bill be read a second time the language of the clause can be altered if the House thinks fit to do so. At any rate, the House ought to come to some conclusion, and ought really to attempt to arrive at some solution of this difficulty. If the Government cannot, consistently with what they regard as their responsibility, define the exact subject-matter of taxation, so that there will be no difficulty hereafter, then let the House attempt to solve the difficulty. If we succeed we shall have done a great deal; if we fail we shall have done something. The question is not one affecting conflicting interests, and it is one upon which we shall enter with a desire to see that there is no exemption of any particular class, and that the fair burden of taxation shall fall fairly, equally, and justly upon all.

(5.2.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's):* I rise to say that the Government do not propose as a Government to oppose the Second Reading of this Bill. The Government see no reason to depart from the neutral attitude which they have hitherto adopted on the Second Reading of measures of this kind. But, Sir, for my own part, I desire briefly to state to the House the reasons in respect of which I shall certainly cordially support the Second Reading of this Bill. My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, who introduced this Bill to the House, and introduced it—as all who heard him will acknowledge—in a most lucid and comprehensive speech, left no doubt in the mind of any impartial person as to what his intentions are. He said in express terms for his own part—and I take it that he spoke on behalf of those other hon. Members whose names are on the back of the Bill—that he and they did not desire by this Bill to alter the Statute Law, but merely to endeavour clearly to define it, and to recite what has always been understood to be the Statute Law on the subject. Now, Sir, are there any grounds for supposing that the application of the law causes uncertainty, and creates confusion? I think the evidence is so overwhelming in affirmation of this point that it is hardly necessary for me to elaborate it. It was uniformly admitted by the Representatives of the very strong Committee to which this matter was referred in 1887, and who, in express terms, said that great difficulties did arise in consequence of the uncertainty of the law, and the different and varying mode in which it was administered. Sir, I yesterday received a very large deputation, comprising many members of Assessment Committees, who came to represent to me the great difficulty under which they laboured in consequence of the uncertainty of the present state of the law. The representations of these gentlemen, coming as they did as the representatives of Assessment Committees—many of them coming from very important districts—were entitled to great consideration and weight. Deputations from Assessment Committees of Bolton, Charlton, Manchester, Dewsbury, Wigan, West Derby, Nottingham, Rochdale, Halifax, Stockport, and other communities, joined in the representation. I think, Sir, that that thing itself shows very strongly the desirability of Parliament attempting to put an end to this uncertainty. My hon. Friend the Member for Camberwell (Mr. Kelly), who strongly opposed this Bill, felt himself obliged to admit the great uncertainty that now exists. But, Sir, how did he propose that that uncertainty should be removed? He made this very novel proposition: that the Local Government Board should send a circular round to the various Assessment Committees throughout the country defining the law as it stands. Well, Sir, if that is to be a duty which is to be cast upon the Local Government Board, I devoutly hope I shall not occupy the position of President when it is to be done. But, Sir, it having been on all hands admitted that this uncertainty exists, is there any objection to the Second Reading of a Bill which is intended and calculated to remove it? Objections are made by the agricultural interests, and I need hardly say that we have all very great sympathy with the straits to which they have been put in recent years, and that we should be very unwilling to cast any further burden upon that industry which we all hope at some time or other will be again revived, and once more be reckoned as one of the successful industries in this country. But, Sir, I rather take exception to the allusions that were made as to the way in which the manufacturers, with their astounding fortunes, were represented as attempting to shift the burden and the responsibility of meeting taxation from their own shoulders to the shoulders of someone else. I feel very certain that in many parts of the country in the textile industries the depression is quite as great as it is in the agricultural industries; and to talk about the enormous prosperity and the astounding fortunes of the manufacturing industries, and the desire of the manufacturers to shift their burdens from their own shoulders to the shoulders of someone else, is, I think, to say the least of it, somewhat misleading. I do not want to make too much of that; but I only want to enter my protest against what I heard to-day, and in the Conference Room yesterday, about the capabilities of the manufacturing districts to bear the taxation that it is desired to put upon them. Now, Sir, I think the agricultural interests have considerably exaggerated this matter. In the first place, it is not a question—even if everything desired by this Bill was carried out—it is not a question of shifting the burden in the rating of machinery, because we are told, and for my part I have no reason to doubt the accuracy of the information, that between 80 and 90 per cent. of the Unions in this country do not rate machinery. Well, now Sir, if an unjust extension of the principle of rating of machinery is laid upon the manufacturing industries, I think that that in itself would not prove very favourable to the manufacturing interests. I can conceive nothing in which the agricultural industry is more interested than in our manufacturing industries being developed so that anything which would tend, in however small a degree, to extinguish any branch of industry in this country would undoubtedly in the long run hit the agricultural interest. It has been alleged that this Bill would operate unfairly to the working classes. Well, Sir, I received yesterday a deputation on which large numbers of the working classes were present, and who came to represent to me very strongly that if the practice complained of were in any degree extended it would be disastrous to them. There, again, I say that anything disastrous to the manufacturing interests of the country would be injurious to the working classes. It has been said that legislation on this question ought to be deferred until the whole question of valuation and rating is taken up by the Government. I should, for my own part, be glad if the Government could take up the whole question; but I cannot promise that they will do anything of the kind during the present Session, whatever may be done next Session. I see no reason why, grievances having been admitted, an attempt should not be made by the present Parliament to put the matter on a better footing. It is perfectly true that the Select Committee recommended that the matter should be dealt with as a whole. An Amendment was moved the year before last by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Great Grimsby (Mr. Heneage) to the Second Reading of a Bill on similar lines to this, asserting that this matter ought to be dealt with only in a comprehensive Bill, and that Resolution was rejected by this House by 239 to 87. That being so, I hardly think that we are justified in asking the House again, when they expressed their opinion so strongly before, to assent to any proposition that this matter should be deferred until the whole question of local taxation is taken up. I have stated what, in my opinion, is the purpose of this Bill. It is a question whether the Bill goes further, or whether it does not go further, than its promoters assert. I say nothing on that point, because it is capable of being dealt with in Committee. I only say that I shall vote for the Second Reading of this Bill, because it is intended clearly to define what is the existing law; and on that ground I shall have no hesitation in voting for it, and it will be the duty of the Government to see, when the Bill reaches Committee, that it does not go beyond the lines that have been laid down.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I intend to support the Second Reading of this Bill. The present state of the law is uncertain; more than that, it is artificial. It is incomprehensible, both to the layman and to the lawyer, and it is unequal and uncertain in its operation as among different members of the community. Well, Sir, whenever there is uncertainty, it leads to litigation, and litigation, as the House knows, has to be paid for by the classes of the community who resort to it. I have said that the law is artificial, and I will show why it is so. You must not rate machinery but you may take into account any enhancing value it may have on what you do rate. In some districts the whole value of the machinery is taken into account enhancing that which you do rate. I am aware that in every case that is not done, but that in other cases an arbitrary standard is taken, as in the Birmingham case. Under these conditions I think there can be no doubt that the law ought to be defined; at any rate it ought to be made clear whether machinery should be rated or not. The law ought to be made certain and equal in its application to different parts of the country, and to all members of the community. But whether this Bill does that in exactly the right way or not I will not undertake to say beyond saying that in my opinion it is capable of very considerable improvement, and I have no doubt the promoters of this Bill will carefully consider any Amendments which may be proposed. The effect of this Bill would be to relieve owners of machinery from the burden of having their machinery taken into account in enhancing the rateable value of the buildings. I think that goes too far, because, that would, no doubt, operate as a relief to owners of machinery, and, so far, cast an additional burden upon the public. I think the Bill will require amendment, but I will vote for the Second Reading of it. I desired to say these few words, because in voting for the Second Reading of the Bill I by no means commit myself to the exact provisions which I find in the Bill without Amendment.

*(5.20.) MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I shall oppose this Bill for certain specific reasons which I desire to point out. It has been already pointed out that a certain rateable value must be raised by the various Unions, and, therefore, I presume if that is not raised from the richer ratepayers it stands to reason and common sense, that it must be raised from somebody else, and the great does consider, that property of whatever kind is a fair and proper subject for rating. And therefore, as I see an opportunity by opposing this Bill of throwing the rates upon what I consider to be a proper subject for rating, I cannot Vote for the Second Reading. But I have another reason for so acting. It has been represented to us as a reason for assenting to the Second Reading that if we do not do so we are going in some mysterious way to throw great pains and penalties upon the working classes. Such a statement would be almost ridiculous if in any other Assembly than the House of Commons it was put forward for one moment. I would ask hon. Members if they are serious in saying if machinery were exempted entirely from rating, one single fraction of a farthing would go into the pockets of the working classes. Ever since hon. Members, coming from the same portion of the country as those who are now furthering the passage of this Bill, opposed the ten hours Bill, the endeavour of the manufacturing interests has been to prevent the participation of the working classes in any of the benefits which have been built up by national industry. If hon. Members can exempt motive power in their manufactories—steam hammers for example—if by exemption from rating of appliances of that sort they propose to increase, by way of bonus, the wages of their operatives, all I can say is they are going to take a new departure from the course in which they have acted since the beginning of the century. I want to know why the life-saving apparatus of coal pits, like pumping engines and the winding apparatus are to be treated in a totally different spirit to that in which hon. Members propose to treat steam hammers and other such appliances. If we are to exempt machinery and other appliances which are designed for the production of wealth from rating, my contention is that that machinery now used in coal pits, and which would be exempted if driven by horse-power or hand labour, should also be exempted. I hope the House will not assent to the Second Reading of this Bill. I believe in making this artificial distinction betwixt different sections of machinery this House would be inflicting a wrong on the community as a whole. And, therefore, as a member of the community I object to any injury being done to us by the action of the House of Commons, which is a good individualistic sentiment that I have no doubt the Member for Gloucestershire will applaud. I would ask hon. Members on this side of the House what would have been their attitude towards a Bill framed by the Irish landlords to escape rating? We should have had them rising up as guardians of the interests of the poor, and protesting against this injustice being done to their poor constituents. I want to know what difference there is between a landlord attempting to escape his due share of rating, and a Liberal manufacturer or even a Conservative manufacturer endeavouring to do the same thing? Ten days ago we appealed to the hon. Member for Gloucestershire, and asked him to vote for the Payment of Members Bill, and in that way do justice to the working classes. I can understand his purity of motive, but somehow there must have been some confusion in the hon. Member's mind over his desire to benefit the working classes, when his action then was so singularly different from that which he invites the House of Commons to take to-day.

Question put.

The House divided:—Ayes 232 ;
Noes 122.—(Div. List, No. 70.)

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for To-morrow.

SEA FISHERIES REGULATION (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 233.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read;

MR. MARJORIBANKS (Berwickshire): May I ask the Lord Advocate to inform us as to the course the Government purpose to take in regard to this Bill, which has been introduced to give effect to the Resolution moved by myself and accepted by the Government, together with the addition suggested by the First Lord of the Treasury?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): I believe it is possible a measure may be introduced by the Government for dealing with this matter. But in reference to this Bill it is out of the question that it should pass a Second Reading without a full discussion.

Second Reading deferred till Monday next.

SHERIFF CLERKS DEPUTE (SCOTLAND) BILL.—(No. 197.)

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Mr. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): May I ask the Lord Advocate has he had his attention called to this Bill, and does he consent to the Second Reading?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: No, Sir.

Second Reading deferred till Tomorrow.

GAMING ACT (1845) AMENDMENT BILL.—[Lords].—(No. 247.)

Considered in Committee, and reported, without Amendment; read the third time, and passed, without Amendment.

EQUIVALENT GRANT (SCOTLAND) DISTRIBUTION.

Return ordered—

"Showing for each County in Scotland, and each Royal or Police Burgh in such County, how much each would receive of the sum of £100,000 if distributed according to valuation, 1890-91, and population, 1891, respectively.—(Mr. Hunter.)

NATIONAL DEBT.

Return ordered—

"Showing at the close of each financial year, from 1835-6 to 1891-2, both inclusive, the aggregate Gross Liabilities of the State as represented by the Nominal Funded Debt, Estimated Capital Value of Terminable Annuities, Unfunded Debt, and other Liabilities in respect of Debt, the estimated Assets, and the aggregate Net Liabilities, also the Exchequer Balances; and, showing at the close of each financial year, from 1835-6 to 1891-2, both inclusive, the Gross and Net Expenditure charged on the Consolidated Fund on account of the National Debt, and other payments in respect of Debt (in continuation of Parliamentary Paper, No. 390, of Session 1891).—(Sir William Harcourt.)

Mr. Marjoribanks

BUILDING SOCIETIES.

Return ordered—

"Of Building Societies incorporated under the Building Societies Acts which have terminated, or been dissolved, or have otherwise ceased to exist, under the following heads:—Register number.—Name of Society.—Year of establishment.—Year of termination.—Manner of termination.—Number of members where known.—Remarks.—(Mr. Gerald Balfour.)

PUBLIC PETITIONS COMMITTEE.

Sixth Report brought up, and read; to lie upon the Table, and to be printed.

MOTIONS.

EDUCATION (SCOTLAND) LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Donald Crawford, Bill to amend the Education (Scotland) Acts, 1872 to 1883, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Donald Crawford, Mr. Buchanan, Mr. Edmund Robertson, and Mr. Munro Ferguson.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 261.]

TECHNICAL INSTRUCTION (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bryce, Bill to explain and amend "The Local Taxation (Customs and Excise) Act, 1890," with respect to contributions for Technical Instruction in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bryce, Mr. James Campbell, Mr. Marjoribanks, Mr. Parker Smith, Mr. Leng, Mr. Esslemont, and Mr. Donald Crawford.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 262.]

RIGHTS OF WAY PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Bryce, Bill to amend the Law relating to Procedure in Right of Way Causes in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Bryce, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Munro Ferguson, Mr. Haldane, Mr. Donald Crawford, and Mr. Asquith.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 263.]

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

Thursday, 7th April, 1892.

PRIVATE AND PROVISIONAL ORDER
CONFIRMATION BILLS.

Ordered, That Standing Orders Nos. 92 and 93 be suspended; and that the time for depositing petitions praying to be heard against Private and Provisional Order Confirmation Bills, which would otherwise expire during the adjournment of the House at Easter, be extended to the first day on which the House shall sit after the recess.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT (SCOTLAND)
ORDER (GLASGOW, &c.) BILL [H.L.].

Read 2^a (according to order).

PILOTAGE PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL.
LOCAL GOVERNMENT (IRELAND)
PROVISIONAL ORDER (No. 1) BILL.

Read 2^a (according to order), and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday the 2nd of May next.

BILLS OF SALE BILL [H.L].
PUBLIC AUTHORITIES PROTECTION
BILL [H.L.]

House in Committee (according to order); Bills reported without amendment; and re-committed to the Standing Committee.

STATUTE LAW REVISION.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (Lord HALSBURY): My Lords, I have to move that my noble and learned Friend (Lord Thring) be added to the Joint Committee on this subject. I should explain that I should have originally inserted the noble and learned Lord's name on my list, but, inasmuch as he had taken a most active and useful part in the Committee, and as criticisms had been made upon that Committee's work, it was thought better that those who had been actively engaged upon it should not form part of the present Committee. The other House, however, have not taken that view, but have appointed some Members who have taken part in it, and therefore I see no reason why your Lordships should adhere to that opinion. I hope the noble and learned Lord will have no objection to the Motion.

Moved, "That the Lord Thring be added to the Joint Committee."—(The Lord Chancellor.)

Motion agreed to.

ELECTRIC AND CABLE RAILWAYS (METROPOLIS).

Report from Committee of Selection proposing that the Five Lords following be named of the Select Committee to join with the Select Committee of the House of Commons, namely—

E. Lauderdale,
E. Strafford,
L. Shute (V. Barrington),
L. Thring,
L. Kelvin:

Considered (according to order), and agreed to, and a Message ordered to be sent to the House of Commons, in answer to their Message of Monday the 21st of March last, to inform them of the appointment of the said Select Committee by this House.

House adjourned at twenty minutes before Five o'clock, to Monday the 2nd of

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Thursday, 7th April, 1892.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

LONDON WATER (No. 1) BILL (by Order).

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

*SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): The question of the Metropolitan water supply is of great, of pressing, and increasing importance. It is not necessary in moving the Second Reading of this Bill, nor have I any desire, to impugn the quality or quantity of the companies' supply; but the population of the Metropolitan area and the surrounding country increases very rapidly, and, of course, that implies a corresponding increase in the demand for water, while it increases the difficulty of maintaining the purity of the supply. I do not wish to trouble the House with statistics, and will merely point out that the population, which in 1870 was 3,350,000, in 1891 had become 5,700,000, and is still increasing. The demand for water within the Metropolitan area supplied by the companies is now, on an average, 184,000,000 gallons a day. The average daily quantity taken from the Thames is 97,000,000 gallons, rising upon occasions to 105,000,000. The amount considered by the Royal Commission as the maximum which ought to be taken from the Thames was 110,000,000, and the maximum amount which legally can be taken is 130,000,000. We are then approaching very nearly the limit of our tether, and this in the face of a rapidly-increasing population. The matter is the more pressing because, even if this House granted a new supply, that must be taken from a source at such a distance from London that it would certainly be ten years before the supply would reach London. Under the law as it at present exists, London is prevented from taking any steps to protect itself, and to insure this future supply, while other cities are appropriating the remaining sources of supply. As regards taking more water from the Thames and its tributaries, that would be a proposal, I am sure, vigorously resisted by the Home Counties, the alternative, sometimes recommended, is to have recourse to deep wells. I may quote the Report of the Royal Commission of 1869, where they say with justice—

“Any water obtained by tapping the chalk reservoirs would only pro tanto diminish those streams and would, therefore, be little or nothing gained to the general supply.”

Now, the majority of my colleagues on the London County Council do not always agree with the Corporation of London, but upon this subject I am happy to say the County Council and the Corporation are working harmoniously together. We did at first differ on the subject of water, but when we came to compare our views and to take counsel together we found we arrived at the same conclusion; and I desire to recognise the courtesy we have received from the representatives of the City on this subject. I have the honour to introduce the Bill on behalf of both the County Council and the Corporation, and the combination will, I hope, insure a favourable consideration from the House. We propose to constitute a Joint Water Committee to deal with the whole question. The Corporation will have power to nominate any competent persons to represent them. As the Bill stands the County Council will be limited to our own members, but there is great force, I think, in the recommendations of last year's Committee that the same freedom of selection should be afforded the County Council. That, however, is a matter for Committee. Now objection, I understand, has been taken to the Bill by the Water Companies—I hope it may not be so, but I am anticipating what may be said, though I do not know that it will be—that the Bill authorises the County Council to introduce into Parliament Bills for promoting schemes for independent works in competition with the undertakings of existing companies. But I desire to point out that in this respect all that London asks is to be placed in the same position as other Municipalities. The introduction of this clause does not indicate a desire to take any unfair advantage of the companies in this respect. But Parliament has never laid down a hard and fast rule that under no circumstances should such a course be refused. We can imagine circumstances in which it might be necessary. All the Bill does is to place London in the same position as other Municipalities, and it will not authorise us to carry out any such scheme, but only, if we think it necessary, to prepare such a scheme and place it before this House. That is a power possessed by every Municipality, and in introducing a Bill dealing with the subject I do not see why London should not have similar power. It is also said the Bill is not now as necessary as it was, and that it ought not to be pressed forward on account of the fact that Her Majesty's Government have appointed a Royal Commission to inquire into the subject, but I submit to the House that that fact shows all the more strongly the desirability of passing some such Bill as this I have now the honour of moving. It shows at least that in the opinion of Government there is a prima facie case. If the Royal Commission should report in favour of a new or supplementary water supply, then before we could do anything to give effect to such a recommendation at least a year, and perhaps more, would be required to pass a preliminary Bill such as this now proposed. We only ask Parliament to place us in a position to act promptly should the Royal Commission declare the necessity for doing so. In consequence of the appointment of the Royal Commission the Bill will have to be materially modified. As it stands Clause 5 gives certain powers of inquiry to the County Council which in view of the inquiry by Royal Commission are not now required. The clause was adopted before the Government had determined upon the Commission. We have no desire to harass the companies or to act unfairly towards them. We propose, therefore, to omit the clause in Committee. Then it has been thought that Clause 3 goes too much into detail, and we propose, at the suggestion of Government, to modify the clause, striking out the detail and inserting general powers. I do not know that in moving the Second Reading I need go into further detail. We had a very interesting discussion not long ago on the subject of a water supply for Birmingham, and I think it was shown that there is a general opinion that quite enough water is taken from the Thames, and in view of the rapid increase of population the subject of our water supply is one of great importance. Under the circumstances, and seeing that the Bill is not very complex in character—that it only asks that the London County Council shall be invested with the powers enjoyed by other Municipalities—I hope the House will now give the Bill a Second Reading.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir John Lubbock.)

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I went through the Bill in conference with the representatives of the Corporation and the London County Council, and I think they have fairly met the objections I felt to some of the clauses in view of the fact that the Government had appointed a Royal Commission to deal with the London water supply. As my right hon. Friend knows, the Government were originally of opinion that it would have been better to have followed the suggestion made by the Committee on the Water Bills of last Session, that the County Council itself should conduct an inquiry into the question of the London water supply; but the London County Council represented to us, as did the Corporation, that they would be considerably hampered in the want of power to conduct a proper inquiry, and they pressed on the Government an inquiry by Royal Commission. We acceded to the request of the London County Council and the Corporation, and I think my right hon. Friend and the House will admit that, both in regard to the instructions given to the Royal Commission and the personnel, we have done our utmost to meet the necessities of the case, and to secure a proper, full and impartial investigation into this enormously important question. Having done that, I represented to the gentlemen who waited upon me that it was impossible to assent to the clause enabling the County Council and the Corporation to conduct an inquiry into the question, and to examine into the books and works of the Water Companies. I think it would be very unfair to them that while an inquiry such as this was being undertaken by a Royal Commission, a similar inquiry should be conducted by the County Council and the Corporation. The justice of that view was acknowledged, and, therefore, as my right hon. Friend says, Clause 5 will disappear from the Bill. I also objected to Clause 3, because I thought not only did it give power to the County Council to introduce a Bill connected with the water supply, but it was framed on rather too combative a principle, putting in the forefront of the clause some of the most debateable questions possible to conceive. I was also informed by the Chairman of Committees that he would regard such a clause as contrary to the views expressed by the Committee which sat last year. But I also said at the same time that I did feel, looking at the position at which we had arrived on the water question, that I did not think the Government could fairly ask the House of Commons to reject a clause giving the County Council some power to introduce a Bill. I intimated that while not approving of Clause 3 I should be satisfied with a clause giving general powers to the County Council to introduce a Bill. As a matter of fact, what it amounts to is this: simply that if they introduce a Bill they shall be enabled to pay the cost of such introduction from the rates. This is the same power any other Municipality has in introducing a Bill, but unless a clause of this kind were inserted they would have to run the risk of having to pay the cost of the Bill. I felt that a body like the London County Council having gone carefully into the matter, and a Committee of the House of Commons having indicated that the County Council ought to proceed further, the Government could not fairly ask the House to refuse power to the County Council to introduce such a Bill if they should think it necessary. I think it is extremely probable that the County Council may think it undesirable to introduce such a Bill until the Royal Commission have reported. I do not imagine they have any idea of doing so until then, but they say it is possible they may require or wish to act promptly after the Royal Commission have presented their Report, and for this reason they ask for this power in the Bill. My right hon. Friend has omitted to mention two points upon which the Bill will need amendment. Sub-section "A" of Clause 4 should be omitted. Power is taken by that for the London County Council to make and enforce regulations now made and enforced by the Local Government Board in respect to every water supply throughout the whole country. Whatever form powers in connection with those regulations may take at some future time, I think they should not be transferred until matters are further developed. There are also the words "public or" which should be omitted from Sub-section "B." I see no reason why the London County Council should not have power to make a private inquiry while the Commission make a public inquiry. When these Amendments are made the Bill will assume this shape: it will set up a Joint Committee of the London County Council and the Corporation, and this Joint Committee will have power to make private investigation and to endeavour to come to arrangements with any Water Company who may choose to have negotiations with them, and it will give the County Council power, when it is thought right, generally to deal with water business.

(2.25.) COLONEL MAKINS (Essex, S.E.): The Water Companies are now perfectly satisfied with the action of the Government and the right hon. Gentleman. The Bill as first introduced was in an objectionable shape, but now, by agreement between my right hon. Friend and representatives of the Corporation and the London County Council, it has been brought into a shape to which there is very little objection indeed. I think, if the companies had been addressed in the moderate tone and fair manner in which my right hon. Friend has introduced this measure, there would have been no necessity whatever for saying anything in opposition to the Bill. The Bill itself, no doubt, carries out practically, or to a very great extent, the recommendations of the Select Committee which reported in July last year. In one important respect, however, it does not do this. The Select Committee made it a very strong point that the County Council should not take steps to introduce competing measures with the Water Companies, and that the House should not give countenance to such measures. That is the only point upon which I should like some further assurance. No doubt the Water Companies are unpopular, but be it remembered they are the creatures of Parliament, they were created by Parliament, that they are bound hand and foot by Acts of Parliament, and are controlled by the Board of Trade and the Local Government Board, and if they have committed faults heavy penalties have been imposed, and they may charitably be supposed to have purged any offence they may have committed. If competing Bills are to be brought in, a large amount of ratepayers' money, as well as shareholders' money, may be wasted in useless attempts at legislation. It is quite true that other large towns have powers to promote Bills, but I am not aware that in all these 50 or 60 cases there has been shown that very strong feeling of antagonism towards Water Companies which has been displayed by some of the members of the London County Council, and there has been no case in which the rights of a Water Company have been compulsorily acquired without arbitration. If everyone had spoken in the tone my right hon. Friend has adopted, the companies would have less objection to the Bill. But there are other members of the Council, such as Sir Thomas Farrer, who, in speeches, in evidence before the Committee, and in letters to the newspapers, have never ceased to exhibit towards the Water Companies an animus finandi of the most violent character. It would not be difficult to give quotations to justify my statement, and but a few days ago Sir Thomas Farrer gloated over the ruin which he thought had been brought upon the Water Companies by the efforts of himself and others, and in proof of his success Sir Thomas Farrer referred to the fall in the value of Water Stock. But what does this mean—this fall in the value of the Water Companies' Stock? It means that a great deal of unnecessary loss and pain falls upon widows and orphans who hold the Stock, and though little sympathy is expressed I think that as much is deserved by them as by the working classes of whom so much is said. Sir Thomas Farrer has expressed delight at the fall in the price of Stock, but that reduction has nothing to do with the value of the property, it has only to do with those who are compelled to sell. The property is held on the faith of Acts of Parliament, and so long as those Acts are maintained the property will keep its value. I hope we shall have the assurance confirmed that there is no intention to introduce competing Bills into Parliament. As I have said, the Water Companies were created by Parliament, and are content to rest their case in the hands of Parliament. If there is no intention to work injustice to the companies by these competing measures I have no more to say, but if there is no such intention, let the fact appear on the face of the Bill, by an Amendment that should be made perfectly clear. I have given notice of an Instruction which would bring the Bill into absolute accord with the Report of the Select Committee, but after the very fair and moderate way in which the Second Reading has been moved, and after the speech just made by the President of the Local Government Board, I think we may rest satisfied that no injustice will be done. I am quite sure that this is the desire of the great majority of the House, though unfortunately that is not an unanimous desire. Having made a protest against confiscating legislation, I shall best consult the interests of those I represent, and of the House generally, by giving notice that I shall not move the Instruction standing in my name.

(3.34.) MR. J. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): As I suppose from the withdrawal of the Instruction that the Bill will be allowed to go through without opposition, I think I should not allow this opportunity to pass without a reply to the remarks of the hon. Member who has just sat down, with respect to my friend Sir Thomas Farrer. The attitude of Sir Thomas Farrer on this question has been extremely misrepresented by the hon. Gentleman, who has spoken as if Sir Thomas Farrer and other members of the London County Council have not due regard for the interests of widows and orphans. We admit there may be widows and orphans who may be owners of shares in Water Companies; but, Sir, there are widows and orphans who are ratepayers of London, and whose interests equally demand consideration. The hon. Member seems to think that the first action of the London County Council should be to buy up the Water Companies' property at the price the Stock stands in the market now.

COLONEL MAKINS: No, by arbitration.

MR. J. STUART: I should like to point out that the early anticipation of an arrangement to purchase is an easy ready means of keeping up the price of the shares; but on the other hand the fall in price shows that it is undesirable to hurry in the matter. As to the London County Council introducing competing Bills for a water supply, I may observe that the power to introduce such Bills is in no sense co-extensive with the probability of such Bills being passed. There is no intention of granting to the London County Council any privileges or rights other than those possessed by every other Municipality in the country. All we seek is the right to introduce certain Bills which, being introduced, the House will decide upon them on principles of fairness and justice to all parties.

*(3.37.) SIR J. LUBBOCK: I merely wish to add a few words. As to the 5th clause, we should not have introduced it at all if at the time we had been aware that the Government were about to appoint a Royal Commission. That Commission being appointed we felt the clause was unnecessary, and though, technically, we could not withdraw it, we are prepared to do so in Committee. As regards Clause 3, I may say it was not introduced in any combative spirit, but from a desire to show our intention fully, and we are quite ready to accede to the suggestion of the President of the Local Government Board.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis).—That they have appointed a Committee, consisting of Five Lords, to join with the Committee of the Commons (pursuant to Message of this House) on Electric and Cable Railways (Metropolis).

Statute Law Revision.—That they have added a Lord to the Joint Committee appointed by both Houses to consider the subject of Statute Law Revision, and request this House to add one of its Members to the said Joint Committee.

QUESTIONS.

BARKISLAND ENDOWED SCHOOL.

MR. STANSFELD (Halifax): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether the Barkisland Endowed School Scheme, approved by the Charity Commissioners on the 8th August, 1890, and submitted to the Committee of the Privy Council, has been considered by him, and with what result?

THE VICE PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (Sir W. HART DYKE, Kent, Dartford): This scheme is strongly opposed in the locality, and the Department is now in communication with the Charity Commissioners with a view to meeting a demand for more direct local representation on the Governing Body, and in order, among other things, to modify certain provisions of the scheme which the Education Act of last year has rendered obsolete.

ARMY SCIENCE EXAMINATIONS.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that science is not a compulsory subject at the entrance examination for Woolwich, and that, although science is taught at the Royal Military Academy, no fixed minimum attainment in the subject is insisted on there; whether he is aware that, in consequence of these facts, it is possible for a cadet to gain admission to the Scientific Corps of the Royal Engineers without possessing a fair elementary knowledge of any branch of experimental science; whether he is aware that, owing to the above fact, and to the generally disadvantageous position of those cadets who have entered the Royal Military Academy with a knowledge of science as compared with those who have taken German at the entrance competition, it has of late become increasingly difficult to maintain science studies in the Army classes of public schools, and that, in consequence, there is likely soon to be a falling off in the proportion of candidates who offer science in these competitions; and whether he will undertake to investigate and to remedy this evil?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. E. STANHOPE, Lincolnshire, Horncastle): Science is not, and never has been, a compulsory subject in the entrance examination for the Royal Military Academy; but as an optional subject it is on the same level as regards marks as higher mathematics, modern languages, and classics. Science is one of ten subjects taught at the Academy, but it would be unreasonable to insist on every candidate qualifying in every subject. It is scarcely possible for a candidate to gain admission to the Engineers without a fair elementary knowledge of chemistry and physics, and so far no cadet has done so. I am not aware of the fact that it has of late become increasingly difficult to maintain science studies in the Army classes of public schools, or that in consequence there is likely soon to be a falling off in the proportion of candidates who offer science in these competitions; but I have received a paper on the subject from the hon. Member, which is being carefully looked into at the War Office.

SCHOOL ATTENDANCE—THE ABOLITION OF FEES.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will grant as an unopposed Return, and issue before the Education Department Estimates are considered, a statement showing the number of day scholars who were in average attendance in all the elementary schools in England and Wales during the first six months after the abolition of school fees, that is, ending 31st March, 1892, as compared with the number in attendance in the corresponding period ending 31st March, 1891?

SIR W. HART DYKE: The statistics collected by the Department are made up for the year ending 31st August, and I have no means of ascertaining the average attendance for any other period, but from the information supplied by the Inspectors who were consulted as to the effect of the Act during the first two months of its operation, it appeared that a considerable increase had taken place. The financial estimate submitted to Parliament is based upon the assumption that the average attendance will increase 2.2 per cent., as against 1 per cent. for the twelve months preceding the abolition of fees, but this estimate does not represent the full effect of the Act, because the average attendance for the period it covers is only partially affected thereby.

FREE MEDICAL ATTENDANCE FOR OFFICERS IN INDIA.

MR. KING (Hull, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether he is aware that "off-reckoning" Colonels in the Indian Army while in India have since 1887 been deprived of the privilege of free medical attendance in India, although, at the same time, the Indian Government was contending, for other purposes, that such officers were not retired, but were still serving; whether, by Her Majesty's Regulations both for Home and Colonial Service, all officers on full pay are not entitled to medical attendance; and why the privilege is refused to Indian officers?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (MR. CURZON, Lancashire, Southport): The Regulation is not a recent one. Since 1871 it has applied to unemployed General Officers—whether drawing Colonels' allowances or not—and in 1887 it was extended to all other full pay officers on the supernumerary unemployed list, who were residing in India for their own convenience. The Secretary of State understands that under the Rules for the British Service officers on full pay, subject to certain conditions, receive gratuitous medical attendance. The Rules for the British Service do not apply to the Indian Army. Neither the Government of India nor the Secretary of State consider it necessary or desirable that officers who are not wanted in India for military duty, but who choose it as their place of residence merely for their own convenience, should have the privilege of free medical attendance.

THE PAYMENT OF INCOME TAX.

MR. KING: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will state how many individuals paid Income Tax in Great Britain in the financial year 1890-91; how many of these individuals paid upon incomes amounting to exactly £400 and under that sum; the total Income Tax receipts for 1890-91; and the total amount contributed by individuals with incomes of £400 and under?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): I am afraid that I have no means of giving the information as desired. Under Schedules A and B of the Income Tax the only record is of the number of properties assessed and not of the individuals. Again, under Schedule C, the tax on which is chiefly assessed on bank dividends, there is no record of individuals; and under Schedule D each company assessed only counts as one assessment, although it may represent thousands of shareholders. There is a record, however, under "trades and professions," forming a section only of Schedule D, and also under Schedule E. The number of persons (thus limited) with incomes under £400 a year who were charged to Income Tax in 1889-90 was 554,527. The figures for 1890-91 are not yet available. The duty charged or assessed on such persons was £1,183,343, but this would be subject to some rebate for repayments in respect of life assurance and over-assessments. In 1890-91 the Income Tax yield was as follows:—Total net receipts, £13,143,932; total Exchequer produce, £13,250,000.

POST OFFICES AND BANK HOLIDAYS.

SIR J. LUBBOCK (London University): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether any regulation has been issued requiring shops which are also postal sub-offices to remain open on Bank Holidays; and, if so, whether, considering the long hours of labour of shop assistants, he would reconsider the subject?

*THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): No such regulation has been issued. The general practice is to close the small offices which are not telegraph offices at noon on Bank Holidays, and in London and most of the large towns they are for the most part altogether closed. The tendency is rather to relax the existing conditions than to make them more stringent.

Mr. King

MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether his attention has been called to the fact, as stated in the Newspaper Press, that a valuable discovery of auriferous lead has been made in the workings of the Millwr Mining Company, Limited, near Holywell, Flintshire, and that, in driving levels at a considerable depth from the surface, some rich gold has been struck; whether, under the Acts of William and Mary, this gold will belong entirely to the mine owner, unless the Crown purchases the ore at £25 per ton; whether, under those Acts, if gold is found in a lead mine, a tin mine, copper mine, or iron mine, the mine owner is entitled to the gold, the Crown only having the pre-emption to purchase the ore at certain fixed prices; whether persons mining for gold alone, and not in combination with base metals, are protected in any way; whether the Woods and Forests Office are entitled to fix any royalty; and, whether legislation will be introduced by the Government with the view of protecting the State where gold is obtained from lead in the same manner as where gold is obtained by itself without being associated with the base metals?

MR. GOSCHEN: My answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question is, No. With regard to the second, third, and fourth paragraphs, I would refer him to the Judgments delivered in the case of "The Attorney General v. Morgan." My answer to the fifth paragraph is, Yes. As regards the sixth, I can say nothing till the Royal Commission has reported.

BOROUGH AND COUNTY MAGISTRATES.

MR. STOREY (Sunderland): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he will grant a Return showing the Magistrates on 31st March, 1892, in the respective boroughs (having separate Commissions of the Peace) and counties, or divisions of counties, in England and Wales; and setting forth the name, description, trade and profession, and date of appointment of each Magistrate?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): The information asked for by the hon. Member is to be found in Parliamentary Papers No. 13 of 1886 and 356 of the Session of 1888. It appears to be too early to call for fresh editions of these voluminous Returns.

GALLERY OF BRITISH ART.

MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether any further progress has been made in the negotiations with Mr. Henry Tate for the establishment of a Gallery of British Art; and whether, if Mr. Tate has finally declined to accept any site at South Kensington, the Government will consider the adaptability for this purpose of the alternative sites that have been suggested, at the back of the National Gallery, at Whitehall, and at Millbank?

MR. LAWSON (St. Pancras, W.): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman at the same time to say if he has had any communication from the London County Council on the subject?

MR. GOSCHEN: Replying to the last question first, I have not had any communication from the London County Council, but I have had an indirect feeler which I think proceeded from that quarter. No negotiations are in progress with Mr. Tate for the establishment of a Gallery of British Art. Mr. Tate has withdrawn his offer. With regard to the second part of my hon. Friend's question, the site at the back of the National Gallery has, I will not say been bespoken, but, at all events, been earnestly claimed by the Trustees of the National Gallery for the expansion of that institution, and I should not be prepared to make any statement as to the site at Whitehall or at Millbank.

SENTENCE ON A JUVENILE OFFENDER, EDINBURGH.

MR. S. SMITH (Flintshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether there is any truth in the statement in the newspapers that a child of the age of five years has been sentenced by Magistrates in Edinburgh to ten days' imprisonment (for stealing from its father), to be followed by a committal to a reformatory; and whether steps will be taken to discharge the said child from any further punishment?

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Sir C. J. PEARSON, Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities): There is no truth in the statement referred to by the hon. Member. The child in question is in his 14th year, and had been previously convicted of theft. This consequently was his second offence, and his father specially desired that he should be sent to a reformatory, as he had lost all control over him.

ZULULAND BOUNDARY COMMISSION.

MR. WEBB (Waterford, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will lay upon the Table of the House the Report of the proceedings of the recent Boundary Commission in the Ndzwandwe district of Zululand?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): The Report and other correspondence bearing on the subject will be laid before Parliament.

SPEY SALMON FISHERIES.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY (Elgin and Nairn): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate under what title and for what consideration the Duke of Richmond and Gordon holds about eight miles of salmon fishings at the mouth of the Spey; whether he is aware that these fishings seriously injure the value of the fishings on the river generally; and whether any steps can be taken to remedy the evil?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I am unable to give any answer to the first part of the question, and I have no information relating to the second part. As to the last part, I have only to suggest that anyone who suffers from the alleged evil should take legal advice as to a remedy.

SENTENCE FOR NIGHT POACHING, NAIRN.

MR. SEYMOUR KEAY: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to a case tried at the Sheriff Court in Nairn on the 29th ultimo, when the son of a crofter pleaded guilty to night poaching, the facts being that the accused, being the only support of an aged father, and having failed to get work during the recent severe frost, had been forced by want to take a few rabbits, hundreds of which were running near his door, and that he was sentenced to imprisonment for one month, and to find caution for £20, or to suffer imprisonment for another month; and whether, in view of the fact that the law as it stands leaves the Judge no power to inflict a fine or reduce the amount of caution money, Her Majesty's Government feel disposed to take steps with the object of amending the law in the direction indicated?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The statement of facts in this question is wholly inaccurate, except that the accused pleaded guilty, and received sentence as stated. The following are the facts according to my information: The case was a bad one, without any redeeming circumstance. The accused is 40 years of age. He had on a previous occasion been charged with night poaching, and forfeited his bail. The offence now in question was committed three miles from his home. So far from being the support of his father, the accused has been a source of continual anxiety to him. There was no lack of work. His father is a hard-working, industrious man, and was actually at work on the day in question; and the accused might have shared in the work if he had been so inclined. The law as it stands gives the Judge complete power over the sentence, and he may either fine or imprison as he thinks proper.

VACCINE LYMPH.

MR. SUMMERS (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that the humanised lymph distributed from the National Vaccine Establishment, which is derived from various public vaccinators throughout the country, has been found, on examination, to vary greatly in quality, and, in some cases, from 60 to 70 per cent. of the tubes have, upon microscopic examination by Mr. Farn, the official examiner of vaccine lymph, been rejected as unfit for use; and whether, in view of these facts, he will advise that no lymph shall be used for public vaccination unless it has been first submitted to official microscopical examination?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): As I very recently informed the hon. Member, in reply to a question by him, the only humanised lymph distributed by the National Vaccine Establishment which is not microscopically examined is that supplied on points, and this lymph is exclusively furnished to the Department by their own officers, who themselves have carefully taken the lymph. I see no reason to advise a change in the existing arrangements as to the lymph for public vaccinations.

THE SHAMROCK IN THE ARMY.

MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that the Commander of the Forces in Ireland and the members of his Staff usually wear the shamrock in their regimentals on St. Patrick's Day; whether the Commander-in-Chief of the Forces in Ireland obtains the consent of his superior officer, the Duke of Cambridge, previously to wearing the shamrock in his uniform; and did Lord Wolseley on last St. Patrick's Day obtain any such express consent to the wearing of the shamrock; if not, will he explain the reason of this exception to the rule requiring the previous consent of the commanding officer to be given to the wearing of the shamrock?

MR. E. STANHOPE: The wearing of the shamrock on St. Patrick's Day by the Commander-in-Chief in Ireland and his Staff is a question for that officer's discretion. Lord Wolseley did not, as a matter of fact, attend any military parade on 17th March; nor did he wear the shamrock on that day.

MR. MAC NEILL: More shame for him then.

PIERS AND HARBOURS (SCOTLAND).

COLONEL MALCOLM (Argyllshire): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate when the decision on the schemes for piers and harbours, laid before the Secretary for Scotland by the County Councils under the West Highlands and Islands (Scotland) Works Bill of last Session, will be given; and what steps are being taken with regard to them?

*SIR C. J. PEARSON: I have to inform my hon. and gallant Friend that the Secretary for Scotland hopes soon to be in a position to decide on the applications which have already been received, and is at present making inquiry into these applications under the power given to him by the Statute referred to.

STIRLING AND OBAN MAIL SERVICE.

COLONEL MALCOLM: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether he has determined to maintain the accelerated mail service between Stirling and Oban all the year round; whether he has received tenders for the proposed improved postal service in the West Highlands and Islands; and, if so, how many tenders were sent in; whether they agreed to the conditions advertised as to an improved class of steam vessels with better speed, and, if they did not so agree, will he restrict the contracts to a period of twelve months, so that the public may have another opportunity of tendering?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It has not been found practicable to arrange for the maintenance of the accelerated mail service between Stirling and Oban all the year round. No tenders have been received for the postal services in the West Highlands and Islands that agree to the conditions advertised, and the only practicable proposals made are for the continuance of the existing service. The new contracts will be for a period of twelve months, terminable at any time on six months' notice.

THE LAGOS TREATIES.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether his attention has been called to the report in the Lagos Weekly Record for 23rd January of the interview with the Jebu deputation, in which it is stated that the Governor used the following language:—

"His Excellency knew that there was war in the interior; but the roads should be opened first, and afterwards he would see after the rest. That if they did not open the roads, and would not do so, he would coerce them into doing it, and that the matter of the war in the interior did not concern the Jebus"; whether Mr. Carter was authorised to use this threat of coercion, and whether his action in doing so has received the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The Governor acted under instructions from Her Majesty's Government, which were to the effect that he was to intimate to the King of Jebu that if he refused compliance with the demands made, the Governor had orders to take such measures as might be necessary to enforce them. The correspondence will be found among the Papers when presented to Parliament.

MR. SUMMERS: Can the right hon. Gentleman say when these Papers will be published?

BARON H. DE WORMS: I must give the same answer I have given before—Papers will be laid on the Table as soon as possible consistently with the public interest.

CONDITION OF THE STREETS BETWEEN VICTORIA STREET AND ST. JAMES'S PARK.

SIR J. SWINBURNE (Staffordshire, Lichfield): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the insanitary condition of the streets lying between Victoria Street and St. James's Park; and whether he will direct that an inquiry shall be made with relation thereto; and whether he proposes to take any steps to bring about the removal of the slaughter-house still existing in this locality?

MR. BURDETT-COUTTS (Westminster): May I ask the right hon. Gentleman is there any truth in the allegation that these streets are in an insanitary condition? Is it not the fact that the Vestry and the Sanitary Inspector are satisfied as to the condition of the streets?

*MR. RITCHIE: My attention has not been drawn to the insanitary condition of the streets between Victoria Street and the St. James's Park, or to the existence of the slaughter-house which is mentioned. If there is ground for complaint as to the condition of these places, the first step is to bring the facts of the case under the attention of the Local Authority, who are responsible for the sanitary condition of their district. I am not aware whether this course has been taken. If it has been, and without any satisfactory results, I shall be prepared to consider any statement of the facts with which I may be furnished.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I may say I have already taken the steps suggested by the right hon. Gentleman, but matters have not improved.

*MR. RITCHIE: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman will let me have particulars.

AUSTRALIAN MAILS.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the statement in the Times newspaper of 1st April that the French packet Polynesia left Adelaide 19 hours after the Peninsular and Oriental steamer Victoria, and reached Marseilles four days in advance of that steamer; and whether in future he will arrange that the Australian mails shall be carried by the quickest vessels?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Such a paragraph as is referred to in the question appeared in the Times, and no doubt meant to refer to the Polynesian, which left Adelaide 3rd March, and reached Marseilles 30th March. The Victoria left Adelaide 2nd March, and reached Brindisi 1st April, a day and a half before her contract time. The French steamers leave Adelaide only once in each calendar month; the English contract service regularly every week. To keep the mails out of the regular contract packet, whenever it chanced that a quicker French boat was to start shortly, would be to sacrifice the regularity of the service for the sake of an occasional quick transit. This would be very undesirable; and I cannot undertake to do so.

SIR J. SWINBURNE: Will the Australian mails continue to be sent by steamers which are beaten by four days on the voyage by steamers of another line?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: It is in pursuance of the contract entered into by agreement with the Colonies for what was thought a fairly rapid service. I could not possibly disturb this for the sake of using a French steamer, which only goes once a month.

Mr. Ritchie

SIR J. SWINBURNE: When does the contract expire?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: If the hon. Member will put down that question I will answer it. I cannot give him the information now.

CIVIL SERVICE EXAMINATIONS.

MR. J. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether certain candidates who failed to obtain places amongst those who were declared successful in the open competitive examination held in November last for nine Civil Service clerkships, Class 1, have since been offered and have accepted appointments in this same class; if so, what is the number of such unsuccessful candidates who have been given such appointments; what proportion of the total marks obtainable were respectively secured by such unsuccessful candidates; and what proportion did the number of the candidates in the competitive examination bear to that of the clerkships which have now been filled up?

THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir J. GORST, Chatham): It is inaccurate to describe the candidates in question as unsuccessful, because the regulations specifically provide for the offer of subsequent vacancies to candidates remaining on the list if fully qualified. Three such vacancies have occurred and have been filled. It is not possible to state the total number of marks obtainable; but the three candidates alluded to gained 1,674, 1,545, and 1,456 marks respectively. The total number of competitors was 26, and the number who have received appointments is 12.

BALLYCASTLE AND BALLINA MAIL CAR DRIVER.

MR. JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether his attention has been called to the case of Denis Howe, driver of the mail car between Ballycastle and Ballina, County Mayo, who was found by the police in a house near the public road drinking, while the mail car was left without any supervision; and what the result of the case has been?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The incident above referred to appears to have occurred on the 20th June of last year. Howe and several other men were summoned for being found on unlicensed premises drinking. He denied that he was there for that purpose, and stated that he had merely called to take up a passenger, and that he left his car for a few minutes only in charge of a passenger. The summons against him was dismissed. Howe has always borne a good character as a sober and steady man, and he is still driver of the mail car.

COMMITTAL OF DEBTORS.

MR. A. E. PEASE (York): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is the number of persons that have been committed to prison by the County Court Judge for Circuit No. 15 during the year 1891, and up to 29th February, 1892, and in what gaols they are, or have been, incarcerated; what is the relative proportion, in the County Court Circuit No. 15, of imprisonments to judgments for plaintiffs compared with the rest of England; how many of the persons imprisoned are imprisoned for cases arising out of debts, how many were committed at the instance of the creditor, and how many at the instance of agents or debt-farmers; whether any of those persons have been under age or over 70 years of age; and, if they have, what are the numbers of each class respectively; whether it is necessary for the judgment creditor to prove means of the judgment debtor at the time of the hearing of the committal summons, or whether it is only necessary to show means at any time subsequent to the contracting of the liability; and whether the Government will consider the advisability of introducing a measure controlling imprisonment for debts other than fraudulent, and rendering illegal imprisonment in all cases arising out of non-fraudulent debts where the Court is moved by persons other than the original creditor or creditors, or a measure that will give to the poorer classes of the community the advantages given to the wealthier classes by the Bankruptcy Laws?

MR. MATTHEWS: The latest available statistics for which the hon. Member asks will be found at page 34 of the Parliamentary Return No.

337 of last Session, from which he can gather the proportion he asks for. Persons committed to prison by the County Court Judge of Circuit 15 are imprisoned in Durham, York, Leeds, and Northallerton Prisons. The application for commitment is in all cases at the instance of the creditor. There is no record to show whether a creditor appears in person or is represented at the Court. No record is kept at the Court of the age of the persons committed to prison; but the learned County Court Judge states that he is not aware that any debtor over 70 has ever been committed to prison by him. No person can be imprisoned for debt unless it has been proved, in accordance with Section 5, Sub-section 2, of the Debtors Act of 1869, that such debtor has means to pay, or has had them since the date of the judgment and has refused or neglected to pay. That comes very near to a fraudulent omission to pay. There appear to be no sufficient reasons for legislation to deprive a creditor of the right of enforcing his claims through a representative; and no satisfactory solution has been found, as yet, for the particular class of cases dealt with in Section 5 above-mentioned. The Bankruptcy Act of 1883 provides, by Section 122, a method by which the poorer classes can, without expense, obtain protection for their persons and property equivalent to the advantages of an adjudication in bankruptcy.

SIR H. DAVEY (Stockton): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether his attention has been called to the continuous increase in the number of commitments to prison for non-payment of debts in the County Courts, and particularly in Circuit No. 15; whether he is aware that considerable dissatisfaction exists with the present state of the law; and whether the Government proposes any legislation on the subject?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I can only refer the right hon. Gentleman to the answer which my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary has previously given on this subject.

SIR H. DAVEY: I give notice that I shall take an early opportunity of calling attention to this question.

THE CASE OF P. W. NALLY.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is optional with Prison Governors in Ireland to allow or disallow prisoners to give evidence before a Coroner as to the cause of death within the prison and the prison treatment of a fellow-prisoner; and whether there is any precedent for the action of the Governor of Mountjoy Prison in withholding from the Coroner the knowledge that five witnesses were willing to give material evidence as to the cause of the death of the late Mr. P. W. Nally?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed by the Governor of Mountjoy Prison that there is no reason to believe that any of the prisoners were in a position to give material evidence, or any evidence at all, as to the cause of the death of Nally. Had he had such knowledge as that indicated in the question, the Governor would undoubtedly have communicated it to the Coroner, which would have been following the ordinary course under the circumstances.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Was the Governor at liberty to act on his own belief?

MR. JACKSON: I have had an opportunity of inquiring personally into this matter, and so far as I can gather there was no reason for the Governor to believe that these men were able to give any evidence at all as to the cause of death. No communication took place between the prisoners mentioned and the prisoner Nally subsequent to his illness; and the doctor, to whom I made reference, holds very strongly the opinion that none of the prisoners were in a position to give any evidence at all as to the cause of death. Had the Governor been in possession of any such knowledge he would certainly have communicated it to the Coroner.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Did not the allegations of the other prisoners go to show that he was engaged in employment of which he frequently complained was killing him; and having this in view will the right hon. Gentleman not give the public an opportunity of knowing what he himself has learned by taking evidence by means of an independent inquiry?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member has been good enough to send me the newspaper cutting containing the statement of M'Auley. I have had careful inquiry made, and so far as I have been able to judge none of the statements to which the hon. Gentleman has referred have any foundation in fact.

EVICTIONS ON CLARE ISLAND.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Martin O'Malley has just been evicted by a force of police from his holding on Clare Island, and that a large number of ejectment processes are pending against islanders who were last year saved from starvation by public relief; and will the Government assist in carrying out any further evictions on the island?

MR. JACKSON: The Constabulary authorities report that the man referred to was evicted not by the police, but, at the suit of the landlord, by the Sheriff. Nineteen ejectment processes appear to have been taken out on the 1st inst. The hon. Gentleman is no doubt aware that the Government do not assist in carrying out evictions; personal protection to the Sheriff and bailiffs is afforded by the police when they are requisitioned so to do.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that the Sheriff is also agent to the landlord, and will he continue to enable this gentleman as Sheriff to requisition the Forces of the Crown to protect himself as landlord agent for his own private purposes?

MR. JACKSON: I have no knowledge of the circumstances whether the person referred to acts in the double capacity, but, of course, the police are bound to give him protection when he acts in his capacity of Sheriff.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: I will put down a further question for to-morrow on this subject, and press for more information.

THE CONVICTS MULDOONY AND FINNIGAN.

COLONEL NOLAN (Galway, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that two men, a constable named Muldooney and a farmer named Finnigan, were convicted, about the year 1883, at the Sligo Assizes; if a Memorial, signed by several Magistrates of the locality where the offence was committed, has been addressed to the Government in favour of one of the convicted; if one of the convicted has been released; in favour of which of the convicted was this Memorial addressed; and which of the convicted has been released?

MR. JACKSON: Memorials have from time to time been received on behalf of the convict referred to, but it is not a fact that either of them have been released.

STEAM TRAWLERS IN IRISH WATERS.

COLONEL NOLAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland how many French and Scotch steam trawlers are now off the coasts of Galway and Mayo?

MR. JACKSON: I have caused inquiry to be made, and the Inspectors of Irish Fisheries report that there are steam trawlers off the coast of Galway and Mayo at distances ranging from 4 to 16 miles. They have no details as to their nationality.

COLONEL NOLAN: What is the approximate number?

MR. JACKSON: I do not give the numbers because, although I have the numbers for one or two places, I have not got them for all places, and, therefore, I cannot give a complete list.

COLONEL NOLAN: Will the right hon. Gentleman give a bare estimate?

MR. JACKSON: I should say about 20.

MR. W. O'BRIEN (Cork Co., N.E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received a communication from the Westport Board of Guardians, calling the attention of the Government and of the Irish Fisheries Board to the destruction of nets and other grievous injury caused to the poor fishermen of Achill and Clew Bay by reason of the operations of foreign steam trawlers from France and elsewhere; whether the Irish Fisheries Board has investigated those complaints; and whether any steps will be taken to protect the native fishermen?

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): Representations of the nature mentioned in the question have been received. The Inspectors have endeavoured to obtain the name of the vessel alleged to have done the damage, but so far have been unable to do so.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: Will the Inspectors continue their inquiries?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; but I do not quite see how they are to find out the name of the vessel. No one in the locality appears to know it.

MR. W. O'BRIEN: If the depredations continue, will the right hon. Gentleman consider the advisability of sending out a gunboat to protect the nets?

MR. JACKSON: I am unable to answer that question.

EVENING SCHOOLS—PAYMENT OF ANNUAL GRANTS.

MR. MUNDELLA (Sheffield, Brightside): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he will lay upon the Table a Code or Minute for regulating the payment of annual grants for evening schools; and if he expects to do so before Easter?

SIR W. HART DYKE: I have already stated that the revision of the Code dealing exclusively with those Articles which refer to evening schools is in course of preparation, and will, I anticipate, be laid on the Table in the form of a Minute. I cannot at this moment undertake to say when it will be ready.

THE ARMY PAY DEPARTMENT.

COLONEL BRIDGEMAN (Bolton): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War why the Army Pay Department, which is one of the largest Departments in the Army, is unlike all the others in not having a representative at the War Office to administer its affairs?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am afraid all I can say at present is that the whole constitution of this Department is under consideration, and the suggestion made by my hon. Friend has not been overlooked.

SCHOOL TEACHERS AS MAGISTRATES AND DIRECTORS.

MR. LABOUCHERE (Northampton): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he is aware that Mr. Abraham Park, the principal teacher of the Albion School, Aston, is a Borough Magistrate, in which capacity he frequently sits on the Bench, and adjudicates on cases of parents prosecuted for not sending their children to school; that Mr. Edward Barlow, principal teacher of the Parochial School, Aston, is Director of several Public Companies; and that Mr. Joseph Redyard, principal teacher of the National School (Castle Hall), Staleybridge, is the Chairman of the Castle Spinning Company, Director of the Guide Bridge Spinning Company, and of the Staleybridge Company, a Magistrate, and an Alderman; and whether these gentlemen are infringing Clause 85 (e), chapter 4, of the New Code, 1890, in which it is laid down, as the condition of a grant to a school—

“That the principal teacher is not allowed to undertake duties not connected with the school which may occupy any part whatever of the school hours, or of the time appointed for the special instruction of pupil teachers”?

*SIR W. HART DYKE: The hon. Member has correctly quoted the conditions under which teachers are allowed to undertake duties not connected with the school, and I am not aware that these conditions have been violated in the cases to which he refers; but the Inspector will be instructed to make inquiry when he visits the schools.

THE GIBRALTAR SANITARY BOARD.

MR. SUMMERS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the Secretary of State has received a copy of a resolution passed at a public meeting of the ratepayers of Gibraltar on 16th November, 1891, protesting against the putting into force of the Sanitary Order in Council (Amendment), 1891, as being injurious to the interests of the ratepayers, and depriving them of due representation; and, further, protesting against the manner in which this Order in Council has been put into force; and what answer, if any, has been returned to the resolution in question?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: The protest was received in a letter from the Committee of the Gibraltar Ratepayers' Defence Association, dated the 25th of November last, and was replied to in a Despatch to the Governor on the 11th of December. I regret that it is not possible to give the answer to the protest of the Ratepayers' Association in the limits of a reply to a question, but it will be found in the Papers which it is proposed to present to Parliament.

MR. M'LAGAN (Linlithgow): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what was the respective proportional representation of the War Office, the Admiralty, and Colonial Department on the Sanitary Board at Gibraltar before the enforcement of the Sanitary Order (Amendment Order), 1891, and what is it now under said Order; and what is the proportion each of these Departments contribute to the rates?

*BARON H. DE WORMS: Under the Sanitary Order in Council of 1883 the War Office had two representatives, the Admiralty and Colonial Government one each. Under the Sanitary Order (Amendment Order), 1891, the War Office and Colonial Government have each two representatives and the Admiralty one. On the basis of the actual payments for water rate in 1889, and the assessment for general purposes rate in 1890, the War Office, out of a total of 517,477 pesetas, paid 194,988 pesetas, the Colonial Government 19,172 pesetas, and the Admiralty 16,816 pesetas. It must be remembered, however, that the Government Departments have contributed directly, in addition to their payments as ratepayers, one-third of the capital cost of all the important sewerage works.

MR. CAUSTON (Southwark, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he is aware that all the old members of the Sanitary Commission of Gibraltar, who were summarily dismissed under the Order of 1891 as being inefficient, have been invited by the Governor to serve on the new Commission, and have refused to do so on the ground that the Order in question gives despotic authority to the Governor, and deprives the ratepayers of their proper share in the representation on the Commission; and what steps the Government intends to take to fill up the vacancies still existing on the Board?

BARON H. DE WORMS: The old members were not dismissed as being inefficient, but the Sanitary Order (Amendment Order), 1891, provided that on its coming into operation the whole of the Sanitary Commissioners then in office should go out of office. One of the members of the old Board is serving on the new Board; another was appointed to the new Board, but has resigned. The Secretary of State believes that some, but not all, of the other members of the old Board were asked, and declined to serve on the new Board. As to the reasons assigned for such refusal, I must refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to a similar question asked by him on the 4th inst. As regards the last part of the question, Her Majesty's Government hope that competent persons will be found willing to fill the two vacant seats on the Board, and it would, in their opinion, be premature now to consider what steps should be taken, should this hope be unfortunately disappointed.

MR. CAUSTON: What is the right hon. Gentleman's reason for not stating the answer given by the gentlemen to whom he has referred?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Because we have not obtained the consent of those gentlemen to make those answers public. If the hon. Member wishes, however, to see them, I shall be happy to show them to him.

CYCLISTS IN HYDE PARK.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the First Commissioner of Works whether he will consider the advisability of allowing cyclists to use the roads within Hyde Park as they are in other London Parks?

THE FIRST COMMISSIONER OF WORKS (MR. PLUNKET, Dublin University): The rules for the admission of cyclists to Hyde Park were in 1888 relaxed so as to allow of the use by cyclists of the road available for hackney carriages—I mean the road from Victoria Gate to Alexandra Gate. I do not think it would be wise, in the interests of the public generally, to admit cyclists on the other roads.

GRANTS FOR SECONDARY SCHOOLS IN SCOTLAND.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether Her Majesty's Government propose to require all schools receiving grants for secondary education under Sub-section (1) (b) of Section 2 of the Education and Local Taxation Relief (Scotland) Bill, to submit to inspection under Sub-section (1) (a); what classes of schools, besides schools under the management of School Boards, are to be admitted to participate in the grants under Sub-section (1) (b); and whether it is intended to extend the proposed grants to schools under the control of, or in connection with, any particular religious denomination?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The hon. Member will no doubt feel that there is considerable inconvenience in making piecemeal statements on a somewhat complicated question of policy in answer to interrogations across the floor of the House. I will take care that full information shall be in the hands of hon. Gentlemen in time for the discussion which may be raised on the Committee stage.

MR. BRYCE: What form will the information take, and when may we hope to get it?

SIR C. J. PEARSON: The statement will, I anticipate, be in printed form, and be laid on the Table in ample time.

THE QUALIFICATION OF VESTRY-MEN.

MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether he is aware that as a result of the judgment of Mr. Justice Denman in the case of "Gordon v. Williamson" many Vestries have become disorganised, Vestrymen who have fulfilled their duties a considerable time, under the impression that they were legally qualified, now being afraid that their case is covered by the above decision; and whether, in view of the approaching Vestry elections, it is his intention to take action to remove the present difficulties, and enable the ratepayers to have a free selection of candidates for the several Vestries?

*MR. RITCHIE: I am aware of the judgment of Mr. Justice Denman in the case of "Gordon v. Williamson," but I have no information that many of the Vestries in the Metropolis have become disorganised. The question as to the qualification of Vestrymen in the Metropolis is one which would necessarily be dealt with by a District Councils Bill for London, but it is not my intention to propose legislation on the subject apart from that general measure.

MR. J. ROWLANDS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that several Vestries have become disorganised, and, the present state of the law being so unsatisfactory, that Vestrymen do not like to put themselves in the position of becoming common informers?

*MR. RITCHIE: I would point out to the hon. Member that it is quite impossible to introduce and carry a Bill through both Houses to do away with any present inconvenience without dealing with the whole question.

PARCEL POST DELIVERY IN BELFAST AND DUBLIN.

DR. FITZGERALD (Longford, S.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he will explain how it happens that parcels sent from London through the Parcel Post are delivered in Belfast twelve hours earlier than they are delivered in Dublin?

*SIR J. FERGUSON: Parcels for the first delivery in Dublin must be posted in London in time for the dispatch by the 6.30 p.m. train from Euston via Holyhead. Parcels for Belfast are forwarded by the 8.0 p.m. train from Euston via Stranraer, and can therefore be posted an hour later in London for next day's delivery. It is only when parcels for Dublin are posted too late for dispatch by the 6.30 p.m. train that they are delivered later than those for Belfast, and the difference then is about eight hours, not twelve hours.

THE CASE OF MR. R. B. BRADSHAW.

MR. JORDAN (Clare, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been directed to a correspondence during the months of January, February, and March, between the Registrar General and Mr. R. B. Bradshaw, of Lisnaskea, County Fermanagh, and between the Registrar General and Dr. Knox, Local District Registrar of Lisnaskea, in reference to the prosecution by Dr. Knox of Mr. Bradshaw, at the instance of the Registrar General, for the non-registration of the birth and death of a child, and especially to a letter of the Registrar General on the 29th January, 1892, to Dr. Knox, in which he states—

"That the facts of the case were not put before this Department when you reported Mr. Bradshaw's name as a defaulter under the Registration Acts. As you were personally aware of the occurrence of the birth and death, you should have served Mr. Bradshaw with notice to register each within the legal time, and you have given no satisfactory explanation of your neglect to furnish Mr. Bradshaw with a form of statutory declaration for the registry of the birth, which it is alleged he applied for several times; further, you rendered yourself liable to a penalty by refusing to register the death when applied to within twelve months. Had the circumstances been known, instructions to prosecute would not have been issued to you."

Whether the Local Registrar, Dr. Knox was also the medical attendant at the birth and death of the child; whether the Registrar, on the 29th January and the 3rd February, requested Mr. Bradshaw to forward to the Department the amount of the costs he was put to in defending himself against a prosecution so instituted; and whether the Registrar will now order the repayment of these expenses to Mr. Bradshaw, as the least reparation due for such action?

MR. JACKSON: I understand that, as regards this case, Mr. Bradshaw was brought before a Magistrate and fined 2s. and 3s. costs for having failed to register the birth and death of his child. The matter was brought before the Registrar General, and as it appeared he had been fined according to law, the Registrar General felt that he could not interfere.

MR. JORDAN: The Registrar General's letter says—

"As you were personally aware of the occurrence of the birth and death, you should have served Mr. Bradshaw with notice to register each within the legal time, and you have given no satisfactory explanation of your neglect to furnish Mr. Bradshaw with a form of statutory declaration for the registry of the birth, which it is alleged he applied for several times; further, you rendered yourself liable to a penalty by refusing to register the death when applied to within twelve months. Had the circumstances been known, instructions to prosecute would not have been issued to you."

Was the Local Registrar, Dr. Knox, also the medical attendant at the birth and death of the child?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; but I do not understand that that statement of the Registrar General would in any sense exonerate Mr. Bradshaw.

OPIUM SELLERS IN BOMBAY.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the system of requiring the opium seller in Bombay to sell a minimum quantity of opium in the year, subject to a pecuniary penalty, has been abolished?

MR. CURZON: It will have been seen from pages 106 and 109 of the recent opium Blue Book that the Government of India have ordered the cessation of the practice of requiring from licensed opium sellers in Bombay the sale of a minimum guaranteed quantity, the object of which was to check the sale of contraband opium; that the Secretary of State has approved these instructions; and that a Report on the effect of these orders has been requested.

THE PLAGUE OF FIELD MICE IN THE SOUTH OF SCOTLAND.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether, in view of the character of the Report recently issued by the Board with regard to the plague of field mice, or voles, in the South of Scotland, he will, without delay, appoint a Committee to inquire and report as to the causes of the visitation, and the best means of getting rid of it?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): If I thought that the appointment of a Committee would solve the difficulty which is presented by this question, I would appoint one to-morrow, but I cannot see that it would add anything to the information already before us. I am afraid the plague is mainly due to natural and climatic causes, and that it is only to natural causes that we can look for its disappearance. I am encouraged in this belief by what occurred when it made its appearance before, some 16 years ago. I think that probably, where it is feasible, burning might be resorted to with advantage; but beyond this I frankly acknowledge that, with all the information we have been able to obtain, I am entirely at a loss to suggest any effective remedy for this calamitous visitation. I can only add that I shall be glad to do anything in my power to give prompt effect to any suggestions which may be made by others which may appear to give any reasonable hope of effecting the object in view.

THE IRISH AND AMERICAN MAIL SERVICE.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Postmaster General what is the annual sum now paid for mail service to the Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland, and for what additional sum were the Company willing to afford the improved service desired by the Post Office; and whether the Treasury were willing to pay any, and, if so, what, additional sum for the improved service?

MR. P. O'BRIEN had notice to ask the Postmaster General whether he has received communications from the Cork Chamber of Commerce urging the desirability of an acceleration in the transatlantic and local mail service, and suggesting means by which it could be accomplished; and whether he has decided to take any, and, if so, what, steps in the matter?

Mr. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) had notice to ask the Postmaster General whether he is aware that for commercial purposes there is only one mail in the day between Cork and London, as letters leaving Cork by the night mail are delivered the next day after business hours, and do not therefore reach the persons to whom they are addressed until the morning after their delivery; and whether the Post Office propose to take any steps to so improve the morning service as to increase the interval between the arrival and despatch of the day mails?

Mr. MAURICE HEALY had notice to ask the Postmaster General if he can state the extra cost involved in the recent improvements of the English mail system to Belfast and Londonderry, including the Stranraer route; whether the Treasury made any objections to this additional expense; and whether any reason exists why the Cork mail service should be dealt with less favourably than that to the North of Ireland, especially in view of the importance of the American mails?

Mr. MAURICE HEALY had notice to ask the Postmaster General whether he can state the amounts of the payments made to the Great Northern and Great Southern and Western Railways of Ireland respectively for the mail services between Dublin and Belfast and Dublin and Cork, including in the latter the American mail service?

Mr. MAURICE HEALY had notice to ask the Postmaster General whether any improvement of the mail service to Cork is now under consideration; and whether the Post Office Department have abandoned all intention of coming to terms with the Great Southern and Western Railway Company for an improved service of mail trains?

Dr. TANNER had notice to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he would state what is the annual sum paid for the alternative, or supplementary, mail service to and from the North of Ireland via Stranraer and Larne?

Mr. P. O'Brien

Dr. TANNER had notice to ask the Postmaster General if he would state what is the total annual sum paid to Railway Companies in England, Scotland, and Ireland, respectively, for the carriage of mails?

Dr. TANNER had notice to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what was the annual sum paid to the Great Northern Railway Company before the recent acceleration of the mail service on their line of railway, and what was the additional sum granted for the improved service?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I should like at the same time to answer Questions 10, 64, 66, 67, 68, 77, 78, and 80. They are nearly identical and on the same subject.

MR. SEXTON: On a point of order. I have put this question to the right hon. Gentleman. I ask you if it is not in accordance with the Rules of the House that he should answer it at once?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman proposes to answer the hon. Gentleman, but he thought he might answer a number of other questions at the same time.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The hon. Gentleman will see that I shall fully answer his question. I received communications and also a deputation of representatives of Cork and of the Great Southern and Western Railway Company of Ireland in support of these proposals. That Company was prepared, for an additional payment of £3,000 a year, to afford the improved service desired. That sum, I was advised, was reasonable and moderate in amount. In view, however, of the large increase of Post Office expenditure, it has not been thought proper to incur this and other items of additional expenditure for improved services; and the scheme is for the present, therefore, rejected. It is true, as stated by the hon. Member for Cork, that the night mail letters arriving in London from Cork, though delivered on the next evening, are not delivered till after business hours. No doubt, had the proposed acceleration of the morning mail from Dublin to Cork been adopted, the interval between its arrival and the despatch of the return day mail would have been increased. In the year 1891.

the total payments for mail services to the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland was £41,341, and to the Great Southern and Western £40,781. It cannot be stated what parts of these sums were paid respectively for purely local services and otherwise. The additional cost involved in the recent improvement of the English mail service to Belfast and Londonderry was £18,500 a year—namely, for the Stranraer route £13,500, and for the accelerated train service £5,000. The arrangement was, of course, made with the sanction of the Treasury. The correspondence passing to and from the North of Ireland is much larger in amount than that to and from the South. The total sums paid to English, Scotch, and Irish Railways for the conveyance of mails are £599,930, £203,750, and £157,190 respectively.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has answered only one out of the three inquiries in my question. He said the Company offered for £3,000 to give an improved service; he has not said what sum is now paid and what the Treasury are prepared to give.

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I said that the sum now paid was £40,781, and I also stated that Her Majesty's Government did not think proper to expend the sum of £3,000 required, which is one of a large number of sums which it might be very judicious to expend, but the Treasury would not sanction that additional amount.

MR. SEXTON: Were they willing to give any part of that sum?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The additional service required a particular sum, which is moderate, and we did not attempt to cut it down. The whole proposal stood by itself, and, while reasonable in itself, it was not one we were prepared to incur at the time.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The right hon. Gentleman stated that the mails to the North of Ireland are greater than those to Cork; does this include the American mail?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The through mails on either route include the American mails.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Does he say that the mails from London to Belfast are greater than these from London to Cork, including the American mails?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: The volume of the letters going to the North of Ireland is considerably the greater.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is any prospect of the present unsatisfactory method of transferring the Irish and American mails from train to steamer, and vice versa, at Kingstown and Holyhead being improved; whether it is in the power of the Post Office authorities, under the terms of their contract with the London and North Western Railway Company, to require that Company to provide such mail vans as would permit the mails to be carried in crates, which could be lifted on board or on shore, without breaking bulk, by means of a crane; whether he is aware that the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company are strongly in favour of this system, and have expressed their willingness to contribute their share of the necessary expense of bringing it into effect; and whether the Post Office Department have made any inquiries as to whether the suggestions of the City of Dublin Steam Packet Company could be usefully and successfully carried into effect?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: This matter has been fully considered several times. The mails are transferred with the utmost expedition at present, and the London and North Western Railway Company regard the proposed scheme as impracticable. The Department has no power to insist on its adoption; and looking at the serious difficulties in the way, independently of the question of expense, it is thought that the circumstances do not justify any further action by the Post Office.

MR. SEXTON: The right hon. Gentleman has not answered the paragraph as to whether the Department have made inquiries as to the proposal for transferring the mails?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I will investigate the matter, especially as it has been suggested; but I am afraid we shall not be able to do much. I have answered the other paragraphs of the question.

THE EXTRA POLICE AT DURHAM.

MR. J. WILSON (Durham, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, with reference to the large number of policemen drafted into Durham from Yorkshire and Lancashire, whether he will inform the House on what grounds these extra policemen were drafted into the county, and what has necessitated their retention; and whether he can say at whose orders they were brought, and upon whom the cost of their bringing and maintenance will fall?

MR. MATTHEWS: I am informed by the Chief Constable that the extra police have been brought into the County of Durham for the preservation of the peace and for the protection of property, and that it is absolutely necessary that they should be retained in order to prevent disturbances. They were brought in at the instance of the Chief Constable, under Section 25 of the Police Act, 1890, and the cost of their bringing and maintenance will fall on the ratepayers.

MR. J. WILSON: May I ask if the right hon. Gentleman has seen the charge made to the Grand Jury of Durham on Monday by Mr. Wharton, a Member of this House, and Chairman of the Quarter Sessions? Mr. Wharton said he was happy to say that riot and outrage and breaking the law to any extent had been rare and isolated, and he was thankful to acknowledge the small amount of assault and outrage or anything approaching it; and day after day the struggle was maintained in a spirit of good humour and good conduct on the part of those concerned, and he had every hope it would be maintained in the same spirit to the end. Under these circumstances, I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he considers the retention of the police drafted from the counties round about was necessary, especially as they are a source of great irritation?

MR. MATTHEWS: Mr. Speaker, the responsibility of maintaining the peace in any part of the Kingdom rests on the Local Magistrates and the Chief Constable, and I should certainly not take upon myself, except in an extreme case, to interfere with their discretion.

QUARTERMASTERS OF ROYAL MARINES.

ADMIRAL FIELD (Sussex, Eastbourne): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether there is any reason why the provisions of Article 191, Royal Warrant, Pay and Promotion, 1891, should be withheld from Quartermasters of the Royal Marines, though freely conferred on Army Quartermasters?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The question of extending the provisions of the Royal Warrant in question to the Quartermasters of the Royal Marines is still under consideration.

THE DISCHARGE OF A WORKMAN AT CHATHAM DOCKYARD.

MR. BROADHURST (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has made any further inquiry with regard to the discharge of a man named Sullivan from the Chatham Dockyard; and, if so, whether the result of such inquiry will enable him to order the re-instatement of Sullivan in the Dockyard workshops?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I have made further inquiry with regard to the discharge of Sullivan from Chatham Dockyard, and I find that, quite independently of the question whether he had completed his apprenticeship or not, his character as a workman was not quite satisfactory. As there is no difficulty in entering men possessing very good qualifications, I do not propose to give orders for the special re-entry of Sullivan in the yard.

PUBLIC MEETINGS AT THE WORLD'S END, CHELSEA.

MR. CUNINGHAME GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that in the case of the prosecution by the Treasury of W. G. Pearson (a dock labourer), arising out of the World's End, Chelsea, meetings, an application to transfer the trial to the Court of Queen's Bench was granted, subject to Pearson entering into recognizances for £300, and finding sureties for costs of £150 each; and whether any means exist whereby this trial, involving the question of right of public meeting, may be taken to the Court of Queen's Bench without insisting upon security for £600, which in the case of a dock labourer is necessarily prohibitive?

MR. MATTHEWS: I have no power to vary the Order of the Court on a matter wholly within their jurisdiction. It is open for any of those who consider that important questions are involved in the trial of the case to give the required security for costs to the amount of £300.

TIDAL WATER.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War in how many and in what cases bye-laws have been made under 48 and 49 Vic., c. 36, affecting the sea or any tidal water; in how many and in what cases the consent of the Board of Trade has been obtained to such bye-laws when public rights were affected thereby, and in how many and in what cases the consent of the Board of Trade to such bye-laws was refused, and on what grounds?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: Bye-laws have been made under the Act referred to in the cases of Shoeburyness, Lydd, Landguard Fort, Warden Point, and Hurst Castle, and the foreshore of the Wash. In every case the consent of the Board of Trade was obtained. There has been no case in which the Board of Trade has refused consent.

THE TOKAR DISTRICT.

MR. BRYCE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, in view of the fact that in 1889 a Proclamation was issued by the British Governor of the Red Sea Littoral to the tribes round Suakin which contained the following passage:

"I write you again so as to let you and all the tribes know clearly what the Government intend to do. As you have been often told during the past few years, the Government does not wish to interfere with the freedom of the tribes, or to impose any taxes upon you."

whether it is the fact that, when the Tokar District was re-occupied in 1891, the fertile lands of the Tokar Delta were seized and re-distributed, and are now forced to pay taxes to the Egyptian Government?

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. J. W. LOWTHER, Cumberland, Penzance): The Proclamation was issued nearly two years before the re-occupation of Tokar, and applied to a state of affairs which was completely modified by the latter event. The tax of 20 P.T. per acre imposed upon the Tokar lands is intended to cover the cost of seed supplied to the cultivators and construction works for the regulation of the water supply and other purposes. The lands were not re-distributed except so far as a natural re-distribution was caused by the alteration of the watercourses, which frequently occurs.

MR. BRYCE: Will the hon. Gentleman present any Papers on the subject?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: The hon. Member will find considerable information on the subject in the Papers which have recently been presented in the shape of a Report from Sir Evelyn Baring.

MR. BRYCE: Is it intended to present any Papers?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: It is not intended to present any Papers, but if the right hon. Gentleman wishes any particular information and will mention it to me I will endeavour to give him what he requires.

MR. A. O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): What proportion will go for seed and what proportion for public works?

*MR. J. W. LOWTHER: I cannot say that without notice or without asking the Egyptian Government.

MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN (Merthyr Tydvil): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies what are the amounts of royalties now charged upon the production of gold and silver in each of the Australian Colonies respectively; what is the charge to individual miners for miners' rights to work for gold and silver in each of such Colonies; has the legal estate of the Crown been assigned to or abrogated in favour of the various Colonial Governments, or has merely the control and management of the Mines Royal of the Crown been assigned to them; does the Crown derive any royalties or other direct pecuniary advantages from the production of gold and silver in the Colonies referred to, and, if so, what sum is being paid yearly; and, if the Crown has any rights by virtue of its prerogative in the Australian Colonies, why are they not insisted upon as in the cases of Wales and Ireland?

BARON H. DE WORMS: Royalties are not charged in the Australian Colonies upon the production of gold and silver, but a miner's right is granted for a yearly fee of from 5s. to 10s., and leases of auriferous lands are given at a yearly rental per acre of from 5s. to 20s. The hon. Member will find full particulars in the Acts of the several Australian Colonies relating to gold mining, which he can see either in the Library of the House or at the Colonial Office. The hon. Member does not distinguish in the last part of his question between the rights of the Crown in this country and its rights in the Colonies. The waste lands in the Colonies belong to the Crown, but the Colonial Legislatures have been empowered to make laws regulating the sale and disposal of them, and the provisions to which I have referred are contained in the laws passed under his authority. The fees and rentals collected on behalf of the Crown are appropriated to the service of Her Majesty in the several Colonies.

DEFICIENT SCHOOL ACCOMMODATION.

MR. PICTON (Leicester): I beg to ask the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education whether his attention has been called to a letter written to the Birkenhead News of 26th March, 1892, by Mr. Hugh Williams complaining that he has applied to three schools, without success, for admission for his child; whether he will cause the facts stated by Mr. Williams to be inquired into; and whether, seeing that the Census shows that there is an actual deficiency of school accommodation in Birkenhead of over 800 places, which will be still further increased owing to the recent condemnation by Her Majesty's Inspector of two of the existing schools, the Education Department will take immediate steps to have this deficiency supplied?

SIR W. HART DYKE: By the courtesy of the hon. Member I have seen Mr. Williams' letter, but inquiry has up to this date failed to elicit any evidence that children are on the whole not attending school properly, and I have reason to believe that the pressure upon certain schools is, in consequence of the representations of the Department, in a fair way of being removed by the provision of additional accommodation. A scheme is also on foot to build new schools sufficient to provide for the estimated increase of population during the next decennial period, and in connection with this movement the Wesleyans have undertaken to re-open their old school in the summer with modern improvements.

MR. PICTON: Has the right hon. Gentleman inquired into the case of Hugh Williams?

SIR W. HART DYKE: We have inquired generally, and, as I said, can learn nothing to show that there are many such instances. But I may say that though in most parts of the district there is ample accommodation, there are others where the accommodation is not sufficient.

THE "INFANTRY DRILL."

VISCOUNT NEWARK (Notts, Newark): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether, as the new "Infantry Drill" provides for only one major in a battalion, the junior majors of battalions of the Reserve Forces will be obliged to resign their commissions; or, if not, what arrangement can be made for retaining these officers?

MR. E. STANHOPE: In the Regular Forces the Majors (except the one who is second in command) are company commanders, and in the new "Infantry Drill" it is only necessary to define the position of three mounted officers—namely, the commanding officer of the battalion, the second in command, and the adjutant. There is no suggestion that the junior majors of battalions of Militia and Volunteers should resign. Their duties would naturally be defined by their commanding officer.

LIMERICK POST OFFICE.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick City): I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he has received a memorial, numerous and influentially signed, requesting the establishment of a branch post office in the neighbourhood of Sarsfield Street, in the City of Limerick; and whether he can accede to the request of the memorial?

*MR. J. FERGUSSON: There was such a memorial in regard to a town sub-office in Brunswick Street, but I understand that this is otherwise called Sarsfield Street, and it was decided that the existing facilities were sufficient.

THE CASE OF MRS. MONTAGU.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether the attention of the Government has been directed to the recent trial in Ireland of a Scotch-woman, named Mrs. Montagu, for cruelly torturing her child to death; and whether he can inform the House why the further charges of cruelty alleged to have been perpetrated by the same woman were dropped, and a nolle prosequi entered? I should like to supplement this by asking the right hon. Gentleman if he can inform the House whether there is any method by which this monster of cruelty—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Can be prevented from torturing her children when she is released from prison?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! The rule to be observed in putting a question which is on the Paper must also be observed when putting a question which is not on the Paper.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. MADDEN, Dublin University): This case has received throughout my careful attention. The further charges of cruelty referred to in the question have not been finally dropped. I am informed by the Solicitor General for Ireland, who conducted the prosecution, that, having regard to the evidence in the possession of the Crown at the time of the trial, he did not consider it advisable to proceed with the charges of ill-treatment by Mrs. Montagu of her male children, Austen, Walter, and Gilbert. The course which he took enables the Crown to bring forward those charges again, should further evidence be available. Having regard to the fact that those charges are still pending against Mrs. Montagu, the House will see that it would be wrong for me to enter any further into the details of this case.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Who is responsible for the preparation of the case?

MR. MADDEN: The case, in one sense, is prepared by the Crown Solicitor, but the form it assumes is largely dependent on the material which is laid before him.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Will the right hon. Gentleman state whether it was by his instructions that Catholic jurors to the number of 17 were challenged at this trial?

MR. MADDEN: I have no information whatever, or means of information, as to the religion of the jurors who were challenged by the prisoner, or of the smaller number, as I observe, who were ordered to stand aside by the Crown. I may mention, as the case has excited considerable interest, that this prisoner was originally returned for trial at Londonderry Assizes, but at my instance the venue was changed to the County of Dublin in order that it may take place where the trial could not possibly be affected by local feeling or prejudice of any kind. It was there tried before a Special Jury of the City of Dublin, presided over by, perhaps, the most capable and experienced Judge on the Irish Bench.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, having regard to the feeling of horror which this case has excited amongst every class and every sect in Ireland, he does not suppose that Catholics who were summoned to attend this trial would regard it as an abominable slur upon them—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

MR. T. M. HEALY: That 17 of them were ordered to stand aside?

Mr. P. O'BRIEN : Does the right hon. Gentleman propose to proceed with the prosecution of the governess?

Mr. MADDEN : That is a different question.

Mr. JOHNSTON : Did the right hon. Gentleman receive a letter from a Roman Catholic priest testifying to the purity and piety of Mrs. Montagu?

Mr. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne) : May I ask whether, considering the extraordinary severity of the sentence on the girl Fanny Gane—

*Mr. SPEAKER : Order, order ! That is an improper question to put.

An hon. MEMBER : It is very hard on the poor woman.

*Mr. SPEAKER : Order, order ! It is not permissible to question the decision of a Judge in that manner.

Mr. NORRIS (Tower Hamlets, Limehouse) : I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, with reference to such cases as that of Mrs. Montagu, he will consider the expediency of introducing a Bill empowering the Public Prosecutor to intervene and take further proceedings in the public interest where indictments of a criminal nature have been withdrawn, and to do so notwithstanding conviction upon any other charge, Sir R. WEBSTER : The hon. Member will remember that Mrs. Montagu's case arose in Ireland. So far as England is concerned, the regulations already in force relating to the office of Public Prosecutor are, in my opinion, sufficient.

ORDNANCE SURVEY.

Mr. PICKARD (York, W.R., Northampton) : I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether it is a fact that where the population is over 4,000 the Ordnance Survey shall be made on a scale of 1-500 free of cost ; if so, whether he can state why the Director General of the Ordnance Survey has declined to make such survey in the parish of Rothwell, in Yorkshire?

*Mr. RITCHIE : Surveys on the 1-500 scale are only made free of cost in the case of compact towns having a population of over 4,000, and not in the case of districts in which the population is scattered over a considerable area. It was for this reason that the Director General of the Ordnance Survey declined to make a survey on the scale referred to in the parish of Rothwell, in Yorkshire.

LABOURERS' COTTAGES IN IRELAND.

Dr. TANNER : I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he will state in how many cases have the Irish Local Government Board exercised their statutory powers under the Labourers (Ireland) Act in proceeding with schemes for erection of labourers' cottages in regard to which no effective action had been duly taken by the Boards of Guardians concerned?

Mr. JACKSON : Since the passing of the Act referred to in August last, the Local Government Board have received complaints against Boards of Guardians in three cases only. In one of these cases the Guardians have made an improvement scheme ; in the second the question is to be considered at a special meeting of the Guardians to be held on the 19th inst., and as regards the third the Local Government Board are at present in communication with the Guardians.

THE COUNCIL OF JUDGES.

Mr. ROBERTSON (Dundee) : I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any Report has been made by the Council of Judges, and when it will be laid upon the Table of the House?

Mr. MATTHEWS : No Report has yet been received from the Council of Judges.

THE ANNUAL TRADE RETURNS.

Mr. HOLDEN (Walsall) : I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the annual statement of the trade of the United Kingdom with foreign countries and British Possessions for the year 1891 will be issued ; and whether some means cannot be adopted to have this Return presented in future earlier in the Session?

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) : It is expected that the annual statement of trade for 1891 will be issued early next month. The date of publication has been accelerated in recent years, and I hope next year will show a further improvement.

MILITIA SUBALTERNES.

MR. D. SULLIVAN (Westmeath, S.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War when the result of the examination of Militia Subalterns for commissions in the Army, held on the 16th and 17th March, will be made known?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is expected that the result will be promulgated during the Easter Recess.

THE CONSTRUCTION OF FISHERY PIERS AND BOAT SLIPS IN IRELAND.

MR. KILBRIDE (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the amount at present in the hands of the Board of Works available for the erection of fishery piers and boat slips; also the amount the Congested Districts Board have in hand for the same purpose?

MR. JACKSON: I am informed that the only amount in the hands of the Board of Works in Ireland for the erection of fishery piers and harbours is a balance of £2,629 under the Sea Fisheries Act of 1883; but this has been allocated to the extension of Clogher Head Pier. There is no portion of the funds of the Congested Districts Board specially ear-marked for piers or boatslips.

MR. KILBRIDE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether the Government received a memorial last year from the fishermen and other residents on the south side of Dingle Bay praying for the construction of fishery piers and boatslips at Coonana and Croom-Croun Harbours; whether he is aware that on several occasions the fishermen when launching their boats are obliged to wade up to their middle to try and save their boats from being broken, and remain in their wet clothes all the long cold nights fishing, with the result that the strongest and most robust constitutions quickly succumb; whether he is aware that Sir Thomas Brady in March last year visited these places, and strongly recommended the erection of boatslips; and whether, having regard to the necessity that exists for the construction of these works, the Government intend to carry into effect the prayer of the memorialists?

MR. JACKSON: The replies to the inquiries in the first and third paragraphs are in the affirmative. There are no funds at the disposal of the Irish Government which would enable the prayer of the memorialists to be carried into effect, and the memorialists were so informed.

MR. KILBRIDE: As the Congested Districts Board meet next week, will this matter be brought under their notice?

MR. JACKSON: I will bring the matter before that Board.

CONGESTED DISTRICTS.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what decision have the Board for the Congested Districts arrived at in reference to the memorials and resolutions from various localities in West Clare which some time since were referred to them?

MR. JACKSON: The County of Clare does not come within the definition of a Congested Districts County as contained in the 36th section of the Purchase of Land (Ireland) Act, 1891, and there is, therefore, no power to schedule as congested the localities referred to. The applicants have been so informed by the Congested Districts Board.

ENNISKILLEN POST OFFICE.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if his attention has been called to the state of the post office in Enniskillen; and if he will appoint a competent engineer and inspector to examine and report if the structure, fittings, and conditions are in harmony with the requirements of the town and age?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: I am assured that the post office at Enniskillen is in all respects suitable as regards structure, fittings, and conditions, and is in harmony with the requirements of the town. Under these circumstances a special examination does not seem to be necessary.

MILITARY HEADQUARTERS, ENNIS-KILLEN.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War what are the specific military or other grounds on which the Government have decided to remove headquarters from Enniskillen to Derry; have the Government yet purchased land in Derry on which they contemplate erecting military barracks, or are they only looking for it; if they do obtain ground, will they erect sufficient new accommodation for all the soldiers that may from time to time be stationed in Derry, and will the present old barracks there be disused for military purposes; if the old barracks be still used, will the new erection be for headquarters and the old for the men; and if the Government have been offered ground at Enniskillen on which to erect new barracks much cheaper than they can procure it in Derry?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: It is not desirable to state in detail the military reasons for changing the position of troops; but under all the circumstances of this case the Commander of the Forces in Ireland considered Londonderry in every way a more suitable station than Enniskillen for the headquarters of a battalion. The answer to the second paragraph of the question is, No. The remaining questions are mainly hypothetical, and are dependent on circumstances which have not yet arisen. I am, therefore, unable to answer them.

SCATTERY ISLAND.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he will state the grounds on which the authorities dismantled the forts on Scattery Island, at the mouth of the Shannon; and if they will not erect new forts west of Kilrush, will they restore the old forts, with modern and efficient armaments, on Scattery?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I answered the hon. Member's question on the 11th May last year; my answer then being to the effect that the works on Scattery Island were obsolete, and it was not considered necessary to re-construct them in view of far more pressing services.

SCHOOL GRANTS IN IRELAND.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what amount (approximately) out of the school grant for the current year would be applicable to each of the seven objects defined in the Schedule to the Irish Education Bill—namely, augmentation of class salaries of teachers; augmentation of salaries of assistant teachers; capitation grants to schools not having teachers paid by class salaries; bonus to each male assistant teacher of a certain standing and class; corresponding bonus to female assistant teachers; third-class salaries to teachers of small schools; and capitation grant in respect of schools the teachers of which receive salaries or other money payments from the Commissioners of Education?

MR. JACKSON: I shall be much obliged if the hon. Gentleman will put down his question for to-morrow, and I will telegraph for information. I have a certain rough calculation, but I would rather give it as approximately correct.

MR. SEXTON: I would rather receive it in that form, and therefore I will postpone it.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE, BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland what steps have been taken to provide the medical students of Queen's College, Belfast, with a Summer Session for dissection?

MR. JACKSON: The President of the Queen's College, Belfast, reports that no application for a Summer Session in anatomy has been made to the authorities of the College, nor, in his opinion, is such a Session necessary.

MR. SEXTON: If the application is made will it be considered?

MR. JACKSON: I do not know that he has any power to consider it. I have told the hon. Member that in his opinion such Session is not necessary.

DR. TANNER: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that Summer Sessions are quite ordinary?

MR. JACKSON: Yes, Sir; but unnecessary, I understand.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Arising out of this question I wish to ask your ruling on a point of Order. Two or three days ago I handed a question to the Clerk at the Table addressed to the Chief Secretary, asking him why the authorities of Queen's College, Cork, interfered with the students and refused to allow them to take part in some athletic sports under the rules of the Gaelic Athletic Association, whilst a few days afterwards they were allowed to take part in a football match under Rugby rules. I was informed that the question was not permissible because this House has nothing to do with Queen's College—

MR. SPEAKER: I recollect the question perfectly. I struck it out because I thought it was too utterly trivial to submit to the attention of the House.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Well, Sir, I shall put the question on the first opportunity.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

THE CASE OF THOMAS BLACK.

MR. JORDAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been directed to a petition forwarded to Lord Wolseley, and his lordship's reply on the 15th October, 1890, that it had been forwarded to the proper quarter, from an old soldier named Thomas Black, of the 21st Regiment, Royal North British Fusiliers, No. 3,645, who served in the Crimean campaign and engaged in four general battles there, and was one of three who brought Captain Nolan's horse, with the dead officer thereon, into the camp after the historic Charge of the Six Hundred, and who, having been frost-bitten and paralysed before Sebastopol, was discharged from Chatham at sixpence per day pension for one and a half years, at the expiry of which he understood it to be renewed during life; but, on threat of losing his pension, was compelled to re-enter the Service, was drafted to India, and served in the Mutiny, and was then discharged without pension; whether he is aware that Black is now disabled, and an inmate in the Enniskillen Workhouse, County Fermanagh; and whether, taking all the circumstances into consideration, the Department will make some provision for this old soldier?

MR. E. STANHOPE: As I stated last year, in reply to a question by the hon. Member for South Donegal, there are special difficulties in the case of Thomas Black. He served in the Crimea for seven months only, and was discharged as unfit for service with a pension of sixpence a day pending recovery. In July, 1857, his health was so well restored that he enlisted in the Royal Artillery, denying altogether his former service. After eleven years' service he was discharged with a bad character.

RAILWAY BRAKES AND RAILWAY ACCIDENTS.

MR. J. E. ELLIS (Nottingham, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade when the following will be distributed—namely, Return by the Railway Companies to the Board of Trade, in pursuance of "The Railway Returns (Continuous Brakes) Act, 1878," for the year ending 31st December, 1891, and General Report to the Board of Trade upon Accidents during the year 1891?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The Brakes Return is in the hands of the printer. The General Report to the Board of Trade on Accidents cannot be presented until later in the year, because the figures relating to passenger journeys cannot be prepared before the end of June, and, if the Report were presented now, these figures would have to be estimated, or the comparisons (which are useful) would have to be omitted.

GOLD MINES IN THE UNITED KINGDOM.

MR. PRITCHARD MORGAN: I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer what number of tons of ore have been treated at the Morgan and Clonga Gold Mines respectively, from the time they last commenced work up to the present time; what is the total value of gold which has been extracted from the ore of such mines respectively; are any other mines in the United Kingdom, other than those referred to, producing gold; how many licences and leases exist at the present time for working gold and silver in the United Kingdom besides the two referred to;

how many of them are at work; and can any reason be ascribed why they are not all at work?

MR. GOSCHEN: For answers to the first and second questions I would refer the hon. Member to the Reports of the Directors of the two mines. As regards the third, fourth, and fifth questions, I must ask for longer notice. The sixth question is too controversial to be answered across the Table of the House.

SEARCHING PEOPLE IN THE STREETS.

MR. MAC NEILL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the Royal Irish Constabulary accost persons coming out of public-houses on Sundays who are known to be the friends and relations of the owners of public houses, and insist on putting such persons to the indignity of being searched in the public streets on suspicion of having bottles of drink concealed in their clothes; and whether he will give directions to the police to refrain from a course which may lead to a breach of the peace?

MR. JACKSON: The hon. Member puts the question in such general terms that I cannot undertake to answer it. If he is aware of and will specify any particular case, I shall make the necessary inquiries.

MR. MAC NEILL: Will the right hon. Gentleman permit me to give him information?

MR. JACKSON: If the hon. Member will give me any information either confidentially or otherwise, I shall be obliged.

MR. MAC NEILL: I will treat you confidentially.

LAND PURCHASE IN IRELAND.

SIR T. ESMONDE (Dublin Co., S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General for Ireland whether, in the case of the death of a tenant purchaser under the recent Land Purchase Acts, intestate, the land passes to the eldest son; and whether Succession Duty is claimed in all cases of administration of probate on the deaths of the new proprietors created under those Acts?

MR. MADDEN: A tenant who purchases the freehold of his holding under the Land Purchase Acts becomes subject to the ordinary law as regards Death Duties and descent on intestacy. From the latter, however, he is relieved as soon as his ownership is registered under the Local Registration of Title Acts of last year, which assimilates the law of succession to freeholds to that of chattel interests in land in the case of registered tenant purchasers.

GRATUITIES TO WORKMEN ON DISMISSAL FROM GOVERNMENT FACTORIES.

MR. HOZIER (Lanarkshire, S.): On behalf of Mr. FORREST FULTON I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether he has considered Section 4 of "The Superannuation Act, 1887," which enables the Treasury to give to workmen discharged on reduction a gratuity after seven years' service; and whether he can hold out any hope that the present practice of confining such gratuities only to men of twelve years' service will be modified in favour of the workmen recently discharged on reduction from Enfield and the Royal Arsenal at Woolwich?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: The clause in the Superannuation Act to which reference is made is clearly permissive in its character, and it rests with the Treasury to lay down the conditions under which any such gratuities may be granted. A rule was accordingly laid down under which the cases of men under twelve years' service were not sent forward. I propose, however, in future to submit to the Treasury to be decided upon their merits all the cases of men of not less than seven years' service who leave the Ordnance Factories under the conditions mentioned in the Act, and this will apply to all men who have recently been discharged on reduction.

ARMY REGULATIONS.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War whether Colonel Anley, of the 69th Foot, has had his command extended on the ground that "the regiment is in a good state of discipline"; whether there is any precedent for extension of command on such a ground; and will he explain why Colonel Keagh, of the 12th Foot, who was also complimented on the same ground as Colonel Anley, had not his command extended in like manner?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I am sure the hon. Member will see that this is not a matter which can properly be discussed in Parliament. I may, however, state that Colonel Keagh was ineligible for continuance in his command on account of age.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Will the right hon. Gentleman be good enough to furnish me with any reference to Regulations or General Orders which recognise as a ground for extending a command that a regiment is in a good state of discipline, and would not a recognition of a principle of that kind debar subordinate officers from promotion?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: I must ask for notice of that question.

MR. A. O'CONNOR: Was there any special reason for consideration in the case to which I have referred?

*MR. E. STANHOPE: No, there was not.

THE TRIAL OF DEEMING.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in the event of the man Deeming, alias Williams, charged with the murder of his wife at Perth, Western Australia, being found guilty there of the capital offence, he could be then taken to England and tried for the Rainhill murders, with which his name has been associated; is there any precedent; and whether he can cite a case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir R. WEBSTER, Isle of Wight): I may say that no steps can be taken pending the proceedings in Australia, but in the event of those proceedings resulting in Deeming's discharge, there is power by the Act of Parliament to bring him for trial in this country.

THE TRUCK ACTS.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether, in the absence of any written agreement, an employer has any legal right to deduct from his workpeople the rent of the houses in which they live; and whether such deduction is not a violation of the Truck Acts? I may be allowed to say that I am not responsible for the appearance of this question on the Paper, because the Attorney General answered it on Tuesday. The hon. Gentleman has, however, asked me to repeat it, and that is why the question appears on the Paper.

SIR R. WEBSTER: After I answered the question the other day, I looked at the last word of the section, and I think there is some doubt whether or not, in the absence of any written agreement, an employer has any legal right to deduct from his workpeople the rent of the houses in which they live. It is by no means clear; but my own opinion at present is that there is a doubt on the subject.

MR. CREMER: I should like to ask on whose authority this question was put down?

MR. SPEAKER: It was obviously carried over from a former day and put down under a misapprehension of the hon. Gentleman's wishes.

INHABITED HOUSE DUTY.

SIR J. M'KENNA (Monaghan, S.): I beg to ask the Attorney General whether an Irish Member of Parliament, who has his usual place of residence in Ireland, and a residence in London only in respect to his Parliamentary duties, is liable to the payment of Inhabited House Duty in respect to such last-mentioned residence; and if there are any, and what, exemptions from such payments; and, if so, under what law or authority?

SIR R. WEBSTER: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that Members of Parliament are not exempted under the circumstances mentioned from the payment of Inhabited House Duty, if, in fact, they are in occupation of a house liable to such payment.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION.

MR. KNOX (Cavan, W.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can now say whether he will arrange for the publication of the statistics collected by the Irish Land Commission as to prices, with abstracts and averages?

MR. JACKSON: I have asked the Land Commission to prepare a summary of the abstracts for presentation to the House.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland when a Sub-Commission under the Land Acts will sit at Lisburn; and whether he is aware that arrangements for purchase are going forward in the neighbourhood, and that the fixing of judicial rents in such cases is a matter of urgent and pressing importance?

MR. JACKSON: The Irish Land Commissioners report that the date of the next Sub-Commission sitting for Lisburn Union has not yet been fixed, but that it will probably be held when the cases listed for the 2nd May next from the Unions of Downpatrick and Newtownards have been disposed of.

THE CATHOLIC CLERGY AND POOR LAW ELECTIONS.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL (Tyrone, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that, on the recent occasion of the Poor Law Election for the Electoral Division of Annaduff, Carrick-on-Shannon Union, a Roman Catholic clergyman followed the police constable who left the voting papers from house to house, and superintended the filling up of the papers, and whether such action is legal?

MR. JACKSON: The Local Government Board report that they have no knowledge of the circumstances alleged in the question.

ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. HAYDEN (Leitrim, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether, in asking for presentments for extra police for the various counties at the forthcoming Assizes, he will make allowance for the several hundred men which he has admitted the country is now short of the free quota?

MR. JACKSON: I have had the opportunity of making further inquiries on the subject of the allocation of the Royal Irish Constabulary to counties, and I find that wherever it becomes necessary to appoint an extra force to a county, the practice is to forthwith fill up any vacancies in the free quota of that county, so as to give it its full normal establishment before it becomes liable to the charge for an extra force.

RAILWAY TUNNELS.

MR. DUNCAN (Barrow-in-Furness): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he would be willing to cause a Return to be made showing the number of tunnels on the lines of the several Railway Companies in the United Kingdom exceeding the length of 20 yards, in which no refuge in the wall of the arch or other contrivance is provided for the protection of men working in the tunnels from the danger of passing trains?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not think that the Return referred to would afford any useful information. It has been a requirement of the Board of Trade for 30 years that every tunnel on new lines submitted for inspection should be provided with refuges such as the hon. Member mentions. If the hon. Member has in his mind any special railway or tunnel about which he desires information, I shall be happy to procure it for him.

MAIL SERVICES.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will assent to the Motion for a Return as to mail services which stands on to-day's Paper?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): There is no correspondence which could with advantage to the public service be laid on the Table in the form of a Return.

ANNUAL LEAVE IN THE CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT.

MR. KELLY (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that, with respect to annual leave, the second division clerks of ten years' service and upwards in the Customs Department stand at a considerable disadvantage as compared with others of the same class in other public departments, with the exception of those in the Treasury and the Charity Commission; and whether there is any reason why a uniformity of practice in this matter should not prevail throughout the whole Civil Service.

Mr. Jackson

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No, Sir; I am not aware of the alleged disadvantage. The second division clerks of the Customs Department who have more than ten years' service enjoy the maximum annual leave allowed by the Order in Council of the 21st March, 1890. Departments have no power to vary the terms of that Order.

THE MAWDDWY RAILWAY COMPANY.

MR. T. E. ELLIS (Merionethshire): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that the Mawddwy Railway Company has issued a notice to suspend the whole traffic for an indefinite time, on the allegation that extensive repairs are required; whether he is aware that this suspension will cause the stoppage of four slate quarries, and throw a considerable number of men out of employment; and whether he will inquire whether the repairs are such as to necessitate this serious loss to the locality?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have been in communication with the Railway Company since notice of the hon. Member's question has appeared. I am informed that the stoppage is brought about in consequence of the unsafe condition of the Cemmes River bridge, that the Company have no funds out of which to pay for the necessary repairs, and that the only way of meeting the expenditure is by loan, to be repaid by a special rate of 1s. 3d. a ton. It is not obligatory on traders to agree to such special rate, nor is it obligatory on the Company to continue to work the line.

PENSIONS OF RURAL POSTMEN.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General whether there is a pension scale for rural postmen in Ireland; what is the age, number of years' service, and pension on retirement; and what pension is a man entitled to who has given 35 years' service, and whose wages are now 17s. per week?

*SIR J. FERGUSSON: Rural postmen, like other Civil Servants, come under the provisions of the Superannuation Act, 1859. Except in case of infirmity, mental or bodily, no one can be pensioned under the age of 60. In that case the number of years' service regulates the pension. For 35 years' service at 17s. a week it would be £25 17s. 0d., being one-sixtieth of his pay for each year of service.

IRISH LANDED PROPRIETORS.

MR. J. MORLEY (Newcastle-upon-Tyne): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he will lay upon the Table a Return of the number of landed proprietors in Ireland owning more than 100 acres, classified according to residence, and showing the extent and value of the property held by each class, in the same form as the Return ordered and printed in 1872?

MR. JACKSON: I have no objection to give the Return which the right hon. Gentleman asks for. I think it will probably take some time to prepare, and I suppose it will follow the precise form of the Return ordered and printed in 1872.

THE COLOUR VISION COMMITTEE.

SIR H. ROSCOE (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state when the Report of the Colour Vision Committee, appointed at his request by the Royal Society, will be laid upon the Table of the House?

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have communicated with the Chairman of the Colour Vision Committee to which the hon. Member refers, and I understand that he expects that the Committee will report to the Royal Society at the end of the present month. So soon as the Report reaches me, I shall lose no time in laying it upon the Table of the House.

THE MERCHANT SHIPPING AMENDMENT BILL.

COLONEL HILL (Bristol, S.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether it has been correctly reported that upon the occasion of a recent deputation to him respecting the Merchant Shipping Amendment Bill, 1892, an assertion was made that there was no doubt in "many cases, as had been proved in many Commissions and Committees," the food supplied in certain merchant vessels was of the "worst possible description"; and whether this statement is correct; and, if so, whether he will give the dates of the many Commissions and Committees?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I believe the assertion quoted in my hon. Friend's question was made at the deputation referred to, but, as I did not make it myself, I cannot say what Commissions and Committees were referred to. Returns on the subject of the health of the crews were presented to the House in 1876, 1879, and 1883. Since then there has been a great decrease in the number of outbreaks of scurvy, the number reported diminishing from 99 in 1881 to 13 in 1891. I am glad also to add that these outbreaks have diminished in severity as well as in number.

"COUNTS OUT" ON TUESDAYS AND FRIDAYS.

Mr. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the "Counts Out" which frequently take place on Tuesdays and Fridays when Private Members' Motions are down for discussion, he will propose to alter the Standing Orders affecting those days, so that Private Members' Bills may take precedence of Notices of Motions on Tuesdays, and so that on Fridays more than one Motion can be brought forward, and a division taken on each?

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR: Without expressing any opinion on the advantage or disadvantage likely to arise from the suggested alteration of the Rules, I do not think this is a convenient moment for proposing an alteration in the Standing Orders of the House.

THE CAVAN UNION.

Mr. KNOX: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now say what decision has been arrived at in the matter of the proposal to indemnify the Cavan Union against the loss in the case of "Ryan v.

Colonel Hill

the Union," caused by the action of the Government Inspector?

SIR JOHN GORST: No decision has yet been arrived at.

THE CHICAGO EXHIBITION.

SIR T. ESMONDE: I beg to ask the Attorney General when he will be in a position to state whether the increased grant for the Chicago Exhibition has been sanctioned; and, in that event, what portion of it will be devoted to Ireland? The hon. Baronet also asked the Attorney General if he will state whether inquiries have been made in Ireland with a view to obtaining evidence of the desire of Irish exhibitors to be separately represented at the Chicago Exhibition; and, if so, what has been the result of these inquiries; and if the Government will consent to hand over Ireland's proportion of the grant allowed for the expenses of the Chicago Exhibition Commission to a committee of Irishmen, who will be accepted by the Irish public as representative of Irish industry, and who will be empowered to take whatever steps may be necessary for the separate representation of Irish industry at the World's Fair?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I am not yet in a position to state whether an increased grant has been sanctioned for the Chicago Exhibition. I have already informed the hon. Baronet that the Commission are consulting Irish exhibitors as to the best method of dealing with their exhibits at the Exhibition. The Commission have no power, and certainly would not be entitled, to hand over any portion of the grant to a committee, as suggested by the hon. Baronet's last question.

IRISH FISHING BOATS.

DR. TANNER: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether it is a fact, as announced by the Rev. Mr. Green, Fishery Commissioner, in his recent communication to the Congested Districts Board, "that two fishing boats have been built in the Isle of Man for the Board"; whether these boats could have been as well built for the Board at Passage Docks, Carrigaloe, Cork Harbour, or at Arklow; whether he is aware that several fishing boats recently built at the two first-mentioned places, assisted by public subscription raised in Cork, are now considered the fastest, most handy, and best sea-going fishing smacks in the Kinsale fishing fleet, which numbers hundreds, including Manx, Cornish, and French vessels; and whether, if more fishing vessels are to be built for the Board, a further attempt will be made to encourage Irish industry by employing the Cork Harbour and Arklow shipwrights, to relieve Irish wants by Irish labour?

MR. JACKSON: The two fishing boats referred to were built not for the Congested Districts Board, but for Miss Mansfield. They were obtained as a special type for Connemara unskilled crews. When others of this type are required the Inspector is of opinion that it would be possible to obtain them not only in Cork and Arklow, but also in the County Galway.

MARRIAGES OF NONCONFORMISTS.

MR. LEGH (Lancashire, S.W., Newton): I beg to ask the Attorney General if there is any probability of his introducing a Bill dealing with the attendance of Registrars at the marriages of Nonconformists?

SIR R. WEBSTER: I do not propose to deal with this subject during the present Session. I should be glad if I could see my way to deal with the matter and simplify the law on the subject.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON MINING ROYALTIES.

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can give any information as to when the Royal Commission on Mining Royalties expect to issue their Report?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have inquired into this matter, and I learn from the Secretary to the Commission that he cannot fix any date for certain upon which they expect to issue their Report; but it is not likely to be issued before July.

MR. PAULTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether the Commission will take any further evidence?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not been able to make inquiries on that subject, but I shall be very glad to do so if the hon. Gentleman desires it.

DEVONPORT DOCKYARD.

MR. CONYBEARE: I wish to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty a question of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether it is a fact that the Civil Adviser of the Devonport Dockyard, Mr. Wildish, has issued a notice or circular, dated 23rd March, which states—

“23rd March, 1892.

Please arrange that in future no stoppage of machinery for cleaning takes place on Saturday, the ordinary work of the yard going on till bell-ringing as on other days. Should experience show that this is prejudicial to the Service in any way, a Report is to be forwarded. This will, of course, not relieve the officers and men of responsibility for keeping the machinery thoroughly effective. Any necessary cleaning, &c., should be done from time to time as required.”

I wish to ask him whether it is not a fact that the rule that has hitherto been in force has been that all employees should have half an hour or three-quarters of an hour for the purpose of carrying out the cleaning, and that the machinery should be stopped a given time for that purpose; whether such rule is not obligatory under the provisions of the Factory Acts, which provide that no machinery shall be cleaned whilst working; and whether, if it is found that the circular in question is a breach of the Factory Acts, it will be at once withdrawn?

LORD G. HAMILTON: The rule in question is one which the Admiralty Superintendent had power to issue, and, so far as I know, it does not contravene any portion of the Factory Acts, and, therefore, I do not propose to interfere in the matter.

MR. CONYBEARE: Will the noble Lord state whether he will cause inquiry to be made on the point whether it is a breach of the Factory Acts, and whether I am to understand that Her Majesty's Dockyard authorities are above the Factory Acts themselves?

[No reply was given.]

THE PRIVATE BILL PROCEDURE (SCOTLAND) BILL.

MR. J. C. BOLTON (Stirling): May I ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state whether the Second Reading of the Private Bill Procedure (Scotland) Bill will be taken before or after Easter?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I see no prospect of its being taken before Easter.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

RAILWAY SERVANTS (HOURS OF LABOUR)—BREACH OF PRIVILEGE.

Order read, for the attendance of Mr. John William Maclure, a Member of this House, and of Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher.

*MR. SPEAKER: Is it your pleasure that these gentlemen be called in? I have to ask, first, whether the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Stretford Division of South East Lancashire is in his place?

MR. JOHN WILLIAM MACLURE rose in his place at the Front Bench below the Gangway on the Ministerial side of the House amidst cries of "Order, order!" bowed to the Chair, and remained standing.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Will the Serjeant-at-Arms see that Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher do appear at the Bar.

The Bar being then drawn, the Serjeant-at-Arms escorted thereto the three gentlemen named, who made their obeisance to the Chair.

*(5.24.) MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Mr. John William Maclure, you have been ordered to attend in your place, and you, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, have been summoned to appear at the Bar of this House in consequence of a Special Report made by a Committee of this House. That Committee was appointed to inquire into the hours of labour of railway servants, and in the course of their inquiry it came to their knowledge that allegations were made that certain persons had been reduced or dismissed from the service of the Company in consequence of the evidence they had given before the Committee. The other cases were dismissed by the Committee, after inquiry, as being unfounded; but in the case of one person, John Hood, the Committee found that he was dismissed by the Company mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence given by him before the Committee. You, Mr. John Conacher, laid the evidence (so the Committee have found) before the Directors of the Company, and you, the Directors of the Company who are now present (so the Committee have found), when John Hood asked for a re-hearing of the case, called him to account, and you censured him for the evidence which he gave before the Committee, in a manner calculated to deter other railway servants from giving evidence before a Committee of this House. I believe it is the wish of the House to hear anything that any of you may now say in answer to these findings of the Committee.

(5.25.) MR. JOHN WILLIAM MACLURE (Lancashire, S.E., Stretford): Mr. Speaker, Sir, on behalf of my friends as well as myself, I wish to say that you were good enough on Tuesday, in answer to the hon. Member for West Newington (Mr. Radcliffe Cooke), to say that the House would like to hear us in order that we might advance anything in excuse or mitigation of the action which is charged against us by the Select Committee. I am reading your own words, Mr. Speaker. Availing myself of the indulgence of the House, I beg to state that in taking the course referred to we acted entirely in what we believed to be the discharge of our duties as Trustees of the Company and for the general interests of the public. We had certainly not at any time the slightest intention of deterring any railway servants from giving evidence before your Committee, and should we, by the course we adopted, have unintentionally infringed any Rules or Privileges of this House, we ask this honourable House to accept the fullest expression of our unqualified regret. I may say, in addition to that, that I very much regret that I had not the privilege of giving my evidence before the Committee myself. I had applied to give my evidence, and I hope the House will accept our apology: it is tendered to the House in the fullest manner.

*MR. SPEAKER: Has any other gentleman anything to say to the House?

(5.26.) MR. JAMES FREDERICK BUCKLEY: Mr. Speaker, I beg to say that I fully concur in what has fallen from my colleague the hon. Member for the Stretford Division of South East Lancashire. I thank you.

*MR. SPEAKER: You will now withdraw from the Bar.

MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): Mr. Speaker, is it competent for me to ask one question before these gentlemen withdraw—a question which, if necessary, may be put to them by you from the Chair—whether they would be disposed to re-instate the man whom they dismissed?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That is quite outside the present subject which the House has to consider. You will now, gentlemen, withdraw from the Bar.

The gentlemen at the Bar then withdrew. Mr. Maclure also left the House.

MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): May I ask a question?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Sir M. Hicks Beach.

*(5.27.) THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): In the observations I shall address to the House I shall endeavour to confine myself within what appear to me to be the necessary limits of the matter which has come before us to-day. It is undoubtedly an important question of the breach of the Privileges of this House, and I am sure the House will approach it in a spirit of judicial gravity; not desiring to deal vindictively with those who have offended against its Privileges; but determined, on the other hand, to maintain the Privileges which are essential not only in the interests of this House, but in the interests of the whole community. Now, Sir, the pith of the Report of the Committee is to be found, as you have stated to the House, in two sentences of the same paragraph. These sentences differ widely in their purport. The first sentence is as follows:—

“That John Hood was dismissed from the service of the Cambrian Railway Company mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence given by him before the Select Committee on the Hours of Labour of Railway Servants.”

Sir, I believe it has been amply established by a succession of long-continued precedents that any molestation, threats, or legal proceedings against any witness examined before this House, or before any Committee of this House, in consequence of the evidence given by him, is a distinct breach of our Privileges; and I need hardly say that the dismissal of a servant must necessarily be included in the term “molestation.” But I wish to call the attention of the House to a matter which is not solely a verbal difference. I have said it is an undoubted breach of the Privileges of this House that a witness should be injured in consequence of his evidence. But the Committee have not reported that this has occurred. The Committee have reported that this man was dismissed, not in consequence of his evidence, but mainly in consequence of charges arising out of the evidence given by him; and any hon. Member who looks carefully through the proceedings of the Committee and through the evidence that has been reported to the House will see that this is not a verbal difference alone. I would speak on this subject with great diffidence. There are hon. and right hon. Gentlemen in this House far better qualified than I am to express a view as to what is or what is not a breach of Privilege. But I would venture to express some doubt whether the action of this House in this matter could safely be founded on the dismissal of a witness in consequence of charges arising out of his evidence. The point is one which materially affects this matter. The hon. Member for Stretford and the persons who have just appeared at the Bar have stated to this House that, in dismissing John Hood, they acted, in their belief, as trustees for their shareholders, and in the interest of the public. Now, Sir, a great deal of evidence, as the House is aware, was given before the Committee by the Chairman and by the Manager of the Company in support of the proposition that Hood's dismissal was necessary in the interests of the Company and of the public, because inquiries which were made as the result of his evidence had disclosed conduct on his part which proved him to be an unworthy servant. Perhaps I may say in passing, as Chairman of the Committee, that if we had understood that the hon. Member for Stretford really desired to have been examined, we should certainly have given him the opportunity. However, much evidence, as I have said, was given on that point. Now, the Committee considered that it was their duty to report to the House what had occurred in this matter with respect to the dismissal of this person, but they did not conceive it to be their duty to decide whether that dismissal could be excused or justified by any argument such as was addressed to them in evidence, and as has just now been addressed to the House; but they did make this very significant addition to their Report. They said they had not "Deemed it to be part of their duty to express any opinion as to how far the conduct of the said John Hood, and the irregularities disclosed by his evidence, as well as the character of his evidence, were calculated properly to forfeit the confidence of the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company."

Now, that pointedly called the attention of this House, as judges of this case, to this aspect of the question. I do not propose to ask the House to decide whether or not John Hood was a trustworthy servant of the Cambrian Railway Company. I will not, unless I am forced, express any opinion of my own upon that point, but this I will venture to say—that it is my strong belief that, in dismissing John Hood, the Directors of the Cambrian Company honestly and bonâ fide believed that he was not a trustworthy servant of the Company. Sir, if this House is to censure the Directors of a railway for dismissing a servant in the responsible position of a station master, who, in their opinion, is not a trustworthy servant, in my humble judgment, this House would be simply assuming the responsibility for the conduct of the affairs of that railway. Now I turn, Sir, to the second part, and in my view by far the most important part, of the Report of the Select Committee. The Select Committee reported, in the second place, that the persons who have appeared at the Bar, and the hon. Member for Stretford, called John Hood to account and censured him for the evidence he gave before the Committee in a manner calculated to deter other railway servants from giving evidence before the Committee. Sir, there can be no question that this is a distinct breach of the Privileges of this House. The fact is undoubted, and I would submit that the question for the House to decide with regard to it is really only how it should be dealt with. Now, let me allude to what has been said to the House by the hon. Member for Stretford on his own behalf and on behalf of the persons who have appeared at the Bar. I think it will not be denied that they have made the fullest and most ample apology for what they have done that could have been made by any persons placed in such circumstances. What have they said? They have, in the first place, disclaimed any intention to deter any railway servant from giving any evidence before the Committee. Well, Sir, I should like to add that as a matter of fact no railway servant will be so deterred, for this simple reason, that the Committee consider that they have sufficient evidence of this kind—"Oh!"—before them upon which to base their Report, and do not intend to call any further evidence either from the Railway Companies or their employees on the main question referred to them; and further, Sir, after the way in which that observation has been met, I think it is only just that I, as Chairman of the Committee, should say that the Railway Companies generally ought not to be included in any condemnation that may be passed on the action of the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company. More than 30 railway servants last year were called before this Committee. The great majority of them gave evidence directly contrary to the opinions and feelings of the Directors and Managers of the Railways on which they were employed. Scores of railway servants very properly gave information to the secretaries of their societies as to the long hours they work, and other matters connected with their employment. All these matters were given in evidence by the secretaries of those societies, and were subsequently sifted and replied to by the Directors or Managers of the different Railway Companies. Yet, Sir, in only four out of all these cases has there been the slightest allegation of any improper action on the part of Railway Directors or Managers towards the servants who have given evidence before this Committee, and in only one case—that of John Hood—has any improper action been proved. I do not say this as bearing on this particular case, but I think it right to give that testimony with regard to the conduct of the Railway Companies generally. Now, what have the hon. Member for Stretford and the persons who have appeared at the Bar added to the disclaimer I have already quoted? They have expressed their unqualified regret for having unintentionally infringed any of the Rules or Privileges of this House. I repeat, Sir, that I do not think that a more complete apology could be offered to this House. But, Sir, I am not suggesting to the House that on the ground of this disclaimer or on the ground of this apology the breach of our Privileges which has been committed should be passed over without further notice. I do feel that we are bound, and especially in a case of this kind, to maintain this important Privilege for the benefit of the country. And why do I say especially in a case of this kind? The evidence in this particular inquiry, Sir, is closed; but it may be the pioneer of many similar inquiries into the relations between employers and employed in other great industries of the country; and it is obviously essential to the proper conduct of any such inquiries that those who are employed should be satisfied that the rights and Privileges of this House will be maintained with respect to any evidence they may give. Therefore, Sir, it appears to me that while, for the reasons I have ventured to place before the House, this is not a case for punishment, yet it is a case requiring the notice of the House in such a way as shall be a warning for the future; and, therefore, Sir, I conclude by proposing the Resolution which I will now read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That this House, while recognising that Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have disclaimed any intention to deter any railway servant from giving evidence before its Committee, and have expressed their unqualified regret for having unintentionally infringed any of its Rules and Privileges, is of opinion that the said Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House, in their action towards John Hood, and that they be called in and admonished by Mr. Speaker for the breach of Privilege that they have committed."—(Sir Michael Hicks Beach.)

(5.43.) MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I wish to move an Amendment. I think the House has heard, and that the country will read, with profound dissatisfaction the speech which the right hon. Gentleman has just delivered, and that both will universally condemn the Motion with which his speech was concluded. What, Mr. Speaker, are the facts of the case? The right hon. Gentleman said that the hon. Member for Stretford and his colleagues have made a full and ample apology. I listened with great care and attention to what the hon. Member for Stretford said, and although I do not wish to say anything unkind of the hon. Gentleman, I must say that in my opinion his speech, instead of being one of regret, was an aggravation of the offence which has been committed. ("Oh, oh!") Hon. Members should hear me before pronouncing judgment. What did the speech of the Directors amount to? It amounted to this—that they committed the offence, that they mean to persevere in the offence, and that they intend to maintain the punishment which they have inflicted upon this man because of his evidence and the talk about the charges arising out of it—that while they intend to maintain the punishment of this man, they hope to escape from their own punishment by the contemptible lip service of an apology in words. The right hon. Gentleman has told us what the Directors have said. We want to know what they are going to do. Now the right hon. Gentleman showed the necessity of preserving the Privilege of the House in such a matter as this, but he should have gone a good deal further. What is this House but a Grand Court of Appeal to the nation to which every afflicted man in the country should have the right of full and unrestrained appeal? And how can that full and unrestrained right of appeal be secured if every person gives his evidence with the halter of dismissal about his neck? The right hon. Gentleman has disclaimed any intention on the part of the Directors to interfere with the Privileges of the House; but it is to acts that we must look and not to words. A disclaimer on their part, and a perseverance in the offence is a mere empty insult to this House. It is clear that the hon. Member for Stretford and his fellow Directors have no intention to re-instate this man. The right hon. Gentleman says that workmen must be protected in giving evidence before Committees of this House. What protection are they going to get? The successors and colleagues of John Hood are reminded that if they give evidence the Directors will get a mere verbal condemnation and remonstrance from this House; but that John Hood will be left to starve. So that the whole point comes to this: that if the Directors get a formal and academic condemnation from this House they are at liberty to dismiss any man who gives evidence before any Committee of this House. Now, I think the House has heard the right hon. Gentleman's statement with dissatisfaction, and I propose to add words to the original Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

"At the end of the Question, to add the words 'and this House will not deem that the said Directors and Manager of the Cambrian

Mr. T. P. O'Connor

Railway have purged their contempt until they have re-instated John Hood in the position which he occupied before giving his evidence before this House, or otherwise compensated him."—(Mr. T. P. O'Connor.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

(5.52.) MR. W. S. B. McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I desire to move the substitution of the word "censure" for "admonish" in the original Motion, and if it is possible I think it should come before the Amendment which has been moved by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool.

(5.54.) SIR G. TREVELYAN (Glasgow, Bridgeton): The proposition which the right hon. Gentleman has laid before the House is one which, if the House were to pass it unanimously, would at any rate vindicate the dignity of the House, and would clearly express its opinion with regard to these transactions; but, if the House will allow me, I will say a few words, with great respect, as to the manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed that Resolution. I say with great respect, because the Committee has been presided over by the right hon. Gentleman with the greatest industry, with the greatest courtesy, and with the greatest fairness. I am bound, however, to say that I do not think the speech in which he introduced this Motion was adequate to the occasion—I am speaking now entirely of the matter, because the right hon. Gentleman's speeches are always in every way adequate both in manner and ability. Right hon. and hon. Members who listened to that speech would almost wonder why they were to pronounce a censure upon the Directors. Now, Sir, the right hon. Gentleman insisted very much on the first part of the Resolution—with regard to the dismissal of Mr. Hood from causes arising out of the evidence, and I differ from him in the conclusions which he drew. I also think that he did not insist enough on the last part—as to the censure which was directed against Mr. John Hood by the Directors. I will detain the House for only a short time by stating the plain story of the case from the outset. The right hon. Gentleman was quite correct in saying that the Cambrian Railway stands in a very different position to any other railway, and that the Cambrian Directors are in a different position to that of any other Railway Directors in the Kingdom; but most serious and gross revelations came to light with regard to the conduct of the Cambrian Railway Company in arranging the business hours of their men; and I would inform hon. Members, without making wearisome quotations from the evidence, that it was proved that for years several of their men had worked 36 hours at a stretch in the arduous business of signalling. That was not all—

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY (Sussex, East Grinstead): Mr. Speaker, I rise to Order. I wish to ask you whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in anticipating the Report of the Committee as to the hours of labour, which they were not able to present?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman is in Order, so far as it bears on the case, in calling attention to anything that was placed before the Committee. The right hon. Gentleman is perfectly in Order in referring to it up to the day on which this gentleman was dismissed from his service.

MR. A. E. GATHORNE-HARDY: With great respect, Mr. Speaker, I rise again, to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman is in Order in anticipating the decision of the Committee with regard to the question of the hours of labour in the case of the Cambrian or any other railway?

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman would not be in Order in anticipating the ultimate decision of the Committee as to the question of the hours of labour. That is not the Question before the House.

SIR G. TREVELYAN: I shall confine myself strictly to matters which have already been reported to the House. Among other servants who were offered work was a young man of the name of Humphreys, and one of the gentlemen who was lately at the Bar of this House, Mr. Conacher, admits that Humphreys was worked regularly from 5.50 a.m. to 10 p.m. daily. Now this is of the essence of the whole question. These extreme hours were brought to the notice of the Committee by a person of the name of Bather. This person is charged by the Directors with being hostile to them for certain reasons of his own; and the point I now wish to put before the House is that it was on account of this man's action, or supposed connection with Mr. Hood, that the gentleman in the position of Chairman of the Company got a feeling about him which he could not suppress when giving evidence before the Committee, and I believe it was one of the main reasons which led to his dismissal. Now I will read to the House an extract from the evidence of Mr. Buckley, the Chairman of the Company himself. The Chairman of the Committee asked Mr. Buckley (page 65)—

“Did you dismiss Mr. Hood solely on account of the pay-sheet matter, coupled with other matters of which you have told the Committee?”—“Yes, coupled with another matter, to which I do not desire to attach too much importance. It was not at all to be expected from a trusted servant of the Company. This man is not in the position of an ordinary servant or workman. He is an agent who has to take charge of and regulate the discipline amongst a number of men at his station. Therefore we looked upon him as our agent, and as being a person of trust. Now, I do not think that this letter which I have in my hand should have been written by a man in whom we put implicit confidence; for this reason—that it showed that he had neglected to report to his Directors the advances which had been made to him by a man named Bather, who gave evidence here, and who was notoriously an enemy of the Directors, because they had refused to give him a free pass over their line.”

Mr. Hood received a letter from Mr. Bather asking him about Humphreys, that is the young man who worked from 5.50 in the morning until 10 o'clock at night. Mr. Hood does not forward that letter, as he ought to have done, to his superiors; he says, “I threw it away, as I did not want to have anything to do with the matter.” There is the letter, and I will read it to the House.

“June 3, 1891.—Memorandum from Montgomery Station to J. Conacher, Esq., Euston Hotel, London. James Humphreys, late porter, Ellesmere. I return the statement to you with my remarks. Mr. Bather wrote to me a note asking me to give him information about the accident, but I did not reply to it, neither have I spoken to him about it. I threw the note away, as I did not want to have anything to do with the matter. I have thought the matter very carefully over and tried my best to remember in order to give as correct information as I could to enable you to meet the case."

Now, Sir, what does all this come to? Here are hours of labour of the most remarkable sort worked by railway men in the employment of a certain Company. The Committee which the House of Commons appointed to inquire into the long hours of railway servants would not have heard of the long hours worked upon this railway but for the fact that Mr. Bather, who lives on the spot, got up the case. I do not enter upon the question as to whether he had any quarrel with the Company, but we all know that we should not have known of these long hours being worked if Mr. Bather had not got up the case of these men and got several of them to give evidence. That is what Mr. Bather's enmity to the Company consists of. For my own part I am not sure it was enmity, for the Directors say that if they had only known that these long hours were being worked they would have put a stop to them, and I think, therefore, that Mr. Bather was not in this matter an enemy of the Company. Then you have a poor stationmaster, earning £70 a year, a man who by education is hardly above a working man, and because this man gets a letter from Bather and does not at once send it to his superiors, in the eyes of the Chairman of the Company he is disloyal, and it is alleged as a grave reason for dismissing him. Now, Sir, I say if this House wishes its Committees to arrive at any important evidence with regard to anything that concerns the working man it can only arrive at it by the evidence of the people who are concerned, and I say it will not be any disloyalty for a man to come forward and say he was employed for 30 hours on a stretch; and still less is it disloyalty for a man receiving a letter and being asked to assist in throwing light on this question and not at once sending it to his employers. That was the animus with which the Chairman of the Company was prepared to proceed against Mr. Hood. But, Sir, I want the House of Commons for one moment—for I do not believe the House is fully aware of it—to see what

Hood's evidence was. Mr. Conacher, the Manager, came up and gave evidence before the Committee on the Hours of Railway Servants; he gave evidence on various matters, and in the course of this evidence he made some by-the-way or incidental statements; and one of these statements was that Mr. Hood had not been punished for signing a memorial asking that a porter might not be dismissed. Afterwards he repeated this statement, and still later on he appears to have somewhat gone back from it. But there it was in black and white before the Committee. Mr. Hood was one of those men—you may say he was vain, you may say he was sensitive—but he felt very much indeed that a statement which he thought derogatory to him should be in black and white before the House, so he asked to be allowed to come up and to give evidence. He simply came up and contradicted the statement which Mr. Conacher made about him, and stated one or two things to which I will refer before sitting down. But so little did the Committee think his evidence of any importance that it may be fairly said he was not cross-examined at all. He was allowed to go away after making his statement, and the Committee gave little or no thought to his evidence. That was not the case with Mr. Conacher and the Directors. On the day before Hood went up to give evidence, which Mr. Conacher knew would be of a personal character about himself, and the quarrel between this powerful and leading servant who had the ear of the Directors and this roadside stationmaster—when, I say, Mr. Conacher knew that Hood was going up to give evidence before a House of Commons Committee, what did Mr. Conacher do? He wrote to a neighbouring Railway Company in order to get up a case of neglect of duty against Mr. Hood, a case of which, up to that time, they had taken very little notice, and a case which already was two years old. Mr. Hood left the Committee, he went back to his employment, and I venture to say there was not a Member of the Committee who gave his evidence another thought. We regarded him simply as an uneducated man who had been irritated about certain things said about him, and we only felt that we gave up time we could ill-afford to waste in order to allow him to contradict them. It was otherwise with the Directors and Mr. Conacher. The Directors and Mr. Conacher not many days afterwards dismissed Mr. Hood. They dismissed him arbitrarily and summarily, and without giving him any reason whatever. I wish to leave certain topics for other hon. Gentlemen to deal with, but that is the question, as far as the actual dismissal was concerned, that I wish to insist on. Now I come to the very grave question of the censure. Mr. Hood applied to the Directors to be allowed to state his case, and the Directors had a meeting on the 30th September and gave him a hearing at Crewe. The gentlemen who were there present were those whom the House saw at the Bar—the hon. Member for Stretford, Mr. Hawkins and Mr. Conacher. I would like to ask whether hon. Members have read an account of that interview. All I can say is that they will find that it is a most characteristic, a most interesting, and in some respects a most amusing proceeding; but it is a proceeding of which the very gravest notice ought to be taken by this House; and I do not think the right hon. Gentleman insisted sufficiently upon what passed. Now, Sir, on page 36 of the Special Report particulars will be found. This man, half-educated, a man little above the status of a porter or an engine driver, is called into the presence of four gentlemen who had been, if they were not then, his employers, and there he stood among them, and what was the course of the procedure? Did they tell him why he was dismissed? No, they did not even tell him that. All they said was that he must explain and justify his evidence. He began to justify his evidence as such a man would do, giving an opening to them of which they were not slow to take advantage. Now, Sir, let hon. Members put themselves in that room and consider the sort of things said to this man by his employers; let them remember that they were talking so loudly and volubly that the shorthand writer said sometimes three or four of them were talking at one time. The Chairman said to Hood—

"It appears that the whole object you had was to screen the porter Humphreys, who was said to have been 44 hours on duty, to represent that the sleepers on the permanent way were rotten, and to explain the accident as due to the defective state of the permanent way."

Another one of the Directors at the bottom of page 38 says—

"Do you believe Stokes, and have you told the Committee a lie or unwittingly said what was untrue."

On the next page one of the Directors said—

"It is to screen Mr. Hood himself from a gross neglect of duty, and he had better say frankly that the replies to the Select Committee, giving the thing in the way which he did, were false?"

This is the style in which these men were talking. There was not a word of kindness towards Hood, not a word said to put him at his ease. They all sat round saying these things in a manner that would have confused and disconcerted any one who had the best of cases. But, Sir, out of this meeting what was the result? There were three charges brought against Hood by the Directors in the course of his evidence, and on two of these charges I do not hesitate to say they laid themselves open to the censure of this House. These charges were nothing less than mere abuse on account of the course he took before the Committee. The first I will take was a mare's nest. It was a ridiculous charge that Hood had applied to the Clerk of our Committee for his railway fare home. There was no charge that he wanted to get two railway fares, or wanted more than his share of public or railway money; but the charge was that by making this application he wished to give our Committee the idea that he was not allowed to give evidence and would not get his fare from the Company. That was brought against him as a serious charge by the Directors. They said—"You went to the Committee Clerk to get money there by trying to show you could not get the money from Mr. Conacher." I need hardly say to the House that that produced no effect whatever on the minds of the Committee. The next charge of the Directors made against this man was that he had said that on the occasion of a certain accident the sleepers on the line were rotten, and that the permanent way was defective. But it came out, from the evidence of Mr. Conacher himself, that at the time the accident took place this man had said these very words to Conacher himself. The idea was in his mind four years before the accident. When he came before the Committee the idea recurred to him; he said it quite incidentally, and there was little notice taken of it by any Member of the Committee. If you are to have witnesses dismissed for giving incidentally their views of a transaction four years before, which has nothing to do with these gross charges brought against the Cambrian Railway Company, you will never get working men to give evidence at all. Respecting the third charge, and the serious one, it came out in the course of time that Hood had confessed to charging night duty for one man, when, according to Conacher and the Directors, another man had been likewise doing the work. There is great confusion on this point, but one thing is clear, that Hood did not know this third man, Stokes, who was alleged by the Directors to have done the work that night, to have been in the station at all. What he did say was that Humphreys was working 44 hours on a stretch, and that he did allow a certain man, one Robinson, to stay up with him, that he returned this other man as the person who had done the work, whereas he was merely a companion of the other man. Now, Sir, I say here you have a serious charge against Mr. Hood. Here is a Company in which—and if hon. Gentlemen choose I will read Mr. Conacher's answers to my questions—men have been kept working 36 hours on end year after year, and the fact kept from the knowledge of the Manager and the Directors. That could only be done by a wholesale system of deception on the part of the stationmasters and the men below them. It is certain that a very loose method of making reports must have existed when such matters could go on without discovery at headquarters. Yet, at the end of all these years, the Directors fix the blame on this one unfortunate man who has come to give evidence, and they place at his door the blame for this system of concealment, which has been going on for at least five or six years. I say, first of all, that while the Committee were right in saying that this man was dismissed mainly for charges arising out of his evidence, those charges were trumpery, and he ought not to have been dismissed for them. There were probably other grave reasons for this course, and perhaps the gravest of all was that, in the words of the Chairman, Hood was an enemy of the Company; but, quite apart from his dismissal, Hood was censured and bullied by the Directors in a manner that, to say the least of it, was most unfortunate, and treated in a way that will in future deter any man liable to such treatment from giving evidence before a Parliamentary Committee, or giving evidence about his position at all. However, Sir, I must say, on different grounds from those given by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee, I should consider that the dignity of this House would be vindicated by the Resolution which he has moved, and all the more because I do not believe in using our power of imprisonment vindictively. I do not think in the long run it would conduce to the dignity of the House to do so. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman should not remain, and will not remain, unanswered; but I am afraid that the unanimity and gravity of the animadversion of the House on the conduct of the Directors has been sorely spoiled by the line which, in his speech to-night, the right hon. Gentleman has taken.

*(5.24.) MR. MILVAIN (Durham): I think, Sir, that in the interests of Hood it would have been better if the Motion made by the Chairman of the Committee had been accepted by the House rather than that we should be obliged to go into the evidence to ascertain whether the Directors of the Company were or were not justified, from causes arising out of the evidence, in dismissing Hood. I think, Sir, on that point it is an admitted principle that if a servant conducts himself in a way which is inconsistent with the faithful discharge of his duty, his misconduct justifies his immediate dismissal. It is sufficient, in the eye of the law, if it is conduct which is prejudicial or is likely to be prejudicial to the interests or the reputation of the master, and the master would be justified, not only if he discovered it at the time but if he did not discover it until afterwards, in dismissing that servant. The right hon. Gentleman who last spoke alluded to the hours of labour on the Cambrian Railway as disclosed by the witness Bather. It was evidence which I must admit startled every Member of the Committee, and I was one who demanded a full inquiry. We were successful in getting many witnesses, including many servants of the Cambrian Railway, and it did not take long to see that the hours they were working some time ago were excessive. But that was before this Committee of Inquiry was appointed, and every single individual servant deposed to the fact that now he was perfectly satisfied with his hours of labour. I am surprised that a right hon. Gentleman in the position of the Member for Bridgeton, whose words and expressions ought to have weight in this House and in the country, should mislead the House as he has done. Not one servant only, but every servant of the Railway Company who was called before the Committee was asked by myself and by others as to whether he was satisfied now with his hours of labour, and in every case the answer was that he was perfectly satisfied. A more healthy and satisfactory type of servants I do not think any Committee ever saw during their long inquiry. Now, Sir, let us apply the principle of justification to the Railway Company in dismissing its servant. It arose in this way. After the evidence of Mr. Bather, Mr. Connacher was called, and somewhat qualified Bather's evidence; then Mr. Hood came before the Committee and repeated what had been deposed to by Mr. Bather, that Humphreys had been working for 44 hours on a stretch at a certain station on a given day. I think that was in November, 1887, and immediately preceded an accident at the station where he was a servant. Now, Sir, in consequence of the reiteration of Mr.

Bather's evidence by Mr. Hood, it became necessary for the officials of the Company to look into the pass books and the memoranda as to what took place immediately before the accident, and the inquiry disclosed this—that instead of Humphreys having served for 44 hours, as Hood and Bather asserted, he had not served more than half that time. There was an entry in the pay sheet to the effect that on the Saturday night and the Friday night immediately preceding the accident—the nights upon which it was said Humphreys worked 44 hours—a man named Robinson served one night and Humphreys the other. The pay sheet initialled in Hood's own handwriting showed that Humphreys and Robinson had both received pay in respect of those nights. When Hood's attention was called to this he raised the excuse—now raised by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division—that as Humphreys was working those long hours he thought he should have the company of another servant, and therefore Robinson was allowed to be with him. That was not true. It was proved to the satisfaction of the majority of the Committee—the minority can deny it if they like—that the name Robinson was not in the handwriting of Robinson, but had been signed by a man named Stokes. It was discovered also upon testimony satisfactory to the majority of the Committee that this man had drawn his money, in respect of his services, from the stationmaster. If that is true, here you have the undoubted fact that it was not true that Humphreys was working 44 hours, but that his duties were shared by somebody else, that the stationmaster Hood permitted Stokes to sign Robinson's name, permitted some person to draw the money, and permitted Stokes also to practically draw money from another source. I ask any disinterested and impartial person to put himself in a position of trust, to put himself in the position of a Director of a Railway Company, a trustee for shareholders in the Railway Company, and ask himself if he would be acting fairly and honestly to the community by allowing a man who wilfully and deliberately falsified his pay-sheet to remain in the service of the Company. I will go one step further. We had statements before the Committee which I submit to impartial men would, if true, be evidence of an offence within the Criminal Law.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Why did you not prosecute him?

*MR. MILVAIN: I think no one will doubt, if the Directors of the Railway Company honestly believed he had been guilty of falsifying that pay-sheet they were perfectly justified, whatever the evidence he gave before the Committee may have been, in dismissing him from the service of the Railway Company. But there was another question, and it was that this is calculated to prejudice the Railway Company in the eyes of the public apparently without any provocation. Hood the stationmaster deposed to the Committee that this accident in 1887 was caused not by the negligence of Humphreys, but in consequence of the permanent way being in a rotten condition. Well, that was rather an astounding statement to make. But the cause of that accident had been inquired into by Colonel Rich, an Inspector of the Board of Trade. Colonel Rich inspected the permanent way, and his Report was not that the permanent way was in a rotten condition, but that the accident was brought about in consequence of the negligence of Humphreys. There are some persons in the Committee who believed, and who believe still, that the permanent way was in a rotten condition. But the evidence of Hood was only corroborated by a man who admitted in his statement before Colonel Rich that he deliberately said what was untrue.

MR. HENEAGE (Great Grimsby): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask whether the hon. Gentleman is entitled to go into all these facts? If so, we shall have a week's debate. I ask that question more especially, seeing it has been said by the Committee, in their Report to the House—

“Your Committee have not deemed it to be part of their duty to express any opinion as to how far the conduct of the said John Hood and the irregularities disclosed by his evidence, as well as the character of the evidence, were calculated properly to forfeit the confidence of the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company.”

MR. SPEAKER: That is entirely a matter for the discretion of this House. I quite agree with the right hon. Gentleman that it may be inconvenient to travel into all the details, but it is not for me to indicate the direction in which the discretion of any hon. Member may be limited in discussing the Special Report and the evidence contained in it.

*MR. MILVAIN: The right hon. Gentleman was not in his place when the right hon. Gentleman his colleague raised the question. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton (Sir G. Trevelyan) has placed this issue before the House, and that renders it necessary for somebody, who I hope is acquainted with the evidence laid before the Committee, to refute the misleading statements of the right hon. Gentleman. I have only one question more to deal with, and that is upon a matter which was calculated to prejudice the Railway Company in the minds of the Committee. This man went to the Committee clerk and asked for his railway money to be refunded. There could be no harm in a witness going to the Committee clerk and getting his money refunded; but the thing that was calculated to prejudice the Railway Company in the eyes of the public was this: that at the time he went to the clerk and asked for his money to be refunded, he had in his pocket a letter from the Directors of the Railway Company telling him to take a ticket, and promising to refund the money to him. I cannot help repeating what I said before, that I think it is a great pity that this issue has been raised, because I think it will be perfectly apparent to the House that it is not to the interests of Hood that the question should have been raised. And I think there were some hon. Members who took exception to the expressions made use of the other day by the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of the Committee (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) when he spoke of there being two parties upon the Committee, or two sides to the Committee. I think it will be perfectly apparent to this House that there are two sides to this Committee, and that Mr. Buckley, Chairman of the Cambrian Railway Company, was justified in his opening statement when he said—

“That he wished that certain persons might be asked to give their evidence, because it was a very serious charge to make against the Company, because we are not in the position that those are in at this moment who seem to be attacking the Company, of having well-briefed gentlemen to assist them.”

I have served upon that Committee since the Committee sat, and I have endeavoured, to the best of my ability, to form an impartial judgment on the evidence given before the Committee. It is true I am a young Parliamentary hand, but it does seem strange that hon. Members of the Committee, put there for the purpose of acting as a jury and delivering their verdict in accordance with the evidence, should be day by day consulting with the secretaries and servants of the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Why consult with the Directors?

MR. MILVAIN: I presume we may consult with other Members of the Committee on our right hand and on our left. I am unaware that I ever deserved the accusation which is hurled against me from the other side of the House by a man who has never been upon the Committee, and who does not know what has taken place before it. In my opinion, it is a scandalous state of affairs that a Member of the Committee should be sitting there and receiving instruction from day to day and act as nothing but a partisan.

*(6.40.) MR. J. WILSON (Durham, Mid): I quite agree with the hon. Member who has just sat down that we should approach this question and take our seats on the Committee with unbiased and uncoloured minds. But, unfortunately, there are no Trades Union secretaries on that Committee to consult. I think the hon. Member has implied in his remarks—and rather passionate they were—that he consulted with those who sat on his right and left. I think I am the nearest approach to a Trades Union secretary on that Committee, and, therefore, if anybody was consulted it would be myself. But I am not connected with the railway servants, and, therefore, I am not afraid of anyone asking questions of me. But if hon. Members have watched the course of the hon. Member's (Mr. Milvain's) address they will have come to the conclusion that his mind is very much coloured and very much biased. I have listened carefully to what the hon. Member said, and I have failed to find a single remark that dealt with the Directors of the Company; but I have found that throughout the whole of his discourse he has tried to rake up every item that he could against Hood, but not one single sentence in the whole of his speech in any way refers to the Directors, or sets forth that they had done wrong. The Directors of this Company have been before the House, and they have made an apology. If the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Camborne (Mr. Conybeare) had been accepted, I should not have risen in my place to say anything in the course of this Debate. If it had been considered that Mr. Hood was unfairly dealt with, and that there were other reasons besides incompetence which made the Directors discharge him; and if the Directors were willing to re-instate him or give him some compensation, I should not have said anything. But I do think it is quite necessary that the other side of this question should be heard. I have read an old parable of a man who made an apology for his sins, and asked for mercy when his creditor took him by the throat, but who, when he left the presence of that creditor, was as harsh in his conduct as ever he had been, and demanded from his debtor the uttermost farthing. I can understand the apology made by the Directors if they can get out of the difficulty in that way. But I speak as a working man, and as feeling what no other gentleman in this House can feel, because I have been in the position of Hood, and have had my daily bread taken away by the action of the men who employed me. And, speaking on behalf of a working man as a working man, I believe this man has been discharged from his duty substantially and entirely because he said before the Committee that which he believed to be true. The hon. Member for Durham said the long hours on the Cambrian Railway were ancient history. I have in my hand an outline of the evidence given by two of the witnesses of this railway. One of them is Albert Thomas, who has only been in the employment of the Company one year. He deposed that—

“He had been on duty 36 to 40 hours at a stretch. During the whole of those periods of 36 to 40 hours’ stretches he had no authority to leave the box, and he would have been neglecting his duty if he had done so.”

He likewise said that—

“He had been in the same box for a stretch of 40 hours.”

I think that entirely shows that the long hours which have been worked upon this railway are not a matter of ancient history, but have been in existence within the past four or five years. There are two questions which lead me to the conclusion that Hood has been discharged mainly on account of his appearance before the Committee. These two questions are—first, the great words of praise that this man has received from Mr. Conacher and the Company generally. I hold in my hand one or two references which have been made to Mr. Hood in times gone by by Mr. Conacher. This man has been in the service of the Company above 20 years. He has served them from a boy until he has become of middle age and his strength is waning. In 1881 he applied for a situation of a higher grade, and Mr. Conacher wrote the following letter:—

“Dear Sir,—Mr. Hood informs me that he is a candidate for the post of relieving officer in your district, and I beg to state that he has been in the service of this Company for about 20 years, for about 14 years of which he was, as you are aware, stationmaster at Ellesmere, and I am of opinion that his qualifications are such as to befit him for the position he seeks.—J. Conacher.”

There are other references one might quote made by Mr. Conacher as to the ability and qualifications of Hood. But it might be stated to the House that on the day before Hood appeared before the Committee to give his evidence he was one of ten men who received prizes from the Company for keeping his station in such a quiet and orderly manner. Surely a man who kept his station in such a manner as to call forth praise, and who won the third prize out of ten, is entitled to better treatment than he has received. In connection with this prize, Hood says that from the year 1884 he had received prizes every year for the way and manner in which he kept his station, and he had received more prizes for that object than any other stationmaster on the line. Another question leads me to the conclusion that this man has been ill-treated, and that he was high in the estimation of the Company. Let us look at the wages he received. He received £80 a year as stationmaster, and in addition his house rent free and garden which, according to his own calculation, amounted to somewhere near £15 a year, thus making his income £95 a year. If I were speaking of other Railway Companies I should not offer to say that £80 a year was a very high sum for a stationmaster, but I would like to read to the House a quotation from the evidence of Mr. Conacher as to his value of labour and the wages that should be paid. In answer to a question put to him he says—

“That the current wages in any district for labour are 13s. or 14s. a week, and that, therefore, that was a proper sum to pay railway servants.”

Now, if that be so, any man receiving £80 a year, with £15 as the value of a house, would naturally be held in very high esteem by the Company, and consequently if he received this sum up to the time he gave evidence, it was a proof that the Company considered him a proper servant. I am sure there is no hon. Gentleman in this House who would like to be dealt with in the way and manner in which this man was dealt with a day or two after he gave his evidence before the Committee. He was on the platform when a clerk came to him with a letter and told him that he was done at a minute’s notice. The letter was as follows:—

“Secretary and General Manager’s Office,
Oswestry, 10th August, 1891.

“I am instructed by the Directors to inform you that this Company have no further use for your services, and, on your handing over the keys and all property of the Company, the bearer, Mr. Robert Jones, will pay you a month’s wages in lieu of the usual notice, and will take charge of your station from to-day. The house must be vacated on the 10th proximo.
J. Conacher.

“To Mr. Hood, Montgomery.”

Mr. J. Wilson

Having regard to the fact that Mr. Conacher in various letters had commended Hood, and that he was paid a high salary and received prizes for keeping his station so well, we can come to no other conclusion than that this man was discharged because he gave evidence before the Committee. It has been stated that we should act with justice to the community. I look upon this man, or any other witness before a Royal Commission or Parliamentary Committee, or a Court of Justice, as a servant of the State for the time being, who has a perfect right to be guarded and cared for. If any Board of Directors, or anyone else, interfere with that man in the discharge of his duty to the State, they have a perfect right to answer to the State for that. I would like the House to realise the position of this man for a moment; to put themselves into the position of this man; to take the position of a working man whose daily bread has been swept away by the action of a Board of Directors. He says—

“I went into the office and was paid a month's wages in advance, and handed up my keys to the relief clerk, who could give me no reason for my dismissal; and, as I knew of no reason myself, I need hardly tell you that the blow was a terrible one to me to be so harshly treated after so many years of faithful service.”

Here is a man who has given the best of his life to the Railway Company, and whatever energy and skill he possessed. He has grown old, and because he speaks the truth as a man ought to do, because he divulges that which is a question of safety or danger to the public, he is discharged from the employment in which he has served so faithfully and honourably. I am no lawyer, but I understand crimes are classed as injury to persons and injury to property. I venture to say these Directors have injured this man on both accounts; they have destroyed his character that he has built up for himself in the neighbourhood in which he lives; they have injured him in the most vital property that a working man can have. He has worked himself into that position from the lowest level of railway service to what is a very high level, yet these gentlemen, these Directors, get this poor fellow into their Board-room and they harass him and hound him. I have seen the picture of a stag at bay with the hounds snarling all round him, and I am using no extravagant figure when I say I consider that this man was in that position. He has had taken from him the prospect of his daily bread, the prospects of his family, the results of life-long labour. And I would ask this House to say, if it can do nothing else, that these Directors should now compensate him in the only way in which it can be done.

(6.55.) MR. W. E. GLADSTONE (Edinburgh, Midlothian): My hon. Friend who has just sat down has made a pathetic and striking appeal to the House to apply the remedy which he appears to think we have it in our power to apply to an act of injustice. And I think that the discussion which we have heard must have impressed many minds with the belief that we are involved in a question of some difficulty. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, speaking with the double authority of the Chairman of the Committee and a Member of the Cabinet, representing his colleagues on a question which touches the honour and dignity of the House, has made a proposition to the House, and my duty is to ask myself whether there is any sufficient reason for my dissenting from that proposition, or whether it is in my power to suggest, in lieu of the course he proposes to take, some course obviously more advisable. Well, certainly we have had a great diversity of opinion expressed. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has given an animated vindication of the conduct of the Directors. The prevailing tone of the speeches, and, perhaps, the prevailing sentiment of the House, are to the effect that there has been some harshness in the course which has been pursued. Such at least—it may be an incorrect inference—but such is the inference I should draw from the speeches which have been delivered. Then we have a diversity of course presented to us by the Amendment which has been proposed by another hon. Member. I understood the hon. Member who spoke last to support that Amendment; and, though I will not criticise minutely the language of the Amendment, it is quite obvious to me that the Amendment is to the effect that the House desires and seeks to promote the re-instatement in office of a servant of a Railway Company whom the authorised heads of that Company have rightly or wrongly considered it their duty to dismiss.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: Or to compensate him.

MR. W. E. GLADSTONE: To re-instate or compensate. I am not sure that I am in a position to discuss that separate alternative. It would, I think, be a very novel, and, I am afraid, in some respects a questionable method of proceeding for this House to come to a decision which it has no power to enforce, that one individual should compensate some other individual to whom it thinks injustice has been done. Then, Sir, in respect to re-instatement, it is quite obvious that in any case where this House might be inclined to advise, and especially if it were inclined to force, the re-instatement in office of a person dismissed from it by competent authorities, this House would incur an indefinite, but a very serious responsibility from the consequences which might follow, or might be supposed to follow—even, perhaps, if unjustly supposed to follow—from that re-instatement. Then, Sir, I think the House must feel that, speaking broadly of proposals of this kind, we place ourselves in very considerable difficulty if we widen the issue beyond that which has been raised for us by the Committee. This Committee was presumably in possession of our confidence, and nothing has been said in this Debate which leads me to suppose that the House has seen cause to withdraw that confidence. I admit there may have been in the evidence facts or language which might have led the House on some broad grounds to believe the Committee had gone astray; but I wish to represent to the House that in the absence of such broad grounds we may perhaps be wiser to continue that confidence in the Committee which we testified by its appointment, and which they would appear to deserve by a lengthened and laborious investigation, and consequently to see what it is that the Committee recommend us to do, and whether we can really make a practical improvement on that recommendation. Sir, there are two things about which I imagine unanimity prevails—they have not been questioned in any of the speeches delivered to-night. One of them is that it is our absolute duty, under all conditions and in all circumstances, to maintain the perfect freedom of speech for witnesses before our Committees, and the second is that it is a duty no less sacred to vindicate in a just and equitable, but in a firm and decided manner the Privileges of the House. Well, Sir, I observe that the Committee have abstained, although there was a division of opinion in the Committee on the subject, the Committee—that is to say, the majority of the Committee—have abstained from re-trying the question between the House and Mr. Hood. I am not prepared, for one, to depart from the course taken by the Committee. I do not say that arguments may not be made to an opposite effect; but, in my opinion, if we attempt to try the case between the Company and Mr. Hood on its merits we shall embark on a task of great difficulty, and one not to be satisfactorily disposed of in a debate of one, two, or three nights in this House. The Committee, as I think wisely, addressed the attention of the House to that which primarily concerns our duty in the matter—namely, the dangerous effect of the conduct of the Directors upon the freedom of speech of witnesses before our Committees, and upon their probable disposition in consequence to speak freely or otherwise when called upon to give their evidence. That being the case, the right hon. Gentleman has proposed a Motion which undoubtedly goes past the question of the relative merits of the Directors and Mr. Hood, in the case unhappily raised between them, and the right hon. Gentleman has addressed himself strictly by his Motion to maintaining the Privileges of the House, and at the same time securing freedom of speech before our Committees. The right hon. Gentleman has laid stress on the fact that apology has been made by the hon. Member of this House—whom I believe no one would ever dream of accusing of intentional wrong to anyone—and those who have been associated with him in this matter. I have looked to that apology, and I think, on the one hand, it is typically genuine, and on the other it is sufficient. The course of this House, as long as I can recollect it, has been in individual cases of Privilege and in cases of Privilege generally — however highly the doctrine of Privilege may have been stated by high authorities on certain occasions—whenever it has come to the application of the doctrine of privilege, the instinctive effort and disposition of the House and the uniform practice of the House has been to endeavour to unite mildness with firmness. Well, Sir, wrong has been done in this case, and apology has been made for that wrong—not as regards the injury done to the individual; that is not the question put before us by the Committee, and it is not a question which could be satisfactorily disposed of by any such discussion as this—but apology has been made for the wrong done to a public principle and to the public interest, with regard to the examination of witnesses before our Committees. Upon that the right hon. Gentleman has proposed that, notwithstanding that apology, the persons who have, unhappily and unwittingly, no doubt, committed this wrong should be admonished from the Chair. Some are of opinion that the language of the right hon. Gentleman's Motion ought to be strengthened. Sir, I do not concur in that opinion. The House of Commons on all occasions generously and largely accepts every apology which it believes to be sincere, and that is not only a generous course—it is a wise and prudent course. This House has quite enough to do in the discharge of its public duties, and it is wisdom as well as liberality to avoid as far as possible all collateral controversies. The right hon. Gentleman opposite proposes that these gentlemen be admonished. There is a stronger code of proceeding which is sometimes adopted—namely, that persons who have offended the House should be reprimanded. I recollect hearing a reprimand delivered from the Chair to one of the most distinguished Members of the House—namely,

Mr. O'Connell. But there were two distinguishing circumstances to be observed in that case. First, that the offence committed by Mr. O'Connell—for I must so describe it, as it was so found by the House—the offence was a very serious one; it was a charge, I think, of perjury, or something very near it, against a sworn Committee of this House; and the second was that Mr. O'Connell had declined to apologise for what he had done. Under those circumstances a reprimand was, I think, administered to Mr. O'Connell. But, as a general rule, it will be found laid down in the work of Sir Erskine May that the House has two methods of proceeding—one of them is to admonish, and the other is to reprimand, but that the course of reprimanding is not adopted unless in cases so grave in their character that, as a general rule, the offenders are in custody in the House at the time when the House determines to take that severe course. No one will say there is here before us a set of circumstances in which we could dream of placing these gentlemen in custody. I believe the right hon. Gentleman is acting strictly in accordance with Parliamentary precedent in asking the House to cause to be admonished the gentlemen who are now before us in the actual circumstances of the case; because I think we hold—not only do I speak of precedent, but I speak also of principle—that in the more lenient view which the House adopts in these matters apology in ordinary cases purges the offence. The offence is against the House; and if we accept the apology—and I do not see how we can do otherwise than receive it in this case—the offence against the House ceases to exist so far as this matter is concerned. But there was a public evil apprehended, and, therefore, it is quite right that we should not rest satisfied with mere apology, and against that public evil the admonition which is to be delivered from the Chair, if this Motion be adopted, appears to afford full and sufficient remedy. I must say I have the conviction that those who have unhappily violated in this instance the Privileges of this House will be the very last persons likely to fall into similar error or inadvertence hereafter; that the course of proceeding is sufficient, and that we should limit ourselves to that which is sufficient; and whatever we may feel, whatever we may think with regard to the hardship which one individual may have suffered, we should not undertake a process even for remedying what may appear to be such hardship unless we are convinced that it is in our power to carry that process to a successful issue. On these grounds I must confess I do not think the House could act more wisely than by adopting the recommendation now made to us by the right hon. Gentleman and by the Government—a recommendation which I must say I think is fully in the spirit of the Report of the Committee as it stands, and which is, therefore, placing the proceedings of the House in this matter upon a footing on which they will receive the approval of the country.

(7.15.) MR. CREMER (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I hope hon. Members opposite have not deluded themselves into the belief that they have heard the last of this question; we shall yet ask them to hear some unpleasant truths. It requires no small courage to differ from the views expressed by so great an authority as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian; but with all due respect to him I am afraid he has missed one very important point in the question—namely, that those men, who just now came to the Bar with such a lame apology to the House, have not been asked by the right hon. Gentleman opposite to tender any kind of apology, to make any atonement to Mr. Hood for the injury done to him. There are two proposals before the House—one that of the right hon. Gentleman, which brought the culprits to the Bar with that miserable apology, and the Amendment which calls on the three gentlemen to make some kind of compensation to Mr. Hood or to re-instate him. I regret that the Amendment is accompanied by any request for the re-instatement of a man who has given 24 years of honest service. It has taken 24 years to discover that this unfortunate man was not a trustworthy servant; a man whom they had the day before rewarded for his skill, good conduct, and diligence in keeping his station in good order. They have not only been guilty of abominable cruelty to this man, but are telling something which is very nearly akin to falsehood by putting on record the contemptible plea that they have discovered at last that he is an untrustworthy servant. I trust the Amendment will be pressed to a Division, though I think it would find more support without the request for re-instatement. If he were re-instated what would prevent his dismissal in two or three weeks' time? There is another course which I think the House might have taken. It might have imposed on these men a heavy pecuniary penalty, which is the only way to make them feel the displeasure of the House at the conduct of which they have been guilty. You told me, however, Sir, that I could not move to add to the Resolution words calling on these gentlemen to pay a fine of £1,000 each, to be handed over to Mr. Hood as some compensation for the wrong done to him. I shall vote for the Amendment, my only regret being that it is not of a more severe nature, and I hope we shall support that Amendment as heartily and numerous as we can to testify the indignation of a considerable minority at the dismissal of a public servant after 24 years' honest labour because he had the courage of his convictions and told truths which were unpalatable to the Directors of the Cambrian Company.

(7.23.) MR. CUNINGHAM GRAHAM (Lanark, N.W.): The hon. Member for Durham said that there were two parties in the Committee; it seems to me that there are two parties in the House—one of which looks on this as a mere breach of Parliamentary Privilege, and the other that which looks upon it as an important question of the bread having been taken out of a man's mouth and his means of subsistence taken away after many years of faithful service. Not being an old Member of the House, I approach with diffidence the question of the breach of Privilege, but I congratulate the President of the Board of Trade on the specious nature of the arguments he laid before the House. It seemed to me he was endeavouring to touch the coil which is usually set in motion to prevent further interference with those great monopolists, the Railway Companies. He led us to understand that it was not in the power of Parliament to have Hood re-instated; that Parliament could not interfere between the rich Directors of a vast monopoly and one of their poor servants. The speech of the right hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division (Sir G. Trevelyan) was full of sentiment—he proposed something and concluded nothing. In what position as Members of this House are we to pose before the bar of public opinion in this matter? A mere perfunctory apology such as that given will not satisfy the great body of the working public of this country. What profit is such an apology to a man like Hood who has lost his employment? As to his re-instatement, I think that would be absolutely illusory, for it would be impossible for any man to fulfil his duties under such circumstances in a way to continue in the employment of the Company for a fortnight after he was taken back. I hope the House will rise superior to this miserable question of mere breach of the Privileges of this House, and will see, as I think they do see, that gross injustice is being done to a helpless man by a rich and powerful Corporation. (Laughter). It is a matter of no importance to me whether this is a rich company or a company of straw—whether their rolling stock is rotten or their permanent way in bad condition; what I am anxious to know is whether the House is going to rise superior to the insinuations, first started by the President of the Board of Trade, and ably supported by right hon. Gentlemen on this side, as to the impossibility of dealing with this question as proposed by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division (Mr. T. P. O'Connor). A scandalous act of injustice has been committed, and even if the particular Committee has ceased to sit, other Committees will have to inquire into analogous questions, and there is a feeling abroad testified to by the refusal of the Miners' Federation to give evidence before the Royal Commission on Labour, and if we refuse to do justice to this man we shall upset the feeling of confidence which ought to exist in the mind of the working classes in the honour, fair dealing, and secrecy of the proceedings before Committees of this House, and the result will be that all future Committees to inquire into the question of hours of labour and analogous questions will be futile and illusory, and we shall not be able to get evidence to enable us to judge the opinion of the working classes, owing to the fear, carefully instilled into the House, of the danger of further interfering with private concerns by the action of the House. An hon. Member near me says that if only five or six Members go into the Lobby we ought to have the courage of our opinions, so that people outside may know that we are not hand and glove with the great Railway Companies and other swindling concerns—(Cries of "Order!")—well, and other enterprises, in their attempts to oppress their employees. I hope the presence of the working class Representatives will be a standing menace to Railway Directors and others, and I trust the House will not attach too much importance to the mere question of Privilege, which, after all, is a small matter. I hope the House will support the Amendment of the hon. Member for the Scotland Division; for if we do nothing but vindicate our own dignity the opinion in which we are held by people outside is likely to suffer.

* (7.32.) MR. CHANNING (Northampton, E.): The President of the Board of Trade, in making his statement, remarked that in the Report of the Committee there were two passages which presented more than a merely verbal difference; but he omitted to say that it was only by his own casting vote that the Committee decided to insert the words "dismissed in consequence of charges arising out of his evidence," instead of the words which I suggested—namely, that Mr. Hood was dismissed "in consequence of the evidence given before your Committee." It was only because of the accidental absence of one or two Members of the Committee and because of the casting vote of the right hon. Gentleman that the milder form of words found a place in the Report. I venture to say that it would have been fairer to the House if the right hon. Gentleman had intimated that this was not a unanimous Report, and that we were practically evenly divided on this most essential issue. The hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Milvain) has thrown down a challenge to me, and has asserted that there were on this Committee well-briefed gentlemen who argued the case for the employees. I am not ashamed of the part I have borne in the examination and cross-examination of witnesses before the Committee. I am not ashamed of having taken up the case of the railway servants, and of having done my best to prove from the witnesses the contentions for which I and other gentlemen on the Committee have been struggling. And I think such a challenge comes with a very bad grace from the one gentleman on the other side who in his examination and cross-examination of witnesses has employed a procedure only known in the Criminal Courts of this country. The hon. and learned Member for Durham has tried to introduce invidious matter against Mr. Hood by referring to this question of the pay-sheet, but he has forgotten to tell the House what I elicited from the Chairman of the Company on this subject. After pressing Mr. Buckley for 20 minutes or half-an-hour I secured from him an admission that Mr. Hood, when he was dismissed from the Company's service, received back his guarantee money, which was an acknowledgment that his accounts with the Company were clear and honest. I think it is only right, after the invidious and persecuting spirit in which the hon. Member has placed this part of the subject before the House, that I should state this fact. In my opinion, this man was dismissed solely and entirely because of the spirit in which the Chairman acted from the first. In replying to me he said on three or four different occasions that he thought it was disloyalty to the Company on the part of this official that he should take any part as the friend or spokesman of the workmen under his control, and that it was not the duty of this man to take part in any agitation which had for its object the improvement of the condition of those who were working under him, and that it was his duty to take the part of his employers, the Company. The only reason that he was dismissed was because he took the part of those humbler men, and because he took part in an agitation to relieve those poor men from the cruelty of long and protracted hours. The hon. and learned Member for Durham has actually stated that the men were now quite content with their hours, but his argument is entirely worthless, because he knows very well, and so does every Member of the Committee, that this scandal of long hours was only swept away in October or November of the year before last, after the agitation had begun. Mr. Conacher came before us and stated that he had not known of these enormous hours worked by the servants of the Railway Company, and that he was only informed of it at the last moment. That statement seems incredible on the face of it. I am not here, however, to charge Mr. Conacher with falsehood—though I must express my opinion that much of his evidence bears that character—but it was only after the agitation had brought to the knowledge of the world the disgraceful hours worked upon this railway that those hours were shortened. There were only two occasions on which this man was complained about or punished, and in both cases when he had been taking the part of the men. The first occasion was when he thought that one of the porters under him had been unjustly dismissed from his employment, and he, in company with a number of people in the town, signed a memorial for the man's re-instatement. On that occasion Mr. Hood was suspended, and eventually was removed to a smaller station. The second occasion is the present, when he has been dismissed from his employment and deprived of his livelihood. I consider the treatment of this man is a disgrace and a scandal. I say that this man has been hunted down by the Chairman and the Manager of this line, and driven out of his position because he dared to speak on behalf of the workmen under him, and I say that is an offence which calls for far more stringent measures than are proposed by the President of the

Mr. Channing

Board of Trade. I should not have shrunk from moving a Resolution which would have committed Mr. Buckley and Mr. Conacher—for I consider the offence of the Member for the Stretford Division and of the other gentleman is a smaller one—to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms. I trust, however, that the decision of the House may prove a salutary warning not only to these gentlemen but to other employers of labour.

*(7.45.) MR. FENWICK (Northumberland, Wansbeck): I suppose everyone will agree that the Motion of the President of the Board of Trade would carry greater weight provided it was accepted by the unanimous vote of the House. But it is evident that in its present form it will not be unanimously supported by the House. I have risen, therefore, for the purpose of making a suggestion to the First Lord of the Treasury, which I think will enable us to accept unanimously the Resolution proposed by the President of the Board of Trade. I would suggest that this Debate should be adjourned, in order to give the Directors of the Cambrian Railway an opportunity of considering the question of compensating Mr. Hood. Unless some such course is adopted, it is idle to think that, by a Motion like this, you will create confidence in the minds of the working people who are compelled to give evidence before Select Committees. The idea that gentlemen of wealth may condone an offence against the Privileges of this House by a mere apology, however sincere, will do no good. There is great force in the words: "He takes my life who takes from me the means by which I live," and this is practically what has been done in the case of John Hood. And unless some compensation is given to Hood for the injustice and hardship that has been done to him, it is idle to think that such a Resolution as that proposed by the President of the Board of Trade will establish confidence in the minds of workmen when they are in future requested to give evidence before Committees of this House. I therefore make the suggestion that I have put forward in order that the Directors of the Cambrian Company may have an opportunity of considering the point.

I understand the matter has already been brought under the notice of the Directors, and, in order that we may not foreclose these negotiations, I move the Adjournment of the Debate with the object I have stated. I quite agree that we cannot insist on the question of re-instatement. The man's life, if he were re-instated, would be a misery to him, and it would be better for him, and better for the Directors, that they should part company, and part company for ever. The only way in which that can be done satisfactorily is by some form of compensation being offered to him for the loss of his employment, and his consequent suffering, both in body and mind, through the action of the Directors. I move the Adjournment of the Debate.

(7.40.) MR. J. ROWLANDS (Finsbury, E.): I beg to second the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."
 —(Mr. Fenwick.)

(7.50.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I hope the hon. Member who has moved this Amendment will not press it to a Division. I think he will feel that if we were to adjourn the Debate for the reason he has given we should be practically expressing an opinion as to the merits of the controversy between the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company and Mr. Hood. We should, in other words, be dealing with that part of the subject which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian very properly reminded us we shall probably have to deal with. The whole speech of the hon. Gentleman is based upon the opinion, which I have not the least doubt he most sincerely entertains, that Mr. Hood has been a wronged man in all respects, that he was a man in whom the Directors had every reason to have confidence, and that their dismissal of him was a harsh exercise of arbitrary power. Whether he be right or wrong, he must know very well that a large number of persons who have the very best means of forming a judgment are of a directly opposite opinion. I do not, of course, say whether that opinion is right or wrong; but in a case in which those who have heard the evidence have come to an exactly opposite opinion from that entertained by the hon. Member, it is surely rash that this House, not having heard the evidence, should express an opinion on the point. The hon. Gentleman, I gather, holds the view that the Directors of the Cambrian Company are wealthy people having at their backs large funds, and have, therefore, been dealt with by this House in a more lenient fashion than would Hood or his friends had they committed a breach of our Privileges. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will see that that view is not sustainable, and if I am to express an opinion on that point, I think it does not induce the House to lean in the direction of any gentleman who breaks its Privileges that they happen to belong to the relatively small class of employers rather than to the large class of employed. I believe all parties in the House desire to act with absolute impartiality, and will not allow their minds to be influenced by the fact that this breach of Privilege has been committed in connection with a very burning controversy between employers and employed; and if they will put themselves in that impartial condition of mind, they will feel with hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench opposite that probably the course we are pursuing is most conducive to the dignity of the House. In any case, I think it would be quite impossible for us to assent to the Motion which would hold suspended over the heads of those who have been heard at the Bar our final decision as to the course to be adopted. For that reason, and also because I think it is dangerous for us to embark on a discussion and commit ourselves to a decision on the merits of the case between the one side or the other, I again beg to press upon the hon. Member to consider the advisability of withdrawing his Motion, and allowing us to proceed to a decision.

(7.55.) SIR W. HARCOURT (Derby): The difficulty I feel about the remarks of my hon. Friend is not exactly of the character which has just been stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House. I have no difficulty in forming my own opinion of the nature of this transaction. I have read this evidence, and

I have not the smallest doubt whatever that those Directors dismissed this man on account of the evidence he gave before the Committee. The mere fact that Mr. Conacher, before he gave any evidence at all, applied to the London and North-Western Railway Company to get up a case against him was enough for me. Consequently, I am prepared to condemn these Directors for the course they have taken both with reference to this man and with reference to the House of Commons. But I would ask my hon. Friend to remember that to-night and in this place, important as it is to vindicate justice towards any individual, it is far more important that we should maintain the character, the dignity, and the authority of the House of Commons. If we are going to adjourn this Debate, what are we going to adjourn it for? To enter into negotiations with the Cambrian Directors? That seems to me to be the reason suggested, that we should find out what the Directors would do. That does not seem to me to be a course that would become us on this occasion. Some Gentlemen in the course of this Debate have talked about fines. There was a time, more than 200 years ago, when the House of Commons endeavoured to pursue that course. It has never endeavoured to pursue it since, and it would be a very unwise power for the House of Commons to exercise. The House of Commons never appears to advantage when it exceeds its jurisdiction, especially in cases of Privilege. I can remember in my youth the mess the House of Commons got into in the case of Stockdale and Hansard, when we measured swords with our printers and with the Courts of Law. Strongly as I have expressed my opinion of the behaviour of the Directors in the matter, the objection I feel to the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for the Scotland Division is, "How are you to carry it into effect?" The Amendment says that the Directors will not have purged their contempt until they have re-instated Hood, or otherwise compensated him. You cannot compel them to re-instate him. You have no legal authority or power to do it. You cannot compel them to compensate him. You have no jurisdiction nor any machinery by which you can carry that out. You cannot with advantage to the House take a course of this character. I think the knowledge of what has been their action in this case and the force of public opinion will not be lost upon the Directors of the Cambrian Railway, and I hope and believe—nay, I am convinced—that these forces will do justice to this man Hood for the treatment he has received. But it is not on account of the natural and just feeling of indignation which this treatment has inspired that we ought to allow ourselves to commit the House of Commons to a course of conduct which may not redound to its advantage or its dignity. And glad as I should be myself, holding the opinion that I entertain as to the treatment this man has received from the hands of these Directors, to take any course which should give him the redress which he is entitled to, I cannot follow on any lines which I think would place the House of Commons in a false position. I have been looking myself into the precedents in this case; and there is a case which resembles it, I think, very much in character. It took place in 1842. There was a man of the name of Ashworth, and he was charged before this House with an attempt to influence a witness under examination. It is not exactly the same thing, but it is of a cognate character. He was summoned to the Bar of this House, and he apologised for his conduct; and the Motion then made was—

“That Ashworth, having expressed his contrition for his offence, he be called to the Bar and admonished by Mr. Speaker, and discharged from further attendance on this House.”

That was the course taken in that case, and the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade will excuse me for saying that he would have very much strengthened his Resolution if he had not introduced into his speech language which looked to me a great deal too much like apologising for the conduct of the Directors. I think that has tended very much to weaken his Resolution, and to put a greater difficulty in the way of the House adopting it. I hope he will excuse me for saying, with great respect, that I think he was in error in the conduct of his case. But we have got to look at the substance of the thing. What else can the House of Commons do except what has been proposed? That is the practical question which we have got to put to ourselves. You cannot compel the re-instatement of this man; you cannot compel compensation. It is true you can send these men to prison. (Cheers.) All I can say is, I cannot advise the House of Commons to take that course. You may in the heat of discussion and in a moment of indignation take a course of that kind; but the House of Commons never took a course of that kind that it has not upon reflection had occasion to regret it. I do not think it would be a wise course, and I do not think it would ultimately be a dignified course. You have called these men before you; you have compelled them to admit their error. (Cries of “No!”) Well, I must say that I think the admission might have been made in a franker manner. But I am now considering what course I think it would be wise for us to take to-night. They have, at all events, expressed their regret for the violation of the Privileges of the House, and upon that it seems to me that an admonition and a rebuke to them for the conduct they have pursued is a course which the former practice of this House indicates as that which is becoming to its dignity. Mr. Speaker, I am one of those who believe that the effect of the language which you, Sir, will address to them will in itself bring about that regret for the wrong that has been done which I believe every man in this House desires to see manifested.

*(8.5.) MR. HOWELL (Bethnal Green, N.E.): I think the House will see at once that the case cited by the right hon. Gentleman (Sir William Harcourt) is not on all-fours with the case now before the House. In the particular case cited by the right hon. Gentleman there was a temporary injury done; and there it ended. What is happening in this case is that an injury is proceeding; and they have not attempted to purge themselves from that injury which is now proceeding. The apology tendered to this House is an absolutely empty apology, for the Directors are now doing and continuing the wrong of which we complain. I speak on this subject, not as many hon. Members on that side of the House, who seem to regard it as a trifling thing and to jeer at it; I speak as one who has suffered from this kind of thing myself. It has been my lot to have been starved out of London, and to have had my home sold over my head twice. That has been done by employers of labour, and therefore I can well understand how it is that a great deal of feeling has been evoked in the case of the man Hood. But I say that the apology that has been tendered is adding insult to injury. What has been done here to-night? An attempt has been made to injure this man in his name and character, beyond the injury which has been already inflicted upon him by discharging him from his position, so that he would not be able to get any other employment in any Railway Company of the United Kingdom. I say, Sir, it is an insult to this House to ask this House to pass unanimously the empty apology that has been tendered, whilst no reparation whatever is made to the man who has been injured, and will be injured as long as he lives, and his wife and family with him. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to be shocked that some hon. Members on this side of the House suggested the alternative of the prison. Why, it is a fitting alternative for men who have endeavoured to starve a man and his wife and family for giving evidence, as he was entitled to have done, before a Committee of this House. And yet you tell us that you are vindicating the honour and privileges of this House, whilst you give ample opportunity for such-like Corporations and such-like Companies to inflict a like injury again the next time they happen to come upon another man employed by a railway, or employed in a mine, or employed in a workshop in the United Kingdom, who might give evidence. I am not able to speak with regard to the particular form in which sufficient compensation should be made; but it seems to me that my hon. Friend below me (Mr. Fenwick) has made a suggestion that might be accepted by the House—to leave it to the Cambrian Railway Company and the hon. Gentleman who is a Member of this House, and the other Directors of the Company, to make some compensation to this man for the injury that has been done. But unless they are prepared to make this reparation for the injury they have done, well, then, I say that I, for one, should go with a light heart into the Lobby to vote for the imprisonment of men—(laughter)—yes; hon. Gentlemen may laugh—of men who will set at naught the Privileges of this House, and who will set at naught the poverty and suffering of the witnesses who give evidence before a Committee of this House.

*MR. SPEAKER: The Question is that the Debate be now adjourned.

(8.10.) MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE (Newington, W.): I am afraid the labours of our Committee have not been very useful. We sat for five or six days. We had all these gentlemen before us. We had Hood before us and many others for many hours of the same day. We found—(Cries of "Question, question!")

*MR. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. Member that the Question before the House is the Question of the Adjournment of the Debate.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: Having submitted our Report to the House, it does seem strange—(Cries of "Order! Order!")

*MR. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. Member to take notice of what I have said, that the Debate is on the Adjournment, and he has had recourse to his former argument.

MR. RADCLIFFE COOKE: I was about to say that, having finished our labours and having submitted our Report to the House, it does seem strange that this House should be required again to debate a matter which was so fully raised before us, and which has been so fully investigated by the Committee specially appointed for the purpose.

Dr. TANNER, Mr. MORTON, and other hon. Members rose to speak, but none of them was invited to continue the discussion.

Question put.

The House divided :—Ayes 136 ;
Noes 221.—(Div. List, No. 71.)

Question again proposed, " That those words be there added."

*(8.58.) Mr. [McLAREN (Cheshire, Crewe): I am disposed to regret that this case of John Hood was not dealt with at an earlier period, because I think it is a question which should have been kept within limits that would have enabled the House to have come to a very speedy decision with regard to it. I do not intend to follow the example of some of my colleagues on the Committee in going into the evidence which was laid before them, except on one very important point. I think it would have been infinitely better if the question before the House had been confined to the point to which the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade endeavoured to confine it. Granting that a breach of Privilege has been committed, it would be necessary to decide what punishment should be meted out to the four gentlemen who were called before the House to account for their conduct, and I entirely concur in the view that this House is not fully competent to decide upon the general merits of the very complicated questions as between Mr. Hood and the Directors of the Cambrian Railway. Therefore, it is somewhat idle to occupy a great amount of time in going into the other parts of the question. The question is a serious one, both as regards Hood and as regards working men generally who may come and give evidence before any Committee of this House. In Oswestry, to which I recently paid a visit, Hood is well known, and though everybody there does not sympathise with him it is felt in the strongest degree that he was dismissed for giving evidence. It has spread something like terrorism among the employees all along the Cambrian line. If Hood had not given evidence he would not have been dismissed, and it is, therefore, idle for the Directors to say that he was dismissed because of his irregularities. The irregularities were three or four years old; they were of a trivial nature; and, considering that they would not have been discovered if Hood had not given evidence, his dismissal is one of the meanest of things. The serious part of the matter is the effect it may have on employers and workmen throughout the country; and certainly if employers find that Parliament treats a matter of this kind lightly, many of them will be encouraged to attempt to control the expressions of opinion of their workmen. There is far too great a tendency among employers to assume the control of a workman's actions and opinions after his day's work is done. I have seen plenty of it in my own constituency, where men have suffered, and even been dismissed, because of their political opinions, and the House will remember the Crewe intimidation cases that were so much talked of two or three years ago. We have now the opportunity to strike a blow against this intimidation, to show to employers everywhere what this House thinks of their interference with the free speech of their workmen. For this supreme reason, therefore, it is desirable that Parliament should take the strictest and most severe view of a transaction of this kind, so that freedom of speech may be preserved. Now, Sir, did the Cambrian Railway Directors commit the offence which is charged against them, and was the effect such as to deter other witnesses from giving evidence? It was said by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that, as the Committee had resolved to take no more evidence, it was, therefore, untrue to say that witnesses had been deterred from coming forward. Technically, the right hon. Gentleman may be correct, but in substance he is certainly not so; and we were assured by Mr. Harford, whose evidence was not rebutted, that witnesses would be deterred. I am a Member of this Committee, and I am a Member of the Committee that is inquiring into the question of shop hours. Both Committees are pursuing precisely the same line in calling both employer and employed; and as the character of the two Committees is the same, it is obvious that if the shopkeepers find that this House is going to treat lightly the case of those who injure any person for giving evidence they in their turn might be emboldened to act in the same way. Many gentlemen would not object to the excitement and notoriety arising from their appearance at the Bar of the House, and possibly the three gentlemen who have appeared at the Bar of the House to-day will be the heroes of their respective domestic circles; they will not regard it as an injury, but rather as a joke. We do not desire that the matter should be so treated; we regard it as a very grave and serious thing; and we should let it be known that severe punishment will follow any intimidation of our witnesses. The Directors have dismissed Hood because of the evidence he gave, and done it in such a clumsy way that we could bring them to account for it; but if they had done it more astutely, and if this Committee had not happened to be sitting, we should have heard nothing of this matter. We want to take some precautions which, if I may say so, will strike terror into the minds of those who might wish to act similarly. I am sure the Resolution of the President of the Board of Trade will not have that effect. There can be no doubt that, in addition to the dismissal of Hood, he was directly censured. I will only read two or three sentences from the report of the meeting at Crewe which was called to nominally re-consider the case—

"On Mr. Hood being called in, the Chairman, addressing him, said:—The Directors believed, when they came to their recent decision relating to yourself, that they had before them all the facts of the case to enable them to come to a judgment. Of course they had all the correspondence, but in consequence of the letters you have written to me the Board have thought it desirable to give you an opportunity of making any statement you may wish to do. You must understand that your dismissal was not because you gave evidence before the Select Committee; you were summoned to give evidence; but you must address yourself to the question of the justification of the statements you made there. We do not object to your giving evidence, but you must justify what you said."

Therefore, while the Directors did not take objection to evidence being given, they did object to the nature of the evidence that was given. That is perfectly clear from the remarks of the hon. Member for Stretford, who did not only question Hood, but bullied him. The hon. Member said at the meeting referred to, following a statement by the Chairman to Hood that he had screened Humphreys—

"No; it is to screen Mr. Hood himself from a gross neglect of duty, and he had better say frankly that the replies to the Select Committee, giving the thing in the way in which he did, were false."

I say it is a monstrous thing for any Director of a Company, having dismissed a workman, and having met to consider whether he should be re-instated, to break out and bully him, and to tell him he had better confess at once that the evidence he gave was false. There is no evidence that Hood said anything but what he believed to be true. Although that meeting at Crewe was ostensibly called for the purpose of considering the re-instatement of Hood, there never was the slightest intention to re-instate him. They simply desired to find out something further incriminating him. Now, Sir, I think the action of the hon. Member for the Scotland Division, in moving the Amendment now before the House, was premature and unfortunate. I rose at the same time as the hon. Member, and my object was to move the substitution of the word "censure" or "reprimand" for the word "admonish." As the Resolution stands it is not, in my opinion, sufficiently strong. There are three degrees of punishment which are open to the House. The weakest of all is to admonish, the next is to reprimand, the third is imprisonment. I am sorry the right hon. Gentleman has chosen the weakest of the three. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian said that reprimand was only resorted to when an apology was refused; but I consider that the apology which was made to the House to-night was of so trumpery a character as to be practically worthless. I am therefore quite prepared, though we cannot now insert the word "reprimand," to vote for a more severe punishment than is proposed. I do not think these gentlemen would be too severely dealt with if they were committed by the House to custody for a week or a fortnight, because they were dealing with persons in a subordinate position to them; and it is the duty of the House to protect freedom of speech, and the free expression of opinion, especially before Parliamentary Committees. With regard to the part of the Amendment which has been so unfortunately moved, I feel that it is impossible, for various reasons, that Hood can be re-instated; and if he were re-instated he might be dismissed in a fortnight on some other charge. But I am strongly of opinion that we ought to make an effort to obtain some pecuniary compensation for him. Although there is no precedent for such a course, there is no reason why we should not create one. I am inclined to think this is the first case of an employer dismissing a workman for giving evidence before a Committee of this House; and if it is at all possible for us to do so, the House is bound, in justice to Hood, to take the course which I suggest. I believe it is possible, and that we should decline to consider the offence purged till compensation is given. We can imprison the Directors till the end of the Session unless meantime they compensate Hood; and that is the course which in the interest of right of free speech and free evidence we ought to take. I presume the Amendment will be put as a whole; and while I will vote for it if it is pressed to a Division, I wish at the same time to make it clearly understood that I am in favour of trying to obtain pecuniary compensation for Hood, and that I disapprove of that part of the Amendment which relates to Hood's re-instatement.

(9.23.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): I feel it my duty to join in the strong expression of opinion made by many hon. Members as to the inadequacy of the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade to meet the case before the House. I do so upon the broad general ground that it is essentially necessary not only to effectively protect a working man in speaking out boldly and truly, especially in connection with Select Committees of this House, but also to produce a wholesome effect generally between employers and employed, and to show that we will do our utmost to protect working men against the tyranny sometimes exercised against them by an employer, by the most insidious and roundabout methods, to punish an employee who, by giving evidence or otherwise, has brought himself into disfavour. A case of this kind directly affects us because affecting the Privileges of this honourable House. There are other cases, which touch us quite as much, where intimidation and the most insidious and roundabout influence is indirectly used by employers to influence and intimidate workmen as to their votes at Parliamentary elections. I have unfortunately myself had experience of such cases, and these make me think it is all the more incumbent upon us to declare in the strongest manner possible our strong reprobation of those who make such attempts against the liberty of the subject. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade made a lame and halting apology in defence of the conduct of the Directors. He laid great stress not on the strong points in the Special Report—that the Directors had summoned this man and censured him for what he said before the Committee—but he laid the greatest stress on the point that Hood was not dismissed for what he said before the Committee, but for other charges arising out of that evidence. It afterwards transpired from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bridgeton that these charges arose from the action of the manager Conacher, who, the day before Hood was coming up to give evidence before the Committee, wrote to the authorities of another railway asking them to rake up some offences that were several years old and that that Company had charged against Hood. That shows the insidious and indirect methods adopted by some to shield themselves and to do injury to others. I consider that those expressions of these gentlemen, so far from being an ample and full apology were an emphasising of their original offence, were an additional insult to this House, if it be an insult at all to commit a breach of the Privileges of this House, that they should stand up one after would do it again if occasion arose. And they had no word of regret to express for the injustice they had committed and the grossly unfair way in which they had got rid of their employee for doing his simple duty. The case is even worse than that, because the hon. Member for Stretford Division said no word implying that they regretted what had been done by them to their servant. And when it came to their champion in the course of the Debate, the hon. Member for Durham City, to speak in their defence, he proceeded to do so in the most unfair and most partial and biased speech. In that speech he went far beyond what was in any sense required; he proceeded, in a long tirade against Hood, to blacken his character. The Directors having deprived the man of his position, their champion gets up in the House and, so far from expressing the least regret, proceeds in a long tirade against the man, in order to prove that he was a thief and a scoundrel, or something worse. I think that is a very great shame. Unfortunately it is not open to us to move any further Amendment; but if opportunity had offered I would have been glad to move that this man Hood, the ex-stationmaster, who has been vilified by a Member of this House, should be summoned to give his own account of the matter at the Bar of the House. We have heard his accusers, and he has been outside perhaps wronged for life without the possibility of saying anything except at second-hand by hon. Members who may be willing to espouse his cause in this House. The hon. Member and his colleagues stand up with brazen effrontery; they have no word of regret or repentance to express, and then through their friends in this House they proceed to vilify the victim of their tyrannical conduct. What we have to do is, if possible, to protect labouring men who may be summoned before Royal Commissions or Select Committees of the House from fear of the consequences of their bold and truthful demeanour before these Commissions or Committees. I was astonished at the puerile argument to which the right hon. Gentleman lent himself when he asked us to accept, as a sound argument, that no harm would be done because this Committee had decided that no further witnesses were necessary, and, therefore, no further witness could be deterred from giving evidence in the future. The right hon. Gentleman knows that there are many other Commissions and Committees, such as the Commission on Labour and the Committee on Mining Royalties, and he knows perfectly well that the effect of action such as the Directors of this Company pursued if not summarily dealt with by some action of this House will reach far into the future. And it is for the purpose of protecting those who may be concerned in giving truthful evidence on behalf of the oppressed and down-trodden of this country, and on behalf of those men who are concerned in any particular inquiry, that we demand that the strongest steps should be taken compatible with the dignity of this House, and compatible with the exercise of the undoubted authority which this House possesses. I believe it is possible for this House to proceed not only by way of admonition, but also by way of reprimand, and if the House thought that was not a severe enough course it would be possible to proceed by way of fine or actual imprisonment. That course of action has not been adopted for some considerable period, but I feel certain if it could be adopted it would be the most salutary course which could be taken by us on this occasion. As to the hon. Member for Stretford and his colleagues, I do not do them injustice when I say they will not feel the admonition which may be passed upon them. But I hope they will feel that it reflects no credit upon them. But what we want to see is what the effect will be upon the labouring classes who are most directly interested in this matter, and whose interests we have to protect for the future. And I am quite sure this will be the general feeling amongst men who may be required on future occasions to give evidence, that if nothing more is done by this House to mark the condemnation of the Members of this House of the action of those Directors, the men outside will say, "What does the House of Commons care for the suffering caused by the oppression and tyranny exercised by our employers over us; we are marked men whenever we give evidence in our own interest which is against the interest of the employers, and we will not risk the lives and happiness of ourselves and families by subjecting ourselves to any danger or risks in giving evidence in the future." If instead of merely admonishing these gentlemen we were to take a further step and censure them, or inflict a pecuniary fine, that would restore confidence in those whose confidence in our proceedings has been so rudely shaken. That is the course I should like to see adopted. I think it would be a better course than the very feeble attempt that the right hon. Gentleman is making to sustain the Privileges of this House by the Motion he has made. And I think it would be a better and more salutary course to censure those gentlemen even than to hand them over to the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms, to be imprisoned in the Clock Tower, or Newgate, or Holloway. If you did that they would become the same as prisoners under the Coercion Act in Ireland, and I would not be surprised if after a short incarceration in the Clock Tower they were received with open arms and processions, and banquets were organised in their behalf. I am not in favour of the extreme penalty of sending these gentlemen to prison, but I do think the infliction of a pecuniary fine would have all the beneficial effect which we can obtain. In default of that action we can only vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend the Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool, which is to the effect that the Directors should show their contrition for the offence of which they have been guilty by compensating the victim of their somewhat high-handed and arbitrary proceedings. The point has been taken by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian that we cannot enforce a decision of that kind. I am very sorry if it be the case that we cannot enforce a decision of that kind should it be arrived at by the House; and I am quite certain that that would be, next after the infliction of a fine, the best course we could adopt, because, if we compelled those Directors to show their regret for what they have done by giving some compensation for the wrong they have subjected this man to, and for the way in which he has been attacked and vilified in this House, that would mark our sense of the enormity of the offence. I should like them to be summoned to the Bar for a moment, and told that either they must compensate this man whom they so grossly wronged, or receive from the House a very much stronger condemnation of their conduct. Such compensation might be very fairly combined with the suggestion of a fine, because, if they were summoned to the Bar and informed that they would be fined in the absence of giving some compensation to this man, they would be willing, rather than pay a heavy fine, to give some compensation commensurate to the injury which has been inflicted. I am quite sure a gross wrong will be done to the poorer classes of our fellow-citizens unless we show our determination to protect against such insidious acts of tyranny those who are dependent on others who have in their hands the power to wrong them.

(9.50.) MR. JAMES ELLIS (Leicestershire, Bosworth): It is quite certain to my mind that if there had not been a Committee to inquire into the hours of labour of railway servants this man would have remained a respected stationmaster in the service of the Company. He has been deprived by the act of this Board of Directors of something like £90, and what we ought to do is to leave it to the authorities to settle what this man ought to receive for the loss of £90 a year after 20 years' service. And if we cannot exact the money from the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company, let us pay it—let the Treasury vote a sum of money to this man. It is our duty to put this man in the same position that he was in before. If this man had been a man in high position there would be no question at all on the part of the Government or of this House about making compensation for any loss which he has sustained in consequence of the evidence he has given. But, as he is a poor man, a weak and defenceless man, we ought to stand up for him far more than for a man of position.

*(9.52.) MR. SOMERVELL (Ayr, &c.): So far as the Motion which has been proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade goes, it appears to me that it is really as far as the House can be expected to go. But I do not base my support of that Resolution on the remarks with which the right hon. Gentleman accompanied it. Those remarks appeared to me to be to a certain extent biased, and, so far as I am personally concerned, my bias goes exactly in the opposite direction. But when a question which concerns the Privilege or honour of the House is at stake, one is bound to look to a great extent to the advice tendered by the oldest and most experienced gentleman who sits on the Front Opposition Bench. And it is because of the speech in which the right hon. Gentleman as Leader of the Opposition supported that Motion that I intend to vote for it. That speech was delivered with admirable tact. There was not the slightest bias in favour of one party or another; but it was delivered with the object of showing what the power of the House was, and how far it was possible for the House to go. I have every sympathy with the Amendment which has been moved, and I must say I do think that the man Hood has been very badly treated indeed. But it has been forcibly pointed out by two right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Opposition Bench that any Amendment the House might adopt would be futile because it has not the means of carrying it out, and I feel I cannot see my way to support any Motion the House could not enforce. I may also be allowed to allude to the silence of the President of the Board of Trade. We have heard a speech from an hon. and learned Member—injudicious and ill-considered and teeming with inaccuracies, and one of those inaccuracies was that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had on Tuesday stated that there were two sides on the Committee. I heard that speech, and I read it in the Times. What I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say was that there were two sides—the Directors of the Railway Companies and the Amalgamated Society of Railway Servants—who wished to place their views before the Committee.

When a question of this kind is discussed the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade might have got up to correct the inaccuracy which the hon. and learned Member below the Gangway (Mr. Milvain) put into his mouth. This question is also one accompanied by some difficulty, because all the gentlemen who are summoned to the Bar are placed in the same position. I feel great hesitation as between the action of Mr. Conacher and the action of the Directors. In considering how this question ever got before the House at all we have to consider how it is that Hood got into the witness-box. It was owing to Mr. Conacher having stated in the witness-box that Hood was suspended and fined a fortnight's pay in consequence of the accident at Ellesmere, where he was stationmaster. In a subsequent portion of his evidence Conacher contradicted that statement. Hood saw this statement in the local papers, a statement gravely affecting his position, but the correction was not reported; he wrote a perfectly proper letter to the Manager, in which he gave the names of the papers and the dates of the issues, stated what was contained in them, and asked for leave to correct the misstatement before the Committee and in the papers. Conacher took no notice of his applications to give evidence, and refused him permission to correct the statement, whereas if he had said, "This report in the local papers contains statements which are incorrect, I have corrected those statements in the Committee, and I will be very happy if the correction is given to the local papers"—if that had been done you would never have heard anything about the case at all. But the next issue of another local paper came out; again there was the misstatement and no correction. Hood wrote to the Manager and received no reply at all. Hood then came up to the Committee and gave his evidence, and on the day following the Manager, who refused permission to write to the paper to correct the former inaccuracy, wrote to that very paper and said—

"With reference to the statement made yesterday by John Hood before the Select Committee on Railway Servants (Hours of Labour), I shall feel obliged if you will allow me to say I adhere to every word I said with reference to him."

It thus appears that not only was Hood not allowed to write to the paper and correct a statement which the Manager knew to be perfectly untrue; but the Manager wrote to the paper and confirmed that untrue statement. That appears to me to show bias on the part of the Manager. There is also the fact that he wrote on the very day Hood went to London to give evidence to the London and North-Western Railway to get proof of a miserable charge about the carriage of a hamper Hood sent to his son. These actions are clear and conclusive proof that the statement that Hood made that he was a marked man was perfectly true. I could give you instance after instance to show that Mr. Conacher deliberately endeavoured to give the Committee a false impression as to what occurred. I will only give one instance. Mr. Hood stated that he had certain duty forced upon him and his clerks. Mr. Conacher before the Committee said:—

"It is not true that the duty was forced upon Hood and his clerks; he offered to do it voluntarily."

and in support of the statement he produced a telegram from Hood offering to do the duty. I asked Mr. Conacher if that was the first communication that took place between him and Hood on the subject, and he answered "Yes." But he had in his possession at the time, and he produced, a letter which showed that he had first ordered one of Hood's clerks to go and do the duty at this station, and when that man proved to be incompetent he ordered another clerk to go, and it was only then that Hood offered to assist. So far from the duty having been voluntarily undertaken by Hood and his clerks, they were on two separate occasions ordered to do this duty. That was not acting fairly and honestly by the Committee. It was endeavouring to give a false impression of the statement made. It was endeavouring to convey the impression to the Committee that neither Hood nor his clerks had been ordered to do this duty, but that the whole thing emanated from Mr. Hood as a voluntary act. We see from the evidence of the Chairman that the whole of this matter was brought before the Board on the initiation of Mr. Conacher, and that they came to a decision in ten or fifteen minutes upon a statement by Mr. Conacher. I maintain that the man who has really occasioned this breach of Privilege is Mr. Conacher, and Mr. Conacher alone, and it is only right that he should be dealt with in a more severe manner than the others. As a Member of the Committee, and having examined most of the witnesses at some length, I have thought it right to point out to the House one or two facts which I think exonerate the Directors and the hon. Member for Stretford from anything more than carelessness in taking the representations of their Manager, and not looking into the matter themselves. I have endeavoured to show to the House that the Manager was not acting in a fair and just way; that he was influenced by vindictive feelings towards his subordinate; that he trumped-up every little matter to prejudice the man; and that it was owing to the action of Mr. Conacher that Hood ever gave evidence, was then dismissed, and that the matter ever came before the Committee at all.

(10.7.) MR. LOCKWOOD (York): Anyone who has taken the trouble to read through the evidence can have come to no other conclusion than that the hon. and learned Member who has just addressed the House rendered yeoman service on the Committee. From first to last he had the courage to tackle these men, and it is in the main owing to his indefatigable exertions that these men have been brought to book at the Bar of this House. I sympathise with the position in which the hon. and learned Member finds himself, because he says he is going to vote in accordance with the wishes of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. I find myself in precisely the same position, but the only difference between us is that while he is going to vote for the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman, I intend to take an entirely opposite course. I am sure there was no one who listened to the speech of the President of the Board of Trade who did not feel that it was a speech in palliation and in extenuation of the Directors of the Company. We have heard the apology read by an hon. Member of this House, and I do not join in the general eulogium passed on that hon. Member for one reason alone. I do not want it to go to the outside world that we are treating a Member of this House in a different way to that in which we would be disposed to treat persons who are not Members of this House. We heard the apology read by the hon. Member. The Chairman of the Company added not a word to the apology. The Manager of the Company stood mum at the Bar of the House. We heard from Mr. Buckley that he wished to join his voice to the apologetic voice of the hon. Member for Stretford. A Committee of this House have found that these men have taken a course which is likely to deter working men from coming forward to give evidence. These men, in making their apology, have asserted that they had no such intention, and that has been accepted by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. But when the President of the Board of Trade came to deal with his case he proceeded, as far as he possibly could, to make a speech in defence of the men who had pleaded guilty at the Bar of the House. It is true, when the right hon. Gentleman came to deal with certain counts of the indictment, that he pronounced it to be a very serious matter, but again we had extenuation and assurances that this was an evil that had been wrought by want of thought more than by want of heart. I entirely disagree with the right hon. Gentleman. His speech has been, to my mind, so eminently unsatisfactory that I cannot vote for the Motion. We have had an Amendment moved, but we are told it is an Amendment to which no practical effect can be given by this House. I accept the Amendment for this reason, that it deals with this offence in the spirit in which it ought to be dealt with. It recognises the enormity of the offence, and there is no such recognition in the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman. Is not this a matter that ought to be looked upon seriously? I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, that if we are to distinguish between these persons, it is to the Manager that we ought to ascribe the greatest amount of blame. But they stand charged together; they are dealt with on the same terms by the Report of the Committee. What was their conduct? How was it that this man Hood was called on to give evidence at all? We find that certain things are laid to his charge which never have been laid to his charge before. Inaccurate statements are made by the hon. and learned Member for the City of Durham, who made an attack on Mr. Hood. I do not understand that the hon. and learned Member, when he was face to face with Mr. Hood in the Committee Room, made any criminal charge against him. I would ask my hon. and learned Friend whether, on reflection, he would not come to this conclusion, that if he thinks a criminal charge should be made against this man it would not be fair to make it to his face, instead of behind his back?

MR. MILVAIN: It was made to his face when he came before the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company, and was asked to justify his evidence.

MR. LOCKWOOD: I beg to differ from the hon. and learned Member. I have read the evidence very carefully. I was not dealing with what any of the Directors had the courage to do. I was referring to what my hon. and learned Friend himself had done, and I want to know where he took upon himself the responsibility of making a criminal charge against Hood? Do not let him put it upon men who stand at the Bar of the House; they have enough to answer for. Let the hon. and learned Member point out to me any portion of the evidence in which he had the courage, when he was face to face with this man, to make a charge of criminality against him. Were the Directors prepared to make such a charge? If they were, let them bring it. Hood is prepared to meet any such charge, and I hope for the sake of his pocket the Directors will follow the advice, for whether we compensate him in this House or not, if anyone is foolish enough to initiate criminal proceedings against Hood he will be amply recompensed in heavy damages for malicious prosecution. Let us consider the conduct of these persons at the Bar. In 1889 there was a dispute about a hamper and 1s. 7d., and somewhat strong language was used in the correspondence between Hood and other officials connected with the railway. On the 16th July Mr. Hood was going to give evidence before the impartial and learned Gentlemen on the other side of the House. On the 15th July Mr. Conacher writes to Mr. Birtwhistle about the hamper and the 1s. 7d. which happened in 1889—

That was before he knew or heard one tittle of the evidence of Hood. Hood had written to Conacher asking leave to give evidence, and he made other requests. The other matters are dealt with, but there is discreet silence in the answer with regard to the permission asked to give evidence. Hood comes and gives his evidence, and on the 7th August he is dismissed. On the 30th September he is brought before the Court of Appeal. I think from what I have seen of this Court of Appeal that the hon. Member for the Stretford Division of Lancashire must have acquired his judicial experience on the Continent, because the way he addressed the prisoner reminds me very much of the accounts one sees of judicial proceedings in France. I think it was the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division of Glasgow who told us how this opportunity for justification was in reality merely an opportunity for repeated accusations and interruptions. Remember this when dealing with the men at the Bar, whether this is a case for palliation or extenuation. Hood is brought before his accusers, but precious little opportunity does he get for explanation. No, Sir, the hon. Member for the Stretford Division, when Hood is brought before the Directors, does not accuse him of gross neglect of duty; but, in effect, he is told that he had better say the replies to the Select Committee given in the way he did were false, which meant that if Hood went down on his knees before this almighty Board of Directors, apologised, and withdrew the statements, they would pardon him. Is that the way Committees of the House are to be treated? Is that the way we are to have working men coerced by the people to whom they look for their daily bread? If this is to be a precedent for the conduct of masters over the men they employ, then you may give up your Labour Commission and every other inquiry where working men are concerned, for you close every avenue through which truth can be ascertained. Then when you get this gentleman before the Committee the question arises, Why has this man been dismissed? If we are to judge of the bona fides of these gentlemen, let me recommend hon. Members to look at the process of toothdrawing which has to be resorted to in the Committee to ascertain from Mr. Conacher, or Mr. Buckley the Chairman, why this man had been dismissed at all. Conacher is the first witness. He deprecates the suggestion that Hood was dismissed because of his evidence. “I cannot tell you,” he says, “I had nothing to do with it. It is the Directors. It is Mr. Buckley. Wait till he comes.” When Mr. Buckley comes, then he fences for column after column with the somewhat astute examination of some Members of the Committee. Let me read you the cross-examination, not by a hostile Member, but by the Chairman of the Committee, who was endeavouring to ascertain how it came about that this man was dismissed. The House must hear this and judge of the guilt of these men. If this was a mere mistake then treat the Directors with leniency, but if it was a flagrant case, do not let us be afraid to deal with these men. This is the cross-examination of Mr. Buckley who Conacher told the Committee would be able to say how it came about that Hood was dismissed.

“I want (said the Chairman) to ask you some questions about the first meeting at which Mr. Hood was dismissed. Who brought the case before you?—The case was brought before us, of course, by our Manager in the first instance, by Mr. Conacher. He brought all these cases before us with very great reservation. I recollect his reluctance to say very much about it. He said—"Some cases here require your attention, and I wish you to deal with them as you think fit, quite independently of me."—What did he bring before you in reference to Mr. Hood?—I think there was this case of Thomas on that occasion, and this case of Mr. Hood, cases of men who had certainly been connected with giving evidence here. But what did he bring before you with reference to Mr. Hood?—Of course, I knew beforehand what was going to come up before the Board. Mr. Conacher always acted to a certain extent under my instructions in matters which were to be brought forward or left out at the Boards, if they were not ready for discussion, and in this case of Mr. Hood's the matter was brought before the Board, and it was brought before the Board after considering not only the evidence but the antecedents of Mr. Hood.—But what was brought before the Board?—The question of Mr. Hood's conduct.—In what way?—In relation to the Company, and the question primarily of his fitness and trustworthiness for an office such as that of agent for a station of the Company.—But what had Mr. Hood done which necessitated the raising of that question?—Mr. Hood had acted in a manner which we thought, at all events, was not trustworthy towards his employers.—In what way?—I will say in what way. First of all, sending us in what we then discovered for the first time (it was discovered about that time) to be a false pay sheet. This was only discovered after Mr. Hood had given his evidence here."

And so it was that this man fenced, rather than taking the position which the Directors are now anxious to make us believe they honestly took, now that they throw themselves upon our mercy, and ask us, although they have done this, to let them off as easily as possible. Let me return to my hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Milvain) who made an attack upon Hood, which I hope by this time he regrets. The hon. and learned Gentleman shakes his head, but I hope, on reflection, he will regret. Let me put this to my hon. and learned Friend. He says that the evidence of Hood was inaccurate, and he has charged him with making false statements, knowing them to be false. Was Mr. Hood the only man who made mistakes in his evidence? Conacher, whom my hon. and learned Friend is anxious to champion, made some very serious mistakes. First of all, he stated it was not true that Hood had been suspended for signing a memorial in favour of Humphreys. It was a serious thing to suspend a man for a fortnight because he attached his name to a memorial in aid of a fellow-workman. I can well understand Conacher not wishing the Committee to believe that he had done such a thing. Conacher forgot that he recommended the Directors to dismiss this man. It is put in a question by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the Bridgeton Division, in which, when addressing Buckley, he pointed out that Conacher, although he denied that he recommended this dismissal, afterwards, on being asked at the meeting whether Hood ought to be kept in the Company's service, said he told the Directors he ought not. I do not accuse Conacher of perjury because of this. It is a mistake, and that is all that can be alleged against Hood. That there may have been some inaccuracies in his evidence may be true, but that he has been guilty of fraud or lacking in bona fides I challenge any hon. Member who reads this book (the Special Report of the Select Committee on Railway Servants Hours of Labour) to pronounce an adverse opinion. The hon. Member for Camborne said he wished Hood was here to answer this charge. The hon. Member said it was admitted that Hood could not come here to meet the charge. I think it is only fair to Hood that the attention of the House should be called to a letter written by him, and which will be found in the Appendix 3. It is included in the Report. I think the concluding words of that letter should, in justice to this man, be read and recorded in this Debate. After dealing with the question of pension, he says—

"This is a cruel and unjust charge, and I can only say that never in all my life have I made out a false pay sheet."

I have pointed out what I consider the great element in the case against these Directors. I find no adequate expression of opinion by right hon. Gentlemen on the Front Bench below me, and, much as I regret it, I am not able to take their advice.

(10.32.) SIR J. PEASE (Durham, Barnard Castle) : Having sat patiently through nearly the whole of the long inquiries on this Committee, I desire to make a few observations on the present position of the case. I regret that I have not that clearness of position which the hon. Member for the Bridgeton Division, the hon. Member for York, and the hon. Member for Durham appear to have. I gave thanks during that Committee that it had never been my lot to sit under such a Chairman as that of the Cambrian Railway Company. The hon. Member for York and the hon. Member for Durham—whose ability to digest evidence I would not for one moment deny—have formed very different opinions, and I wish I could form as strong an opinion as either of them. I had all the documents through my hands, and more confused management, more unjustifiable working, and a more confused Board I think it impossible to conceive. That confusion is rendered greater, if possible, by the numerous lucid speeches made on the evidence in the case. It seems to me, after a careful study of Sir Erskine May's book, that there are two special precedents which ought to actuate us in looking at this question. One dates back to 1728, when Sir William Rich, a prisoner in the Fleet, was brought before a Committee of this House, sitting on Gaols, in order to give evidence. He was taken back to the Fleet, and the Governor, Mr. Pembroke, loaded him with leg-irons and handcuffs, and he endured great hardship and suffering. The House came to the conclusion that that was a breach of Privilege, and Mr. Pembroke was ordered into custody on the 23rd of the month, and on the 8th of the following month I find an order that he was to be brought before the Committee on Gaols as often as that Committee might desire. I can find in the Journals no order for his discharge, and for all I know he may be in the Clock Tower now. The other case is more modern, but also dates back to the last century. There the House declared it was a grievous and heinous offence against the Privileges of the House to call to account or censure a witness who had given evidence before a Committee of this House. It appears to me that these Directors have been guilty of breach of Privilege in both respects. Their conduct toward stationmaster Hood in examining him in that rough-and-ready, and, as it has been described, bullying manner, was calculated, no doubt, quite as much as by leg-irons and handcuffs, to prevent other railway servants giving evidence before the Committee. The other offence of which they were guilty was no doubt during that interview when they censured him for the evidence he gave. If I were asked to say Hood would not have been properly discharged for the irregularities if he had not given the evidence, I should say he was deserving of discharge, but I do not think I should go so far as to say I would have discharged him myself. This is one of the cases where leniency and discipline would have been carried out by moving him to some other place where he might have worked out for himself a rather better character than he seemed to bear in connection with the station mentioned. I very much doubt his character, but for the consideration of the question before the House we may assume that it was a perfect character. We have all come to the conclusion that there is a grave breach of the Privileges of the House, and the question is, how are we going to act in order to vindicate the position of the House, and to enable other witnesses to come before Committees without being in danger of losing their situations, or being in any way bullied by any Board of Directors? If we take the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman opposite, it seems to many of my hon. Friends that we do not express ourselves strongly enough, and the hon. Member for the Scotland Division has added words which the hon. Member for York says he can accept. It is very difficult for me to accept those words. There is an old proverb in Yorkshire which says, "It is no use showing your teeth unless you are prepared to bite." We cannot ask the Directors to re-instate the man. Then are we going to fine them? The right hon. Member for Midlothian says you cannot fine them. Are you going to lock them up? That is logical, and had better be moved by those who so desire to amend the Resolution. That logically follows the precedent of Mr. Pembroke. In the meantime, I do hope the House will come to some such conclusion on this question, whether we accept the Resolution of the President of the Board of Trade, or whether we amend it, as is logical and practical, on this occasion. The proposal to exact compensation when we have no power to do anything of the kind seems to me to be below the dignity of this House, and the other alternative, that the stationmaster should be re-instated, no one evidently desires to support. If these Directors had compensated this man, we should have had very little to say, but they have very unwisely stuck to the line of action they at first took; but I am not prepared to support the Amendment, and I have, therefore, no alternative but to support the Motion of the President of the Board of Trade.

(10.41.) MR. PICTON (Leicester): If I am in Order, of which I am not certain, I should like to move an Amendment to the Amendment. I wish to move to leave out all the words after "that," up to and including "otherwise," so that the Amendment would read—

"And declines to regard the Directors as having purged their contempt until they have compensated," &c.

The object is to leave out the suggestion that the man should be re-instated, and I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether I should be in Order?

MR. SPEAKER: It would be in Order.

MR. PICTON: Then I shall be very glad to move this further Amendment. We have two propositions before us. The first is that of the President of the Board of Trade, which is to the effect that these gentlemen shall be brought up and admonished by you, Mr. Speaker, and I am quite sure that any admonition you may address to these gentlemen will make a very profound impression on them. But I cannot help thinking that you, as the voice of the House, will necessarily be influenced in your admonition by the apparent feeling of the House; and it strikes me that if the Resolution is left simply as it has been moved by the right hon. Gentleman, it will not sufficiently express the sense entertained by a very large, important, and representative portion of this House, that a very grave wrong has been committed in tampering with a witness who came up before a Committee of this House. I cannot too deeply regret that ancient usage compels us to speak so much of the Privileges of this House. It is not the Privileges of the House we are dealing with so much to-night as with the rights of the people of this country. In old times undoubtedly the Privilege of this House was a kind of abstraction representing the rights of the commonalty of this country to have justice done to them notwithstanding the preponderance of powers that were very formidable in those times, but are not so formidable now. But those times are gone, and the phrase "the Privilege of this House" has a somewhat invidious meaning, that it has taken upon itself some special rights that are not allowed to other subjects of the Queen. What we really mean is that this House stands as the guardian of the people of this country; and if we are to have gentlemen who have committed a grave offence against the people coming up to this House and being allowed, after making an apology such as we have heard this evening, to go otherwise scatheless away, I want to know what security the poor man will have hereafter that he can give his testimony before a Committee of this House without suffering for it? This man Hood has lost his situation. He has obtained another one. I am told that he has taken the position of agent to a Liberal Unionist organisation. (Laughter.) I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham (Mr. J. Chamberlain) joins in the cheer at the promotion of Mr. Hood. At any rate it is clear that Gentlemen on this side of the House, and in this quarter of it especially (below the Gangway), have no prejudice in the matter. We are judging the case quite impartially and regardless of any Party consideration, and I only wish that all Party considerations could be entirely eliminated from the issue. Clearly our only object is that witnesses in future, coming before Committees of this House, should feel that their positions will be safeguarded by this House. But how can that be the case if a record like this, which has come to us in a

Sir J. Pease

Special Report of the Committee, goes forth to the world with no stronger comment than is afforded by the Resolution of the President of the Board of Trade? We find in the evidence with respect to the meeting at Crewe between the Directors of the Cambrian Railway and Mr. Hood this question—

"The Chairman: Are there any other points you wish to make statements upon, Mr. Hood?"

I wish hon. Members would give attention to what I consider the most pathetic reply—

"I can only say I very much regret going before the Committee. (He means the Committee of this House.) But I feel the matter deeply, and I hope the Directors will not dismiss me."

Is that the position in which a man should be placed who has given honest testimony according to the best of his ability before a Committee of this House? He is reduced to say before these men—

"I can only say I now very much regret going before this Committee."

Is this House prepared quietly to hear that said by witnesses coming before the Committees of this House? Are they only to throw themselves upon the mercy of the men they have offended by coming before the Parliament of their country? I think this would not only be lowering the position of this House, but it would be an injury to the people of this country suffering under grievances which can only be redressed by those people coming before this House, perhaps to the offence of their employers. If he had moved that the gentlemen who came to the Bar should be reprimanded by you, I should have thought it would be more adequate, because it would be a censure upon them; it would be realised by all their countrymen, and they themselves would have felt it more deeply. But I confess myself it is much less an offence against this House than against the rights of Englishmen through this House. Much less offences have been visited in times past by imprisonment. I am not in favour of coercion in this country or in Ireland, and, therefore, I desire to avoid imprisonment as much as possible; but I wish that the Resolution proposed had been more adequate. I do not agree with the idea of endeavouring to re-instate Mr. Hood, because I think it would be a very uncomfortable position for him to occupy. But I would suggest that we should not recognise the repentance of these gentlemen as adequate unless they compensate in some way Mr. Hood for wrong that has been done him. I therefore beg to move an Amendment to that effect.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment, to leave out from the words "they have," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "compensated John Hood."—
(Mr. Picton.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

(10.53.) MR. CRAWFORD (Lanark, N.E.): As a Member of the Committee I may be, perhaps, allowed to say a few words. The question is one of considerable difficulty, as most of the speakers on this side acknowledged; and I agree most humbly and deferentially with the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian subject to one condition: that the Motion proposed by the President of the Board of Trade might have been adequate. But there is one point which I must call the attention of the House to: I must express my regret, as my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bridgeton Division expressed his regret, that the speech in which that Motion was introduced was in my view so entirely apologetic for these men that have been brought before the House that if this Resolution is to be passed upon that Preamble these men might pass from the House with a feather in their caps rather than with any feeling that they have incurred the censure of this House. That, in my opinion, is the origin of the discussion which I think many of us have rather felt to be too long. I think we should have come to a unanimous conclusion if the Chairman of the Committee had not introduced his Motion in what, to my great and sincere regret, I must describe as a very one-sided speech; because I entirely and warmly concur with my right hon. Friend the Member for the Bridgeton Division when he said that the right hon. Gentleman presided over this Committee, whose Sittings have now extended over two Sessions, with the utmost fairness and impartiality. And that increases my regret, which I cannot conceal, that I did not think his speech was calculated to bring the House to a unanimous conclusion, because it is obvious he might have anticipated what has happened on account of this man being dismissed from his employment for giving evidence before a Committee of this House was likely to arise as it has arisen, and that it was likely to arouse, as it has aroused, a very strong feeling on these Benches. It is not necessary to say that the man was a perfect character; because many men in his position would not stand the test if subjected to strict examination. Now that the question has been forced upon the House, I feel it my duty to say that the man was most thoroughly ill-used. He was ill-used by these Directors. If the man's dismissal is absolutely justifiable it may be that no breach of Privilege of the House has been committed at all, because that is a thing which would not deter other witnesses from giving evidence before a Committee of this House. But from the turn this discussion has taken I have no hesitation in saying that these Directors behaved most shamefully towards him. They resolved to crush him; they took a spite against him; they raked up everything they could against him. At the same time, I quite feel that it is a very unwise and doubtful policy on our part to enter upon any course which the House has not full power to carry out. Except for that reason, I should have been very willing to assent to the proposal made by the Chairman of the Committee and accepted by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Liberal Party. I think the proposal has been tenderly treated on both sides of the House. That is unfortunate. I think it is calculated to produce a wrong impression on the public of the view we take of the case; and accordingly, if the hon. Member for Leicester goes to a Division, I shall feel bound, with some reluctance, to follow him into the Lobby in support of his Motion.

(10.57.) Mr. PHILIPPS (Lanark, Mid): An hon. Member has asked if Mr. Hood, having got employment as an election agent for the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, could be said to have received compensation? That might be so, except for the fact that the General Election is not very far off; and, under these circumstances, the post of Liberal Unionist agent can hardly be considered permanent compensation. But I am sure many hon. Members on the other side of the House feel just as keenly as we do on this side of the House that this poor man ought to have compensation from someone or other. My hon. and learned Friend the Member for York City suggested that if the Directors of the Cambrian Railway would only take the advice of the hon. and learned Member for the City of Durham they would bring a criminal charge against this man, and that Mr. Hood might then have his compensation in the form of an action for malicious prosecution. I want to point out another way, which I think an almost infallible way, for securing Mr. Hood adequate compensation for the loss of his situation. I am glad to see the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the City of Durham in his place. He takes advantage of his position in this House to say that, from his knowledge of the evidence, a criminal charge might have been brought against Mr. Hood. He knows what the position is; he is a lawyer, and he knows that for what he says in this House he is covered by Privilege of Parliament, and Mr. Hood cannot make him responsible. The hon. and learned Member for Durham should repeat out of the House what he has said in the House to-night against Hood, and then Hood would be able to obtain compensation in the shape of damages for slander. The hon. Member should have the courage of his convictions, and not shelter himself under his privileges as a Member of Parliament, and then he would give the poor man a chance of obtaining a remedy.

MR. MILVAIN: I would point out to the hon. Member that Hood has a remedy, for he can bring an action for wrongful dismissal.

(11.3.) MR. MAC NEILL (Donegal, S.): I will intervene for only a short time in this Debate. As a Member of the Committee, I think I ought to say something with regard to this matter. I have come to the conclusion that this poor man Hood was dismissed simply because of the evidence he gave before the Committee with reference to the hours of labour on the Cambrian Railway. The hon. and learned Member for Durham (Mr. Milvain) has shown himself to-night in his true colours. He seems to have been holding a brief against this unfortunate man. The hon. and learned Gentleman should have the courage of his convictions, as my hon. Friend (Mr. Philipps) says, and not shelter himself under his Parliamentary privileges. I hope that he will repeat outside the House what he has said inside these walls against Hood, and that Hood in proceeding against him will not employ counsel, but act in his own behalf. Let us now come to the evidence. The Directors said to this man Hood—

"You must understand that your dismissal is not due to your giving evidence before the Select Committee. You were summoned to give evidence, and you must now address yourself to the question of justification of the charges you have made."

These gentlemen, therefore, constituted themselves a Court of Appeal—a sort of Punch and Judy Star Chamber—with regard to the evidence which was given before a Committee of this House. If this kind of thing is to continue Parliamentary Privilege and evidence given before the Committees of this House will be of no value at all. I always considered that when a witness went into the witness chair in the Committee Room upstairs he was absolutely protected; and I hope that the House will vindicate its Privileges in this matter. If this goes on it will be impossible to say that there is not one law for the rich and another for the poor. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Derby has stated with his usual knowledge and accuracy that we cannot compel the Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company to compensate this man Hood. That is true, but the right hon. Gentleman and every lawyer knows very well that it is possible to make arrangements whereby compensation can be given. In former days Privilege was a very trustworthy weapon, but I ask right hon. and hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House whether it is at all valuable in the circumstances of the present case. Certain gentlemen come forward and make a miserable kind of an apology in which they justify their conduct, saying they were acting as they did in the public service. How can that in any way atone for their behaviour? The hon. Member for Stretford showed by his attitude and gestures that he is determined to persevere in the course of action he has adopted towards this man. Then up started the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade and proposed a Resolution which fitted in with the apology in a very extraordinary manner. It almost seemed as if the Resolution and the apology must have been constructed at one and the same time. Is it likely that in vindicating the Privileges of this House we should allow it to be treated in this way? Judging from the apology and from the Resolution, the apology and the Resolution were constructed together—they bear a remarkable family likeness. There has been no atonement on the part of these men, no repentance; they vindicate their conduct. They have been convicted of intimidating witnesses; they have deprived Hood of his means of livelihood; and, that being so, I say that the Privileges of this House have not been vindicated. I shall certainly vote for the Amendment of my hon. Friend.

(11.14.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not rise to continue the Debate. I rise simply to appeal to the House to come to a decision on the question. I am sure that every hon. Member, whether he agrees with the Resolution proposed by my right hon. Friend, or whether he agrees with the Amendment, must feel that every view of this subject has been adequately discussed. If the Resolution of my right hon. Friend is carried it will be the duty of Mr. Speaker to admonish these gentlemen who were called to the Bar this afternoon; and I think it will be only proper that the proceedings of the House on this question should be concluded this evening in time to allow Mr. Speaker an opportunity of carrying this duty out.

MR. HUNTER (Aberdeen, N.): I do not believe there is any hon. Member in this House who believes—and I doubt whether there is any hon. Member who is capable of believing—that Hood would have been dismissed from his office if there had not been this inquiry and this Committee, and I will not enter into any metaphysical inquiry as to the state of the mind of the Directors; but one thing is obvious beyond the possibility of doubt, that Hood was dismissed because he gave evidence. Now, in what position does the House stand? It is admitted by the Directors that they committed an offence against Parliamentary law. I go further, and I say that they have pleaded guilty to a social crime. I know of no crime which a rich man can commit which is more grievous, more serious, more anti-social, more baneful in its consequences, than depriving a working man, without just reason, of his means of livelihood. That is the crime to which these men have pleaded guilty. Well, Sir, I ask this question: What is to be the punishment which they ought to undergo? By immemorial usage, this House has the power to send these men to prison. Why, I ask, should they not be sent to prison? There is only one reason, and only one advanced, and that is that they are wealthy gentlemen, eminently respectable, and that it is not to be supposed that they would voluntarily and intentionally commit such an offence. But, Sir, they have committed an offence, and they have given no compensation or equivalent. I quite admit, if the Directors had come forward in this House and not only apologised in words, but apologised in deeds and satisfied this House that Hood had been compensated for the injustice and injury done to him, then I should have agreed to the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade. But they have made no compensation—they have made no restitution. I believe that in the Roman Catholic Church, before absolution is granted, they require the sinner to make restitution; they have not made restitution, and everybody must see that the whole proceedings of this House, if they do not end in the imprisonment of these Directors, will be an absolute farce, an idle ceremony, an insult to the working classes, and a menace to the Privileges of this House. I regret more than I can express the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Midlothian. He allowed his generous feelings to run away with him, and looked too much to the position of the Directors, who on other accounts might deserve our sympathy, and too little to the position of the man who had been dismissed. What was the gist of the right hon. Gentleman's speech? It was—"I am very sorry for Hood, but we cannot do anything to help him." Well, the House of Commons is sorry, but it refuses to take the sword out of the scabbard. Why cannot the House of Commons give redress to Hood? Because the House of Commons being a House of rich men will not; they cannot because they will not. Do not let hon. Members opposite deceive themselves: the working classes of this country are intelligent enough to see through this hollow sham, and are sufficiently manly in their disposition to resent keenly and bitterly the insult which has been put upon them.

(11.25.) MR. A. J. BALFOUR rose in his place, and claimed to move, "That the Question be now put."

Question put, "That the Question be now put."

DR. CLARK (Caithness) (speaking seated): May I ask you, Sir, if, before you put the Main Question, it will be in Order to move an Amendment which I had intended to move in reference to imprisonment?

*MR. SPEAKER: No, that would not be in Order; the House will proceed to a decision on the Main Question.

(11.26.) The House divided:—Ayes 247; Noes 186.—(Div. List, No. 72.)

Question put accordingly, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the proposed Amendment."

The House divided:—Ayes 245; Noes 189.—(Div. List, No. 73.)

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR claimed, "That the Question on the Amendment be now put."

Question put accordingly, "That the words 'and this House will not deem that the said Directors and Manager of the Cambrian Railway have purged their contempt until they have re-instated John Hood in the position which he occupied before giving his evidence before this House, or otherwise compensated him,' be added at the end of the Main Question."

DR. CLARK: Can this be amended?

*MR. SPEAKER: No.

(11.53.) The House divided:—Ayes 159; Noes 274.—(Div. List, No. 74.)

Mr. A. J. BALFOUR claimed, "That the Main Question be now put."

MR. ROBERTSON (Dundee) (speaking seated): May I ask you, Sir, whether the Main Question can now be put without a previous Motion being carried?

*MR. SPEAKER: The Motion for putting the Question being carried applies to the Questions put from the Chair. This Question with the others has been put from the Chair.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): Does it follow that the Question is put on the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman?

*MR. SPEAKER: It is claimed and put if allowed. I allow it.

Main Question put accordingly. (Loud cries of "No.")

DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): No humbug!

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! With regard to the expression just used, I refrain from naming the hon. Gentleman who used it, because on an occasion such as this I do not wish to take any strong measures. I hope the House will behave to the end in a judicial spirit.

(12.10.) The House divided:—Ayes 349; Noes 70.—(Div. List, No. 75.)

Resolved—

"That this House, while recognising that Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, have disclaimed any intention to deter any railway servant from giving evidence before its Committee, and have expressed their unqualified regret for having unintentionally infringed any of its Rules and Privileges, is of opinion that the said Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House in their action towards John Hood, and that they be called in and admonished by Mr. Speaker for the breach of Privilege that they have committed."

Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher were accordingly called in, and Mr. Maclure standing in his place, and Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, standing at the Bar, were admonished as followeth by

MR. SPEAKER:

"Directors of the Cambrian Railway Company: the House has had under its consideration the case which has been presented to it, and I am now directed to inform you of the Resolution at which it has arrived. I will read to you the words of that Resolution:—This House, while recognising that Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher have disclaimed any intention to deter any railway servant from giving evidence before its Committee, and have expressed their unqualified regret for having unintentionally infringed any of its Rules and Privileges, is of opinion that the said Mr. John William Maclure, Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. John Conacher, have committed a breach of the Privileges of this House in their action towards John Hood, and that they be called in and admonished by Mr. Speaker for the breach of Privilege that they have committed."

"It now becomes my duty, as the mouth-piece of the House, and as the interpreter of its wishes, to state to you what is the opinion of the House upon your conduct. It is quite true that you have made an apology to the House for the undoubted breach of its Privileges. I need hardly tell you that a mere apology does not always cover the extent and surface of an offence; but the House has taken a lenient view in that respect of your conduct and has expressed in its Resolution its willingness to accept your apology. But that is not all. The House has directed me to admonish you for a grave breach of the Privileges of this House. I would have you know,—each and all of you gentlemen,—that though the Privileges of this House are not to be put into operation upon any light or trivial occasion, and though the intervals are long between the periods when appeals are made to those Privileges, yet a Privilege of this House is no unreal, shadowy, or unsubstantial thing; it is what the House clings to, and what it is determined to maintain. The breach of Privilege which you have committed is, that you have by your conduct intimidated a witness before this House; that your conduct towards him is calculated to deter witnesses in giving evidence before this House or its Committees. So dear is that especial Privilege to this House, that I must remind you that at the commencement of every Session, and therefore at the commencement of this Session, on the very first day of its meeting, two Resolutions were passed by this House, in one of which it declared, ‘That if it shall appear that any person hath given false evidence in any case before this House, or any Committee thereof, this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.’ The second of those Resolutions expresses the determination of the House, ‘That if it shall appear that any person hath been tampering with any witness in respect of his evidence to be given to this House or any Committee thereof, or’ (and this is the point to which I would especially direct your attention) ‘directly or indirectly hath endeavoured to deter or hinder any person from appearing or giving evidence, the same is declared to be a high crime and misdemeanour, and this House will proceed with the utmost severity against such offender.’ Those are Resolutions which are fresh in the memory of this House, and which I am surprised that those gentlemen whom I now see before me at the Bar should have so lightly infringed. It is a very grave and serious offence that you have committed. The House in its judgment and, I should add, in its mercy has decided that I should admonish you. I do most seriously admonish you, and I warn you that any repetition of this offence, for it is an offence, will be visited by this House with its very severe rebuke, reproof and punishment. A great principle has been infringed, the principle that evidence given before this House shall be free and unrestrained. I warn you against repeating an offence of this character. The offence is a very serious one, for it is no less an offence than trying, however unadvisedly it may be in certain cases, to deter witnesses from giving evidence before a Committee of this House, and thus to disturb and taint the very sources of truth. I believe I act, as I wish to act, as the interpreter of the feelings of this House when I seriously admonish you, and express the hope that your example will serve as a deterrent to others, and that it will also act as a warning to yourselves never again to presume to commit the like offence against the character, the dignity, and the purity of this House.”

Then Mr. James Frederick Buckley, Mr. William Bailey Hawkins, and Mr. James Conacher were ordered to withdraw, and they withdrew accordingly.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I now beg to move—

“That the admonition delivered by Mr. Speaker be entered upon the Journals of this House.”

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I ask, as a point of Order, is that consequential business?

MR. SPEAKER: Yes; and I hope the House will allow the remarks which it was my duty to deliver to be entered on the Journals of the House.

Motion agreed to.

Ordered, That the admonition delivered by Mr. Speaker be entered upon the Journals of this House.

RATING OF MACHINERY BILL.

(No. 31.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Mr. WINTERBOTHAM rose to move, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

Mr. STOREY rose—

*MR. SPEAKER: A point of procedure arises here which is, I think, a new one. I feel it would be rather hard to insist upon the application of the technical Rule that there being no Instruction to the Committee before the House I should immediately leave the Chair. Two Notices of Instructions were placed on the Paper late last night. The hon. Member has rather complained that he was not informed of the objection to his Motion, but it is no part of the duty of the Clerk to call attention to the terms of a Notice of Motion. The Instructions are out of Order, inas much as they are mandatory instead of being permissive; but under the circumstances I think I should be straining the Rule if I did not allow an opportunity for an Instruction to be moved. I am conscious that in so doing there may be a little unfairness to the advocates of the Bill, but the circumstances are peculiar, and I think it will be convenient if I do not now leave the Chair.

MR. STOREY: I thank you, Sir. Shall I be in Order if I move now?

*MR. SPEAKER: No, the hon. Gentleman will give notice.

MR. STOREY: I will do so at once.

Committee deferred till To-morrow, at Two of the clock.

GENERAL POLICE AND IMPROVEMENT (SCOTLAND) ACT (1862) AMENDMENT BILL.—(No. 188.)

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS (No. 2) BILL.—(No. 91.)

Order for Second Reading upon Wednesday next read, and discharged.

Bill withdrawn.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL AGE PENSIONS.

Report from the Select Committee, with Minutes of Evidence and an Appendix, brought up and read.

Report to lie upon the Table, and to be printed. (No. 138.)

MOTIONS.

ALKALI, &C., WORKS BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ritchie, Bill to amend "The Alkali, &c., Works Regulation Act, 1881," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ritchie and Mr. Long.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 264.]

ST. MICHAEL'S, COVENTRY (VICAR'S RATE) BILL.

On Motion of Mr. Ballantine, Bill to repeal the Act nineteen George the Third, chapter sixty, intituled "An Act for establishing certain payments to be made to the Vicar of the Parish of St. Michael's, in the City of Coventry, for the time being in lieu of tithes," ordered to be brought in by Mr. Ballantine, Mr. Labouchere, Mr. Robert Reid, Mr. Seale-Hayne, and Mr. Cobb.

Bill presented, and read first time. [Bill 265.]

ADJOURNMENT.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House do now adjourn."

(12.42.) DR. TANNER (Cork Co., Mid): May I ask the Secretary to the Treasury why it is he objects to give the Return I have asked for of a copy of the correspondence relating to the acceleration of the mail service between Dublin and Queenstown? As a matter of fact, this is a matter of material interest to the commercial community of Cork. I am not speaking for any political section, but for the people of the City of Cork, and I ask what is the objection.

MR. SPEAKER: If objection is taken to giving the Return the question cannot be now discussed.

DR. TANNER: With all submission, Sir, I thought I was entitled to make these remarks on the Motion for Adjournment, but if I am out of Order I will at once sit down. I merely wish to say, on the Motion for Adjournment, and seeing the right hon. Gentleman in his place, that I shall be glad to know what reason there is for refusing the publication of the correspondence on this very simple matter, but a matter very important to the poor and struggling commercial community in the City and County of Cork. Why should the right hon. Gentleman object? Many questions have been put on the subject, and we receive many communications asking us to try and secure some solution of the difficulty, some remedy for this stop-gap and impossible position for business in Cork. I know we are all tired with our evening's work; but Irish Members, and notably those representing Cork, are called upon to request some distinct answer from the right hon. Gentleman beyond that very inappropriate, if I may so say, answer—that he objects to giving this Return. I think the citizens of Cork may fairly claim to know this. The House will excuse me, late though it is, if I ask the right hon. Gentleman why it is he interferes to prevent this information being given—information desired by all sections in Cork, be they Tories, Liberals, or Nationalists?

(12.45.) THE SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Sir JOHN GORST, Chatham): I can only repeat what I have said at Question time—that there is no correspondence on the subject which, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, could be laid on the Table of the House with advantage to the Public Service.

(12.45.) DR. CLARK (Caithness): I may be allowed to say, as one of the Tellers for the minority of 70 in the last Division, that many of us, disagreeing as we did with the terms of the Motion, were prevented from moving and supporting a direct Amendment as we desired, and had no course left open to us but to vote against the Motion. We regret very much that we were unable to amend the Motion in adequate terms; and of course if the Motion had been lost we should have brought forward a Motion of a more drastic character. I only desire to say this to prevent any false impression getting abroad as to our action in voting against the Motion.

(12.46.) MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): May I ask the Secretary to the Treasury if his remarks and objection to the publication of the correspondence just referred to relate to the correspondence between the Post Office and the Treasury, or to the correspondence between the Post Office and the Great Southern and Western Railway Company? It may be undesirable to publish the correspondence between the two Government Departments. I can understand this may be of a confidential character, but the same objection does not apply to the correspondence between the Post Office and the Great Southern and Western Railway Company. Will the right hon. Gentleman be prepared to give that part of the correspondence?

(12.48.) SIR J. GORST: If the hon. Member will put down notice of his question I shall be prepared to give him an answer.

(12.48.) MR. CONYBEARE (Cornwall, Camborne): We put down many questions, and do not elicit answers. I do not understand what conception of his duty the right hon. Gentleman may have when he constitutes himself judge and authority as to what is or is not desirable to place before the House in the matter of information. Upon matters of public importance we want information, and it is scarcely sufficient to be told on the ipse dixit of the right hon. Gentleman that it is not in the interest of the Public Service that we should have it. The Departmental correspondence may be confidential in character; but without wishing to dogmatise, I do say that it is not fair to refuse information such as would be given in the correspondence between the Post Office and the company. I wish to protest against the assumption by the right hon. Gentleman, or any Member of the Government, that such information cannot be given in the interest of the Public Service.

(12.50.) MR. T. M. HEALY (Longford, N.): I wish to associate myself with what has been said by the hon. Member for Caithness (Dr. Clark), but, at the same time, I may take leave to say that I think the terms of the admonition employed by Mr. Speaker largely made up for the inadequacy of the Resolution proposed by the Government.

(12.51.) MR. FLYNN (Cork, N.): I wish to add my opinion that in asking for the correspondence referred to just now we make a most reasonable request. We want to show the country how the South of Ireland is treated in this matter of mail service. While £19,000 is advanced for the service to the North of Ireland we ask some £3,000 for an accelerated service between Queenstown and Dublin. The Postmaster General admitted to a deputation that the request was reasonable, but he said there was a Treasury difficulty. Now, we want to influence the Treasury if we can, and to give them the opportunity to justify their action if they can. I hope the Treasury will see the importance of the matter, which we shall continue to press.

Motion agreed to.

House adjourned at five minutes before One o'clock.

Dr. Tanner

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, 8th April, 1892.

The House met at Two of the clock.

QUESTIONS.

DUNDRUM ASYLUM.

MR. P. O'BRIEN (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether frequent complaints have been made of the head attendant temporarily appointed at the Central Asylum, Dundrum, Dublin; whether the man had any previous experience of the duties of the office; and whether, before confirming his appointment, the claims of other officers of long service in the establishment will be considered?

*THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. JACKSON, Leeds, N.): The Inspectors of Lunatic Asylums report that there have been no serious complaints against the officer referred to. The acting head attendant has had no previous asylum experience; he has held the position of a non-commissioned officer in the Army. As I have already stated, in reply to a question, the qualifications of all candidates will receive due consideration when a permanent appointment is being made to the post.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that this man has been reported for cowardice in dealing with a troublesome patient? Surely that is a serious charge?

*MR. JACKSON: No, I am not aware of that.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: But I am.

PROMOTION IN THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that the system of promotion in the Royal Irish Constabulary, known as the "P. List," is alleged to operate unfairly towards the older and more experienced members of the force who entered the Service before this system was adopted a few years ago; that since the introduction of this system one-third of the vacancies have been filled by young men of short service and undistinguished in the force except that they had passed examinations in map drawing and other subjects not usually associated with the detection and prevention of crime; and whether he will cause the system to be so modified as not to tell against efficient constables of long service who entered the force before the existence of such conditions for promotion?

*MR. JACKSON: The existing promotion system in the Royal Irish Constabulary has existed for upwards of two years, and has, I am informed, worked most satisfactorily. A large proportion of vacancies—two-thirds—is given among the senior men, while a third is reserved for those, irrespective of seniority, who prove themselves specially fitted for promotion. The examination includes among the subjects tests in police duties and general fitness for command and elements of drill.

THE CASE OF DR. GALLAGHER.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has yet decided to allow an independent medical man to examine Dr. Gallagher, alleged to be insane, in Portland Prison; and, if so, whether he will cause the doctor selected to be informed that insanity is hereditary in Gallagher's family?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Mr. MATTHEWS, Birmingham, E.): I have already twice this Session informed the House that this prisoner is reported by the medical officers to be in good bodily health and to exhibit no symptoms of mental unsoundness. There is no reason whatever for allowing an independent medical man to examine him.

RURAL POSTMAN, FOXFORD, COUNTY MAYO.

MR. P. O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Postmaster General if he is aware that a rural postman named Michael McHale, employed at Foxford, County Mayo, has to travel 15 miles per day for wages of ten shillings per week; and whether this man is entitled, under a scale of pay fixed in 1891, to an increase of two shillings per week, and an annual weekly increment of one shilling per week; and, if so, whether he will see that he is allowed the increase from the date the new scale of pay was issued?

THE POSTMASTER GENERAL (Sir J. FERGUSON, Manchester, N.E.): The total length of this postman's walk is 12½ miles, not 15 miles; and his work is finished by 11 a.m. every day. Not being fully employed he is not entitled to be paid on scale, as suggested; but inquiry shall be made whether any addition should be made to his wages.

MILITARY CHAPLAIN, ROORKEE, BENGAL.

MR. SEXTON (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for India whether the Catholic military chaplain at Roorkee, Bengal, has been withdrawn from that station after the Catholic soldiers there, and their co-religionists, had erected a church by subscription; and, if so, whether the case will be re-considered?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Baron H. de WORMS, Liverpool, East Toxteth): My hon. Friend has requested me to say that he has no information on the subject, but an inquiry will be addressed to India.

ALLEGED POLICE VIOLENCE AT BELFAST.

MR. SEXTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether there has been any inquiry by the Inspector General of the Royal Irish Constabulary as to the circumstances under which Constable Millar of that force fractured the skull of a man named Francis Coogan, by a blow of his baton, in Belfast, on the night of the 10th ult.; and whether Coogan's life is or has been in danger?

MR. JACKSON: I shall be glad if the hon. Member will allow me to postpone an answer until Monday. There has been no Report from the Inspector General, but I have had a communication from—I think he is called—the Chief Constable of Belfast. I have called for a Report, but it is not yet to hand.

Mr. P. O'Brien

MR. SEXTON: It is nearly a month since this murderous assault. Has the Chief Constable reported at all on the case, whether Coogan's life has been in danger?

MR. JACKSON: The Chief Constable has been investigating the circumstances. I understand the injured man has now left hospital. The case has been watched meantime, but no proceedings have been taken; it was not found possible to do so while the man was in hospital.

SMALLPOX IN THE METROPOLIS.

MR. TALBOT (Oxford University): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether his attention has been called to the fact that patients have been recently removed to the hospital ships belonging to the Metropolitan Asylums Board from two houses in Shoreditch, and that, after an interval of a fortnight, in one case five children, and in the other four children, were similarly removed from the same houses; whether he is aware that in neither case were the children re-vaccinated after the first outbreak in the house, and that out of these nine children five had never been vaccinated; and whether, in view of the fact that, pending the inquiry by the Royal Commission, some Poor Law Guardians and Police Magistrates in London decline to enforce the Vaccination Acts, he proposes to take any steps to protect the Metropolis from the dangers of a serious outbreak of smallpox?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. RITCHIE, Tower Hamlets, St. George's): I have made inquiry as to the facts, and I find that they are as stated by my hon. Friend. There have, for some time past, been occasional cases of smallpox occurring in different parts of London. I have been strongly impressed with the great importance of the Local Authorities taking the most energetic measures with the view of preventing the spread of infection when these cases occur, and in May last I wrote to the Vestry of the Parish of Shoreditch and to the several other Vestries in the Metropolis asking them specially to instruct their Medical Officer of Health in every case of smallpox which might be notified to him or
